The $8 million (US) emergency department will serve 500,000 area residents who are ill or are victims of road accidents or terror. "It was fantastic to meet all the professionals and see the state-of-the-art facility," Reisman said.

It was the third visit to Israel for Reisman, who has been in astronaut training in Houston since 1998. He spent time here in 1985 with his family when he was a high school student on vacation; the second occasion was to accompany Rona Ramon to her husband's funeral.

"It was so incredibly tragic. Ilan had a great sense of humour and worked very hard to represent not only Israel but every Jew in the world," Reisman said. Given the options of collecting debris from the shuttle that fell to earth, assisting in the technical aspects or giving emotional support to the families, Reisman chose to help with the Ramon family.

"I got to know them even better than I knew Ilan. Rona is active and the kids are doing very well. It was difficult for them to decide when to return home, but she made the right decision," he said.

Reisman's current visit to Israel was via Moscow, where he underwent training with Russian cosmonauts who will work with him on the space station. "The Russians are very proud of their accomplishments in space, which include everything but landing on the moon." Even today, you see street vendors selling T-shirts with the image of Yuri Gargarin, the Russian cosmonaut who was the first man to go to space," he said.

"I grew up during the Cold War, so now it's almost unthinkable that I'm a part of a mission of co-operations with Russians, along with Canadians, Europeans and Japanese."

He said that as a Jew, he has never felt discriminated against growing up in the United States or working for NASA or co-operating with Russian scientists (and speaking their language), but while in Moscow, he did notice some anti-Semitic graffiti and hear some unpleasant remarks from people who did not know he is Jewish.

Reisman, who can read some Hebrew but has forgotten most of the language he knew when he had his bar mitzvah, recalled that he has been interested in space since he was a kid assembling model planes and rockets and watching movies about Mercury, Gemini and Apollo flights, but he never took it seriously as a future career.

At the University of Pennsylvania, he studied economics and mechanical engineering and then learned to fly. After doing his doctorate in mechanical engineering at the California Institute of Technology and getting a pilot's licence, he thought that his experience was not so different from missions specialists. He applied along with 2,000 others and was accepted to a class of 31 that included six foreigners.

Although there is no NASA plan yet for another Israeli astronaut and none currently training in Houston, Reisman hopes that at least the Israel Space Agency – which he said has superb technical abilities – will be able to co-operate on the International Space Station project.

As for the danger of space flights – demonstrated by the Challenger disaster, in January 1986, and the Columbia disaster, in February 2003 – Reisman said he has "no illusions about absolute safety. We have psychologists to help us cope with living in isolation from our families for six months on the space station but not with fear about the launch or re-entry.

"But pilots of high-performance aircraft and scuba divers are not strangers to risk. And we are trained so well, that the actual launch feels like a simulation. Even though you're scared, you have a strong instinct to do your job."

Controversial rabbi was father of British Masorti movement

By PAUL SHAVIV
Special to The CJN

Obituary

The passing of Rabbi Louis Jacobs on July 1, just a few days before his 86th birthday, deprives the British Jewish community of the most knowledgeable, most versatile and most controversial scholar it has ever produced.

Rabbi Jacobs was born in 1920 to a working-class, not particularly observant family in Manchester, England. As a teenager, he was the outstanding student at the Manchester yeshiva. He later became one of the early fellows of the Gateshead Kollel, and in the late 1940s, he came to London as the assistant rabbi at Rabbi Eli Munk's strictly Orthodox Golders Green Beth Hamedrash. He also enrolled at University College London, where exposure to critical scholarship and the wider academic world irrevocably changed his intellectual belief, although not his faith.

In 1957, by now rabbi of the fashionable New West End United Synagogue in London, Rabbi Jacobs published the book We Have Reason to Believe, which proposed that Jews could accept modern biblical scholarship but still regard traditional Jewish law as authoritative. In Anglo-Jewry at the time, it was unexceptional.

What followed was a British harbinger of changes in Orthodoxy that have characterized Jewish life ever since.

Denouncing Rabbi Jacobs' views as heresy, the then-chief rabbi of England, Israel Brodie, excluded him first from Jews' College and then from his pulpit in London. This caused a major public scandal, and the consequences of the "Jacobs Affair" still resonate in the British Jewish community.

Rabbi Jacobs' supporters resigned en masse from the United Synagogue and founded an independent congregation, the New London Synagogue.

In the decades that followed, Rabbi Jacobs published a staggering array of both scholarly and popular works on Judaism. His knowledge covered medieval philosophy, theology, Talmudic studies, responsa literature, Kabbalah, mysticism and Chassidism.

Few scholars worldwide equalled his range of scholarly activity, and even his detractors could never criticize his knowledge or scholarship. He was a visiting fellow at Harvard Divinity School, and in 1985, when the American Lubavitch Chassidim sued a nephew of the Schneersohn family over ownership of the sixth Lubavitcher Rebbe's valuable library, Rabbi Jacobs was the expert witness retained by Chabad as the world expert on chassidic doctrine. (He found it piquant that the judge in the case had been married to the daughter of renowned Protestant theologian Reinhold Niebuhr.)

Rabbi Jacobs never sought controversy. In his personal life, he was a gentleman shy, reserved and unfailingly gracious to all. He remained civil, polite and dignified throughout his life, suffering major and minor insults – continuing up to very recent times – with reserve.

His New London Synagogue generated the British Masorti movement, which sits awkwardly somewhere between the North American Conservative movement and traditional Orthodoxy. Yet Rabbi Jacobs distanced himself from the British Masorti movement, uncomfortable with its halachically radical tendencies. He still believed in an observant, traditional halachic Judaism that incorporated the implications of modern thought and scholarship. But it proved to be a refined, somewhat cerebral position that could only ever appeal to a small circle.

In 2005, readers of the London Jewish Chronicle voted him the most distinguished Jew in Anglo-Jewry's 350-year recent history. It was a fitting tribute. Many who did not agree with his theological position retained a lingering feeling of solidarity and sympathy – not to say guilt – for the treatment he had received. As a gesture of final reconciliation, the current chief rabbi, Jonathan Sacks, attended his funeral.

Israel & the Jewish World

Adjusting to modern life a challenge

He knows their lives are about to change – drastically.

For the Falash Mora, some of whom have been waiting six, eight or even 12 years to depart, the flight aboard the Ethiopian Airlines jets is one of their first experiences of modern life. Only a week or so before, many had been living in not much more than dirt-floor shacks in a compound in Gonder, where conditions are, to put it charitably, primitive.

As part of their orientation to life in Israel, they had been instructed in the use of indoor toilets and the women (mostly) were shown for the first time how to safely use a gas-fired cooker.

In Gonder, a one-hour flight north of Addis that is the historic centre for Jewish life in Ethiopia, conditions have remained backward by western standards. A tour of the Falash Mora compound revealed women spinning cotton in the manner of biblical matriarchs and men making tallitot with hand-powered looms and working metal as ancient blacksmiths might have done. For those who had work as day labourers outside the compound, a wage of 10 birr per day, or a little more than $1 (US), is all they could expect.

For Falash Mora seeking to emigrate to Israel, adjusting to modern life will prove to be a formidable challenge, particularly for the older generation. Ori Konforti, consul with the Israeli embassy in Addis and the man in charge of the Ethiopian aliyah, said more than 75 per cent of the Falash Mora are illiterate. One estimate puts the cost to the Israeli government of integrating Falash Mora at $100,000 each.

Because the Falash Mora are considered Christians, they are not eligible to immigrate under Israel's Law of Return. Instead, they are being admitted under family reunification criteria and all must be sponsored by relatives already in Israel, Konforti said.

The vetting process is painstaking, with potential immigrants interviewed in Ethiopia by Amharic-speaking interrogators. Their testimony and any evidence they present is evaluated in Ethiopia and sent to Israel, where their relatives are also questioned and the stories cross-checked. If their stories match, approval is granted.

Konforti divides the Falash Mora into three groups. The first, about 1,600 strong, have already received approval to immigrate and they are being brought to Israel at the rate of 300 per month. (Two weeks ago, the Israeli government turned down a proposal to double that pace.)

A second group of 10,000 to 11,000 are on "the list" of persons being checked by Israel's Ministry of the Interior. Konforti believes "the vast majority will be approved."

The third group is not so lucky. "There are thousands of people living near the [Israeli] embassy or close to our office in Gonder," Konforti said. "They are dreaming that some day, some aircraft will take them to the Promised Land." However, he expects few will meet Israeli immigration criteria.

Previous Ethiopian migration to Israel occurred in two waves. Operation Moses (1984-85) and Operation Solomon (1991) brought to Israel the Beta Israel, the black Jews of Ethiopia known pejoratively by their neighbours as Falashas (strangers or outsiders). Their current population in Israel is a little more than 100,000.

In recent years, political pressure mounted on the Israeli government to reunify Beta Israel with their Christian relatives still in Ethiopia. The Falash Mora are believed to have converted to Christianity to avoid discrimination or to own land. Though ineligible to make aliyah under Israel's Law of Return, since 1999 about 3,600 a year have been brought to Israel. One report suggested that in addition to the thousands in Gonder and Addis hoping for aliyah, there could be thousands more with Jewish ties living in the northern Ethiopian highlands. Konforti said many Ethiopians who have no ties to Israel but who are eager to improve their lives are hoping to make aliyah.

Many in Israel "say it's an unending process that will be almost impossible to cut in the future," Konforti stated.

In January 2005, then-Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon "made a military [like] decision… to end the situation in a systematic way, to help people in the pipeline." The plan was to bring just under 20,000 Falash Mora to Israel by the end of 2008.

Sharon relied on a ruling by Chief Rabbi Ovadiah Yosef, who had decided in 1973 that the Beta Israel were indeed Jews. Rabbi Yosef declared that the Falash Mora had converted out of fear and persecution and should also be considered Jews.

A U.S. NGO, the North American Conference on Ethiopian Jewry (NACOEJ), has lobbied for Falash Mora immigration. The NGO has been barred by the Ethiopian government from operating in the country, but through an affiliate it operates the Gonder compound pending a Jewish Agency takeover. It offers a feeding program (2,900 children receive two meals a day), health care and helps prepare Falash Mora for life in Israel.

In North America, the United Jewish Communities (UJC) pledged last year to raise $100 million (US) over three years for Falash Mora immigration, though that campaign might be in jeopardy because of the refusal of the Israeli government to increase the monthly rate of aliyah.

Konforti believes NACOEJ "from an Israeli perspective were a kind of pain in the ass. They created for us an unending situation."

Getu Zemene, spokesperson for the Falash Mora in Gonder, argues that of those waiting to emigrate, "most have a father or mother or close relatives in Israel."

Moreover, most would never have converted to Christianity if Ethiopians had treated them equally. Zemene, who has been waiting eight years to move to Israel, said the Falash Mora at the Gonder compound moved there from seven nearby villages. They sold all they had in the hopes of being selected to make aliyah. They would be without hope if denied the opportunity to move to Israel.

"Life is terrible here in Gonder," he said. Few have work and many rely on remittances from relatives in Israel to make ends meet.

"People here consider themselves Jewish," he said, though he acknowledged that before they moved to Gonder, "they were practising Christianity."

In Gonder, however, they have embraced Judaism and as if to illustrate that fact to visiting North Americans, hundreds of men, wearing tallitot and tfillin, and women participated in a morning service. To an outsider, they appear more pious and observant than most Israelis.

"From the beginning they are Jewish people," Zemene proclaimed.

'Funny-sad' stories explore dark side of human relationships

Lines of Truth and Conversation* by Joan Alexander, Porcupine's Quill Press.

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Producing an acclaimed first collection of short stories was a "snap" for Joan Alexander, a Toronto writer whose book, Lines of Truth and Conversation, merited inclusion in the Globe and Mail's list of the 100 best books of 2005.

Joan Alexander

Snap is the title of perhaps the collection's most charming tale, about an eight-year-old girl's search for emotional stability and a sympathetic friend after her father's remarriage in Chicago in 1962. (The girl's mother had dropped out of the picture because she "drank too much, forged cheques and ran around with men.")

"Snap" is the sound the girl's little patent-leather purse makes as she opens it to rearrange her things – "a tissue, a comb and a bow for my hair" – during the marriage ceremony in a rabbi's study. When she is done laying each item in turn on her lap, she replaces them in her purse, which she closes with another annoying "snap."

"When the ceremony was over, and everyone had told me how bothersome the snapping sound had been and what a nuisance I was, my brother and I were taken home to Jill's apartment," the narrator relates in the first paragraph. What follows is a gem of a tale describing the girl's emotional roller-coaster ride as she adjusts to a difficult stepmother and her family's new life in Jill's apartment on Chicago's south side.

Ultimately, her father's second marriage proves a flop, as do the various friendships the narrator attempts to forge with her stepsister, neighbours, a black maid and others. But through her tribulations, she realizes a deeper purpose: the need to be a writer. Imbedded into the story is a mirror through which the narrator reflects on her childhood and the formation of her own identity. Whether intentional or not, the story has all the hallmarks of a literary self-portrait of the artist at a young age.

Canadian writer Mavis Gallant also found much to admire in Snap, and nominated it for inclusion in Best New American Voices when it first appeared in the journal The New Quarterly.

Alexander sent the story to John Metcalf, the celebrated editor at Porcupine's Quill Press, three years ago. "He read Snap in July 2003 and he said, 'Send me your work,'" she recalled. She began sending him other stories she'd been writing since the late '90s – 10 in all, including the long piece Five Months, which, at 60 published pages, qualifies as a novella. The plan at first was to publish the novella separately, but ultimately all the pieces were presented in a single collection.

Five Months chronicles the last months in the life of a family patriarch and the family's various insensitivities and squabbles over material possessions that arise before and after his death. While some characters come across as compassionate and caring, and others as calculating and cold, Alexander said she attempted to present everybody in a sympathetic light.

"Everybody cared about the old man in their own way," she said. "I wasn't trying to create a dark figure." Then she declared with a smile: "That's the kind of writer I am – everybody gets equal opportunity."

Her sly, wry sense of humour is just as evident in conversation as it is in her prose. Her stories, which often seem to explore the dark side of human relationships, have been called "funny-sad." She seems pleased that I get the comic edge to her writing because, she says, not all readers do. She said she thinks of herself as "funny-sad" but added that no one else in her family does. (However, she herself sometimes doesn't seem to realize when she's being funny, as when she tells this interviewer, apparently in all seriousness, "It's kind of you to write down what I'm saying!")

Alexander was born in Chicago in 1954, graduated in English from the University of Illinois, and in 1979 married a Canadian, with whom she has two sons aged 22 and 20; she and her family live in the Eglinton-Bathurst neighbourhood of Toronto. "I just got my citizenship this year, and I'm happy and proud about that," she said. For many years she volunteered with the annual Jewish Book Fair and taught part time at the Jewish community school at Bloor and Spadina. She began to concentrate on writing fiction about 1998.

When she's writing a story, she has no idea of where it will go and only hopes that a structure will eventually emerge. "Like Jackson Pollock, I'm just getting down the drips," she said, likening the process to what an abstract expressionist painter like Pollock does to capture the spontaneous act of creation on canvas.

However her own particular talent may be judged, talent is only part of the equation for most writers, she said. "You get the gift and as everybody says, the rest is perspiration. That's true with everything: sports, being a gardener, literally with everything. It's just the work. People ask, do I believe that writing can be taught? Not really. But I believe you can work with what you have and make it better."

The morning the Globe included her in the top 100, Alexander couldn't bring herself to read the paper, but she kept busy fielding telephone calls from all over. "It was a good day," she said. "I never had a morning like that. It was out of the ordinary for me. It was nice."

A mature stylist, she has presented us with a charming story collection and the prospect of an equally promising work to follow. She is currently putting the finishing touches on a debut novel about a Jewish family in Toronto about 2003, just as the war in Iraq is building up. "The novel is almost there," she said, "but I've been saying it's almost there for about six months now."

Lines of Truth and Conversation, at 192 pages, is available in bookstores. The novel, hopefully, will be coming soon.

PINCHAS ZUKERMAN RENEWS CONTRACT WITH NAC ORCHESTRA

Pinchas Zukerman will remain the music director of the Ottawa-based National Arts Centre Orchestra for at least five more years, the NAC's board has announced.

On the recommendation of its president and CEO Peter Herrndorf, the NAC extended Zukerman's contract until at least 2011. Herrndorf said the NAC would certainly continue to benefit from "his leadership on the podium, his extraordinary musical artistry as soloist, his profound commitment to music education and his commitment to annual touring with our orchestra."

Since arriving at the national institution in 1999, Zukerman "has set an incredible pace of conducting, playing concertos and chamber music, teaching, planning seasons, touring, making recordings and expanding our program repertoire," said Christopher Deacon, the orchestra's managing director.

Pinchas Zukerman

Under Zukerman, the orchestra has attracted major recording and media projects, and made tours of various regions of Canada, Europe, the Middle East, United States and Mexico. Tours of China and Japan are pending in 2007.

Born in Tel Aviv in 1948, Zukerman began musical training with his father, first on recorder, then clarinet, and ultimately violin and viola. At age eight he began studying at the Israel Conservatory and the Academy of Music in Tel Aviv. He came to America to study at Juilliard in 1962 and won a major international competition in 1967, launching his solo career. He is the fifth conductor to lead the NAC Orchestra, which was founded in 1969.

Film about Holocaust education now out on DVD

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

The film Paper Clips is finally available on DVD.

The documentary was released by an American company called Hart Sharp Video, and I'm not sure if it's easily available in Canada, although amazon.ca carries it and some video stores can obtain it, although they may have to bring it in from the United States.

The story behind Paper Clips is well known. A middle school in Whitwell, Tenn., was looking for a program to teach students about diversity and other cultures. The town was made up almost exclusively of white, Christian people, with very few African Americans and no Jews.

When David Smith, the school's assistant principal, returned from a conference, he suggested that the children do a project about the Holocaust, and from that sprang a program that energized an entire community and became a beacon for many others to follow.

The idea – to collect one paper clip for each of the six million Jews killed in the Holocaust – captured the interest of the students, who did research related to the Holocaust themselves, and it caught the imagination of many outside the town, including Elliot Berlin and Joe Fab, who decided to make a film about the project.

The film has played theatrically in many major Canadian cities, and it's been screened by community and religious groups to thousands of people. The Toronto Jewish Film Festival showed the film to more than 1,500 students during the past winter, and it held four screenings at the festival in May. All the screenings were free and included a talk afterward by a Holocaust survivor.

The film seems to have hit a nerve in the community, and its release on DVD promises that many more people will have an opportunity to see it.

The DVD has about one hour of bonus material, including one feature called "Sabbath Lesson at Ground Zero." In April 2002, several students from Whitwell, along with the school's principal, Linda Hooper, and teacher Sandra Roberts, were invited to speak at a Jewish temple in the New York area. They also ate Sabbath dinner at a member's home, and they met some Jewish teenagers and toured Manhattan, including Ground Zero, where the World Trade Center once stood. It was a moving experience for all, including those watching the DVD.

The extras include an expanded version of the dedication of the memorial built in front of the school, as well as a number of extended scenes and interviews with Holocaust survivors.

After seeing the film and meeting David Smith, I visited Whitwell last December on the way back from Florida. I spent about 40 minutes viewing a cattle car that houses the memorial and the 11 million paper clips that the students eventually collected (representing all the victims of the Nazis, Jews and others). I was also fortunate to spend time with Hooper and others at the school. More people should take the time to visit the memorial, which is an easy 40-minute drive off Highway I-75.

A second documentary recently released on DVD, Sister Rose's Passion, was screened by the Toronto Jewish Film Festival in 2005 and tells the story of a remarkable woman.

Sister Rose was an 85-year-old nun and a professor at Seaton Hall University in New Jersey. She was a leader in trying to mend relations between the Catholic Church and the Jewish community. She took on the church establishment, and her PhD dissertation was instrumental in getting the Church to officially announce that the Jews should not be blamed for killing Jesus.

Sister Rose was also a leader in making Holocaust studies part of school curricula in New Jersey and elsewhere in the United States, and she never stopped working for better relations between Catholics and Jews.

The DVD has a number of powerful bonus features, including a discussion between Sister Rose and other nuns about Catholic-Jewish relations; a clip of the film receiving an award at the Tribeca Film Festival; and an interview with director Oren Jacoby on the Charlie Rose Show.

And for readers who have been waiting to hear about Gloomy Sunday, I can now report that it's scheduled to be released on DVD on Sept. 12.

Fast-paced film is a portrait of a terrrorist

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The War Within is extremely timely, dealing with the red-hot subject of terrorism since the catastrophic events of Sept. 11, 2001, in the United States.

Now playing in Toronto, Joseph Castelo's feature film underscores the fact that the movie industry is now ready to embrace this sensitive topic wholeheartedly and unreservedly after having stayed clear of it.

The War Within is set mainly in and around Manhattan, where the World Trade Towers fell in a cloud of thick dust and grit after being struck by commercial airliners commandeered by 19 Muslim terrorists.

The chief protagonist, Hassan (Ayad Ahktar), is a Pakistani engineer and member of a terrorist cell that has been broken up by the police.

He and his fellow plotters had planned to blow up Grand Central Station. The police arrest all of the conspirators but Hassan and Khalid (Charles Daniel Sandoval), the charismatic ringleader.

Hassan, an Islamic fundamentalist, escapes the dragnet, finding refugee with Sayeed (Firdous Bamji), his unsuspecting, somewhat secular childhood friend who lives with his family in a New Jersey cookie-cutter suburb.

The War Within actually begins in Paris' Latin Quarter three years earlier. Hassan, then a student, is hustled into a car, drugged and flown to Karachi, Pakistan, suspected of being a terrorist. His abductors are Western intelligence agents.

It is a taut opening, and fortunately, Castelo is able to sustain the fast pace.

In essence a portrait of a terrorist, the film takes us into Hassan's mind as he prepares himself for the attack. Only later does a viewer learn why Hassan has become an Islamic radical and turned against the United States.

Anything but frightened of his impending mission, Hassan is glad he can be of service to Allah. "This is god's work," he says. Like a Palestinian suicide bomber, he believes that life after death will be far better. Call it, if you will, the culture of death.

But with each passing day he spends with Sayeed and his family, Hassan is increasingly torn between his jihadist impulses and still unfulfilled mission and his fond feelings for them.

A Pakistani man has only words of praise for the United States, where he has achieved a measure of prosperity. But his friend, an anti-American, denounces his adopted country as a voracious colonial power that oppresses Muslims.

Castelo, in this pivotal segment, touches on an important point: the majority of Muslims oppose terrorism and are law-abiding citizens, but a seething minority has embarked on the path of extremism.

Fine, suspenseful and very topical, The War Within is a microcosm of the tensions that roil Islam in this era of Muslim rage and rampant terrorism.

Choreographer inspired by strong women in her life

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

Female aggression isn't the most popular topic in the mainstream media. Besides watching Rachel get mad at Ross on Friends, feminine emotions on TV are often limited to catfights, or crying. One Toronto choreographer, though, is putting aggressive women front and centre in a new, original production.

"I was watching a movie, The Upside of Anger, the other day, and in the making of it, they said it was so hard for them to get the movie done because people who went said they don't want to watch a film about angry women," says Kathleen Rea, the creator of IRE, one of three pieces being performed as part of her Vivid dance series.

"I was choreographing my piece at the time and I was like, 'yeah, that's so true.' But we do have anger, we do have aggression… it's definitely part of our lives."

Rea has been working on the piece for more than a year now, which she says was inspired by all the strong women in her life, especially her late grandmother.

"My grandmother survived the Second World War in Estonia and Germany. They beat down the door and grabbed her husband out of bed and she never saw him again." Her grandmother was pregnant at the time and went into labour on the train to her parents' house.

"They couldn't stop the train, so they slowed down and had her step out. She had the baby in a field. She was someone who was very fiery, and a bit crazy because of all the experiences she went through, but she had such a huge heart and a lot of the pieces are inspired by her."

IRE focuses on the lives of six women ranging in age from early 20s to late 40s. Each character deals with different types of aggression, both positive and negative, such as the frustration that comes with having kids or going through immigration.

"Johanna Bergfeldt, [one of the dancers], was going through the immigration process last year and we choreographed a piece for her about her frustration with all the paperwork," says Rea.

"The audience won't know that, though, because I placed it in a piece where the crowd will see a woman who's just really frustrated and pissed off about life."

Including the dancers' personal experiences into the production was important for Rea. She says the more input her cast has, the more sincere the dance becomes.

"There's a naturalness to it," she says. "It's almost like letting the audience have a view of an intimate part of a woman's life in family and relationships. The more my hands are off, the more it's really opening a window [for the audience] to see in."

Rea's dancers are appreciative of her hands-off approach. Anna Finkel, the youngest dancer in the play at 22, was able to incorporate her own experiences in her role, which allowed her to really connect with her performance.

"It feels very real," she says. "I feel like I'm expressing how I actually feel about something that's quite deep and comes from quite a deep place."

What's also unique about this production is the performers' diverse age range and experiences. Finkel graduated from the School of Toronto Dance Theatre in 2005, while Karen Kacja is an experienced, well-known dancer.

"Dance is such a youth-oriented profession, so it's a rare thing to use such an age range," says Rea. "But it really lets me show different points in a woman's life, as women have different experiences."

The age disparity also allowed Finkel to get up close and personal with talented professionals.

"It was a little intimidating for sure, especially because I was straight out of school, but it's a very supportive environment and a great group. There was a lot of observing on my side, watching how the older dancers took in information from Kathleen [Rea] and how different the environment was from school," says Finkel.

By now she's well acquainted with her dance mates and she's eager to see how the audience will react to six strong women showing their edgier sides.

"I'm not sure how the audience will react," she says. "For me, I know that in each section I'm in a completely different emotional state, so I can image that when it all comes to putting it together in a really, full-energy kind of way, that it will be an intense emotional rollercoaster for me, and I presume, the audience as well."

IRE runs from July 12 to 15 at 8:30 pm at Toronto's Winchester Street Theatre. Tickets are $16 in advance or $20 cash only at the door. Students, seniors, $14. Advance tickets are being sold through the St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts box office, 416-366-7723.

Israel & the Jewish World

Israel Briefs

Woman to head seminary

Einat Ramon, the first Israeli woman to be ordained a rabbi, has been named dean of the Schechter Rabbinical Seminary in Israel. A graduate of the Jewish Theological Seminary, she becomes the first woman to head a Conservative/Masorti rabbinical school. She's also been an advocate for Masorti's struggle for recognition in Israel and for women's status in the movement.

Civil marriage bill defeated

The Knesset rejected a bill that would have allowed civil unions. The bill, proposed by MK Yuri Shtern of Yisrael Beiteinu, was defeated July 5 in a 63-13 vote. The bill would have let Israelis circumvent religious authorities by entering a "couple covenant." Some 300,000 immigrants are barred from marrying by Israel's rabbinical courts because they're not Jewish under Jewish law and thus can't have a Jewish wedding. Justice Minister Haim Ramon said he'll come up with a new proposal to address the problem.

New missile being developed

The Israeli Air Force plans to begin using a new missile in Gaza designed to better target terrorists and reduce civilians injuries in densely populated urban areas. A high-ranking officer involved in the missile's development told the Jerusalem Post that the new weapon will reduce the number of innocent Palestinian casualties. "We want to increase our accuracy in targeting those we are out to hit while at the same time ensuring the safety of those Palestinians not involved in terrorism," he said.

Arab named envoy to Greece

Ali Yihye was named Israel's ambassador to Greece last week. Yihye, the first-ever Israeli Arab ambassador, served in this capacity in Helsinki from 1995 to 1999.

Ram becomes Israel's first Grand Slam winner

By MIRAY CHESKES-GRANOVSKY
Special to The CJN

LONDON — Israeli tennis star Andy Ram and his Russian partner, Vera Zvonareva, captured the mixed doubles title at Wimbledon, defeating Americans Bob Bryan and Venus Williams, 6-3, 6-2. Ram's historic victory marks the first senior Grand Slam title ever won by an Israeli.

With his trademark smile, Ram dominated the court and left his opponents struggling to find an effective strategy of play against him. With a spectacular mix of serves and net volleys, Ram and Zvonareva broke Williams' serve in the fourth game of the first set and then broke Bryan's serve twice in the second set.

Bryan, who had won the men's doubles title with twin brother Mike just an hour earlier, was the weaker link on his team. Ram and Zvonareva cinched the title with an ace by Zvonareva on championship point. The match was completed in only 55 minutes. The winners share a purse of about $186,000 (Cdn) for their title win.

Ram and Zvonareva, seeded ninth at Wimbledon, won the title just hours after their triumph over third-seeded Zimbabwean siblings Wayne and Cara Black, 6-3, 7-6 (5). Ram and Zvonareva also quashed legendary tennis star Martina Navratilova's hopes for a win at her final Wimbledon appearance. The 49-year-old tennis great and partner Mark Knowles lost 7-5, 6-1 to Ram and Zvonareva in the third round.

It was Ram's second appearance in Wimbledon's mixed doubles finals. Ironically, in 2003 Ram and former partner Anastassia Rodionova lost to Navratilova and partner Leander Paes. Ram and Zvonareva are a recent mixed doubles pairing – they began playing together at this year's French Open, where they reached the semi-finals.

Prior to Wimbledon, the outlook appeared promising for other Israeli players. Shahar Peer, Israel's fast-rising women's singles star, was seeded 20th and had generated a lot of excitement with her solid game and recent displays of fortitude on the court. The BBC mentioned Peer as a longshot to win the tennis world's most prestigious event of the year.

Ram and Jonathan Erlich were seeded fifth in men's doubles after winning at the Red Letter Days Open in Nottingham, a tune-up event for Wimbledon at the end of June.

Sport's unpredictability reigned, however, and Peer's hopes at Wimbledon were dashed early. Feeling confident after a 6-2, 6-1 win over Yuliana Fedek of Ukraine, Peer lost to Shuai Peng of China in the second round. Peng, a powerful player ranked 46th coming into Wimbledon, played well and made very few errors in the first set.

Peer lost five straight points, giving Peng the lead and a first-set win of 6-4. At 4-4 in the second set, Peng stepped up her game. Peer slipped at the baseline, leaving the game to Peng at 6-5, and the set went into a tiebreaker. At 4-0 for Peng, Peer rallied back and brought the score to 5-4. Peng won the tie break, 7-5, with a final score of 7-6 for the set, ousting Peer from Wimbledon's singles play. The capacity crowd at Court 13 appreciated the close match and cheered enthusiastically for Peer as she exited the court.

After the match, Peer said she was really disappointed and hated to lose. "Next time it will be better. Losses are part of sport," Peer said. "It's hard to deal with disappointment. I take losses pretty hard."

Peer said she played her typical game and that it was just a good match. She hasn't played many matches on grass and said she finds it hard to mix her shots. She is also working hard on her serve, which she feels is much stronger.

She added that she's looking forward to her future in tennis and excited that Adam Peterson, Lindsay Davenport's former coach, has agreed to take her on.

"I can play on grass. For next year it will be better," Peer said.

To gain more experience on grass, she continued at Wimbledon in ladies' doubles and mixed doubles. She and Marion Bartoli of France were defeated in the second round by Virginia Ruano Pascual and Paola Suarez, 6-4, 6-1. In mixed doubles Peer and partner Kevin Ullyett of Zimbabwe were also eliminated in the second round, 6-3, 6-4, by Wesley Moodie and Vera Dushevina.

The 2003 Wimbledon semi-final appearance by Erlich and Ram was not to be repeated this year. They lost in the third round to the 11th seeded Czech team of Lukas Dlouhy and Pavel Vizner, 7-6 (7-4), 6-4, 4-6, 7-6 (7-5). The loss came after a difficult second-round match with Americans Wayne Arthurs and Justin Gimelstob, in which the Israelis prevailed, 7-5, 6-3, 3-6, 7-6 (8-6).

The only other Israeli player at Wimbledon was Anna Smashnova, who was ranked 42nd coming into Wimbledon. She had the misfortune of facing fourth-seeded Maria Sharapova in the first round and was thrashed by her, 6-2, 6-0. Noam Okun, Amir Hadad, Dudi Sela and Tzipi Obziler failed in their respective attempts to qualify for Wimbledon.

Slugger gets U.S. stamp of approval

NEW YORK — Jewish baseball star Hank Greenberg is among four former sluggers who will be depicted on a series of U.S. stamps.

The 39-cent stamps of Greenberg, Roy Campanella, Mel Ott and Mickey Mantle will be unveiled July 15 at Yankee Stadium. Greenberg, who is in baseball's Hall of Fame, was the first modern Jewish baseball hero in the 1930s and 1940s.

He was twice named MVP during his career, which was mainly spent with the Detroit Tigers.

Itching to get engaged?

Why do people get engaged?

I'd like to think it's because they love each other so much that they can't imagine living with anyone else. But as I turn away from the soap opera fantasy world of the Bold and the Beautiful and look at the people I know who are trampling over themselves to get to the chupah, I have to wonder whether the reason is as romantic as the idea.

Sandie Benitah
20Something

My boss, for instance, told me that he got married for "tax purposes."

"What?" he asked innocently as I walked out of his office, open-mouthed and appalled at his indifference toward the sanctity of lifelong commitment.

"It was cheaper for the both of us!" he yelled after me.

For people who are in their 20s, I suspect the reasoning is a little different, though just as dishearteningly unromantic. And I am the first to admit my guilt.

It's hard not to want to get engaged. There's a big party in your honour, you get to buy a new dress, and, hey, I could definitely use some new appliances in my rinky-dink apartment – and that's just for the engagement party!

Also, it seems like the logical next step, doesn't it? My boyfriend and I have been together for quite a while now, and I often wonder, "What now?"

But lately I've found that I'm looking so much at the future that I never stop to look at the here and now.

My current relationship is going great and I have nothing to complain about, but is that it? Gosh, I think I want to get engaged because I'm bored.

What's happened to me?

Of all my friends, I was the first to caution the girls against getting hitched early. I thought I'd want to enjoy singledom until the very last moment, or at least until I got a peek of my first grey hair.

To be honest, it wasn't even so much the partying that I savoured. I have divorced parents, and nothing is more important to me than making sure that when it comes to tying the knot, it's for life. Because of that, I was always adamant that I would never commit until I was 100 per cent sure.

But now, just about a year after I wrote a column in The CJN mocking all my engaged friends, here I am thinking that getting engaged might not be so bad after all.

And so, I popped the question to my boyfriend.

"Do you think people get engaged because they can't live without each other or because it's just the right time in their life?" I asked. "Do you think you just get engaged to the person you're with at the moment you're ready to be engaged, or do you think who you're with determines when you're ready?"

Always the diplomat, he said, "A combination of both."

It was a completely unromantic answer, but I knew it was the truth.

Getting engaged has become so routine, so expected, that it's more like upgrading to DVD from VHS than an exclamation of undying love.

I no longer long to be engaged, not because I'm not in love – because I am. But if I'm going to get engaged, I want it to be completely inconvenient for me to do so. I don't want to do it because it's the right time, and I don't just want it to be the traditional next step in a relationship.

I want to do it for no other reason than for what an engagement is meant to be a declaration of love and commitment, not only in the best of times, but most importantly in the worst of times.

And for that, I don't mind waiting forever.

Caramelized Onions With BBQ Sauce

2 tblsp olive oil
2 lg onions, cut into 1/8"inch slices
1/4 tsp salt
1/8 tsp ground black pepper
1/3 c canned beef broth
1/2 c purchased BBQ sauce
1 1/2 tblsp apple cider vinegar or white vinegar

Heat oil in large skillet over medium-high heat. Add onions, salt and pepper; cook until onions begin to brown, stirring frequently, about 8 mins. Add broth, BBQ sauce and vinegar. Reduce heat to medium; simmer until sauce thickens, stirring occasionally, about 15 mins. (Can be made 1 day ahead. Cover; chill. Rewarm before serving.)

About Life

Dear Ella,

Now that school is over, our problems are just beginning. We have a 17-year-old teenage boy who thinks he knows it all.

Josh is bright, handsome, popular and lazy. He gets by doing as little as possible. I know this is partially our fault. We never forced him to work through his teenage years or have any household responsibilities. We always felt his studies came first and that he deserved a break when he had any time off. We provide him with whatever he wants. He has a stereo, the latest fashions and a car at his disposal. He comes and goes as he pleases, and on weekends he can easily sleep till 3 p.m. Not only does he not appreciate any of this, he expects it. I don't know what to do to make him understand that working through the summer would be a huge benefit to him.

What Have We Done?
Dear What Have We Done?

You have instilled these habits in Josh over his lifetime. It's not surprising that he feels entitled to all these things, since he knows no differently.

You can't quickly undo a lifetime of lessons, but you have to start now. I know that everything you did and still do for him is because you love him so much. However, sometimes love means you have to be tough. Sometimes love does not come with immediate gratification. Just because you lay down rules and expectations does not mean that you don't love him. Yes, it's harder to enforce rules that he prefers not to follow, but that's your job as parents.

As long as Josh lives under your roof, you have the right to expect and demand that he contribute to the household. He needs responsibilities and to see what the real world is like.

He will learn how to behave in a working environment when he is not the centre of the universe. He'll need to deal with customers, co-workers and bosses. He will learn how good it feels to do something on his own and be compensated for it.

As the saying goes, "If you give a man a fish, you feed him for a day. If you teach a man to fish, you feed him for a lifetime." Your job is to teach Josh to fish and your reward will come way down the line when he is a successful, well-rounded adult you can be proud of.

Saving a life

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Judaism holds that if you save a life, it's as if you've saved the entire world.

One interpretation of this talmudic idea is that since one life has been saved, millions of the survivor's progeny can be born in the future.

URBAN WRITER

Have you ever saved a life? Recently, I asked this question of some students at the Toronto Heschel School. Two of them had saved a little brother or sister, and a few others had been saved by a sibling – domestic rescues.

I once saved the life of a Mexican man who was drowning in the Pacific Ocean. Having done so, I've always felt like a member of a special group, because the act of returning a breath to this person felt like sharing an event with God.

One day in 1988, I was in Mazatlan, Mexico. A soft wind blowing through my balcony doors and the sound of ocean waves woke me up at 7 a.m. I jumped out of bed, pulled on my clothes, grabbed my backpack and ambled down to the boardwalk.

As I arrived at a natural viewing area with massive boulders and rocks, I looked out at the water and noticed a man wading into it. Soon, I could see him bobbing up and down and waving to me. I waved back, thinking, "What a friendly country."

Then he stopped bobbing and waving. He was drowning. For the next three or four seconds, I considered the danger facing me. After some debate, I convinced myself that I needed to jump into the ocean to save this man's life (simply because the moment called for it). I tore off my shirt, threw down my backpack and dove into the chilly Pacific.

It wasn't long before I reached the distressed man. Despite the fact it had been two decades since I learned lifesaving techniques at Camp Gan Yisrael, I remembered how to stabilize a swimmer and then flip him over so I could reach around his chest and swim to shore with him.

By the time I was at arm's length from the man, it was obvious that he was unconscious and that I would need to pull his head out of the water. I did so, going through the proper lifesaving procedures. Then I swam to dry land and hoisted the heavyset man up onto the jagged rocks.

I hugged him to keep him warm and administered first aid. This man whom I did not know began to spit up blood and regain consciousness. His eyes conveyed a feeling of utter terror, likely because he knew he had just tasted death. He couldn't speak English, and as much as I tried to understand his explanation as to what had just happened to him, his Spanish was Greek to me.

I picked up my shirt and backpack and walked the stranger to a nearby army clinic. Then I shook his hand and wished him well in my broken Spanish. I returned to my hotel, shocked. I wrote in my journal, "What does one do for the rest of the day after saving a man's life first thing in the morning." It was 8 a.m.

Imagine: I will never see this man again and likely would not recognize him if I passed him on the street. Yet our connection, in some ways, is different from those I have with everyone else I know. I saved Mr. Mazatlan's life, and because of him, I have experienced something I could never pretend to know otherwise. It was thoroughly otherworldly – a type of birthing.

If you've had your own experience saving a life, e-mail me. I'd love to hear from other members of our unique club.

Israel at war on two fronts

By DAVID HOROVITZ
Jerusalem Post

There can be no illusions: Israel is at war.

A tactical failure by the Israel Defence Forces on the Gaza border last month prompted a drastic escalation on that front. Last Wednesday's still graver tactical blow in the north by Hezbollah has now led to a confrontation affecting immense numbers of civilians on either side of the Lebanese border, with the potential to affect other nations as well.

Federations establish emergency funds

Please see page 25

There are those who have branded this latest conflict a continuation of Israel's War of Independence, and there is no little truth in the assertion. On both of the fronts on which Israel has been drawn into heavy fighting, its enemies can make no legitimate claim to be pursuing a territorial dispute: as of last summer, Israel relinquished its hold on the Gaza Strip; in Lebanon, it pulled back to the UN-certified international border six years ago.

Except that, in both cases, the Jewish state's assailants are indeed pursuing a territorial ambition – to unseat Israel from its own sovereign lands.

Israel has watched Hezbollah build up its offensive capability in the years since the security zone was dismantled – watched it, ever bolder, establishing its positions up against the border fence and saw it developing its missile capability – and chose not to act. That stance was misinterpreted as weakness.

Wednesday morning's cross-border attack, complete with the barrage of shelling and rocket fire that served as cover, highlighted the IDF's intolerable absence of room for manoeuvring in such circumstances. And an Israeli government with a defence minister who had genuinely hoped to oversee a return to the peace path was obligated to militarily "change the rules of the game."

Analysis

Hezbollah is a wily and well-prepared enemy, all too demonstrably capable of wreaking a degree of havoc in northern Israel and beyond.

Israeli forces, right, mobilized last week on the border with Lebanon after Hezbollah fighters crossed into Israel and killed eight soldiers and kidnapped two others. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert called the attack "an act of war" and held the government of Lebanon responsible. He instructed the army to retrieve the missing soldiers and secure Israel against further Hezbollah attacks, such as rocket barrages on the northern coastal town of Nahariya, above. [Isranet photos]

The goal of dismantling its offensive capacity will not be easily achieved. Last Thursday's air onslaught certainly affected Lebanon's civilian infrastructure, but it is less clear how deeply Hezbollah was harmed.

Still, in contrast to the asymmetrical struggles against terror cells and Qassam rocket crews, the IDF has now been unleashed in a context in which it can expect to use more of its strengths. And woe betide a nation under attack inside its sovereign borders if it does not decisively prevail.

The News in Brief

CANADA

$2 Million To Haifa U

TORONTO — Canadian businessman Michael Dan has donated $2 million to doctoral students at the University of Haifa in honour of his recent marriage. Dan created the Amira Dan Doctoral Fund in in the name of his new bride, a doctoral student at Toronto's York University.

Condolences Sent

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress has sent condolences to India's High Commissioner to Canada for the deaths in the July 11 terror attacks on Mumbai's commuter trains. CJC president Ed Morgan said that " the Jewish community of Canada grieves with our Indo-Canadian friends and neighbours here at home who have been touched by this terrible tragedy and we stand in solidarity with them against the scourge of international terrorism."

WORLD

Victims Recalled

LONDON — An art exhibit is featuring the work of one of the Jewish victims of last year's London bombings. The exhibit of Miriam Hyman's work is on display at London's City Hall. Hyman, a photo editor and artist, was one of three Jews killed in the July 7, 2005, suicide bombings. Two other Jews, Anat Rosenberg and Susan Levy, also died in the bombings, which killed 52 people. An interfaith concert was held July 7 in Hyman's memory at the South London Liberal Synagogue, one of many ceremonies in the city for the victims.

Camp Breaks Ground

PITTSBURGH — The Reconstructionist movement has dedicated its first permanent summer camp site. Camp JRF was dedicated July 9 in Pennsylvania's Pocono Mountains. It's open to boys and girls entering grades 3 to 12. It runs two sessions that combined last for 6½ weeks, and a 12-day mini-camp for kids entering grades 4 and 5.

Nazis Burn Book

BERLIN — Neo-Nazis burned a copy of The Diary of Anne Frank at a late-June summer solstice festival in Pretzien, in the former East Germany. Berlin's Anne Frank Centre and local religious and political groups have started educational programs in response. "I have never heard of anybody burning the diary," centre director Thomas Heppener said. "For us it's new that they take two symbols of the Nazi past, book burning and the diary, and bring them together." Three suspects have been arrested. Some 200 of Pretzien's 1,000 residents attended a meeting last week on the incident.

Jews Welcomed Back

WASHINGTON — Georgia's president welcomed the return of 700 Jewish families from Israel. Mikhail Saakashvili said 85,000 Georgians living abroad returned home in 2005, signaling an upturn in the former Soviet republic's economy and freedoms. Speaking July 5 at the American Enterprise Institute in Washington, D.C., he said it was "good news" the returnees were ethnically diverse. He said an Israeli chief rabbi told him with regret about the Jews leaving Israel for Georgia. "Of course, Israel also doesn't want to lose population, and I fully understand and share that. But I was very, very pleased," Saakashvili said.

Call For Nominations

NEW YORK — Nominations for the 2007 Charles Bronfman Prize will be accepted from Aug. 1 to Oct. 31, its funders announced last week. Created in 2004 by philanthropist Charles Bronfman's children to mark his 70th birthday, the $100,000 (US) award "celebrates the vision and talent of an individual or team" under age 50 "whose humanitarian work has contributed significantly to the betterment of the world," its website says. #### White Supremacist Gets 9 Months in Jail

OTTAWA — A London, Ont., skinhead was sentenced to nine months in jail last week for posting racist Internet messages despite a Federal Court order not to do so.

The court found Tomasz Winnicki posted 30 hate screeds on U.S. neo-Nazi sites between October and April, claiming the Holocaust was a hoax and that non-whites are criminally minded and intellectually inferior, Sun Media reported. In 2003, Ottawa lawyer Richard Warman filed a complaint against Winnicki with the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal. It heard the case last August. In October, Winnicki was ordered not to post more messages until the tribunal ruled.

This past April, the tribunal ruled that Winnicki had violated the Canadian Human Rights Act for posting hate. He faces another contempt hearing next month for posting messages after the April decision. He's also scheduled to appear in court in Toronto on criminal charges after weapons were found in a car that was headed to a neo-Nazi rally.

Red Buttons Dies at 87

LOS ANGELES — Red Buttons, the Catskills cut-up who earned Oscar respect for his performance as a lovelorn serviceman, died July 13 at 87 of vascular disease at his Los Angeles home. Buttons, born Aaron Chwatt in New York, stood out with his bright red hair and diminutive stature. He once called himself "the only Yiddish leprechaun." Buttons graduated from the Catskills and burlesque circuit to Broadway when he was drafted in 1943. Hollywood noticed his 1944 performance in Winged Victory, a propaganda film, and he was signed by CBS in 1952 to compete with NBC's Milton Berle. He won best supporting actor in 1957's Sayonara, playing Sgt. Joe Kelly, who kills himself when U.S. forces in Japan force him to abandon his Japanese love.

Dreyfus Remembered

PARIS — France marked the 100th anniversary of the rehabilitation of Capt. Alfred Dreyfus. The July 12 ceremony was led by President Jacques Chirac at the École Militaire, where Dreyfus was stripped of his military honours in 1895. A high-ranking Jewish officer in the French army, Dreyfus was falsely accused of selling military secrets to Germany. His trial convinced journalist Theodor Herzl that Jews would never achieve equality in Europe and led him to start the Zionist movement.

Canadian Jews rally for Shalit's release

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A hastily arranged rally brought close to 150 people to the Syrian embassy in Ottawa last week to plead for the release of abducted Israeli soldier Cpl. Gilad Shalit.

The July 10 rally, sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC,) the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Montreal's Federation CJA was one of a number of similar protests being held the same day outside Syrian embassies around the world. Their goal was to exert pressure on the regime of President Bashar Assad to use its influence with Hamas leaders to release Shalit, 19, who was kidnapped June 25.

CJC national president Ed Morgan addressed the Ottawa crowd. "We are here to ask the Syrians to please use whatever influence that they have with the Hamas leadership… everybody in this region has a right to live in peace, free from the fear of being kidnapped," Morgan said. "It is the Syrians that hold the key to this… we all ask them to see to it that Cpl. Shalit is freed."

The protesters, peacefully assembled across the street from the Syrian embassy, held Israeli flags and signs urging the soldier's release. Led by Rabbi Reuven Bulka, they chanted "Free Gilad Shalit."

"Our job today is to send a message," Rabbi Bulka said. "OK. Do you hear the message up there?" he asked, pointing his megaphone at the building that houses the Syrian embassy.

Bulka read a statement from Shalit's parents that was addressed to their son. It urged him to be strong and said that they love him and are waiting for him to return.

"We here in Canada will not rest until Gilad Shalit is released," Rabbi Bulka said. "We don't know where Gilad Shalit is, but we know who is responsible for where he is and we know who can get him out. We implore that Syria stop being a haven for 'terrorism international.'"

Rabbi Bulka then led protesters in reciting psalms and in singing Am Yisrael Chai.

In Toronto, a community-wide prayer vigil for Shalit's safe return was scheduled to be held Friday, July 14, at noon at the Consulate General of Israel, 180 Bloor St. W. The rally was being spearheaded by Jewish and Christian leaders in conjunction with the group Mothers for Missing MIAs.

The protest was scheduled to demand the safe return of Shalit and of all Israeli MIAs, and it will also honour the memory of murdered Israeli Lieut. Hanan Barak, Sgt. Pavel Slutsker and West Bank resident Eliyahu Asheri and call for an end to terrorism.

This event was to be co-sponsored by B'nai Brith Canada, the Canada Christian College, Friends of Eli Cohen, Mothers of Missing MIAs and Shaarei Tefillah Congregation.

An emergency is upon us

From the editor's desk

The events of the past three weeks have made it painfully clear that a new breed of enemy has arisen against the Jewish people and is now aligning itself in its various hostile configurations and flanks against the Jewish state.

Most diplomats, historians, politicians, scholars, and especially Israelis had always assumed that there would ultimately be a reasonable, mutually dignified resolution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, in the same manner and according to the same laws of time and human nature by which most territorial conflicts have been resolved across the long span of history.

For they regarded the conflict as, essentially, a dispute over territory, which reasonable people, over time, could solve with reasonable solutions. The intransigent unwillingness of the Arab states for so many years to recognize Israel's right to exist as a sovereign Jewish state was generally viewed by most Israelis as a bargaining tactic, not as a deeply embedded article of faith. The fact that Egypt and Jordan, once unremittingly harsh foes of Israel, eventually signed peace treaties with the Jewish state, proved in the minds of the many hopeful seekers and dreamers of peace that more-or-less normal relations could exist between former warring foes.

Whether the conflict was ever only over territory alone is now an idle and irrelevant speculation. Because there is no doubt whatsoever that the conflict today is decidedly not about territory.

It is now about religion, specifically extremist Muslims' unwillingness to accept the presence of a sovereign Jewish state in their "Islamic" Middle East.

Today's front-line enemies and combatants against Israel are Hamas, Hezbollah, Islamic Jihad and, to some extent, Al Qaeda, whose operatives have tried to infiltrate the West Bank and Gaza. Each group believes, as a matter of religious doctrine, that the Jewish state must be wiped off the map. Unfortunately and very ominously, it is also a doctrinal principle zealously followed by the leaders of Iran.

As a dire result, the Islamist terrorist organizations have the backing of a patron state that encourages, funds and supports them in their malicious program of annihilation and extermination.

Yossi Klein Halevi has aptly referred to this new breed of enemy as genocidal Islamists.

Two weeks after Hamas attacked the Kerem Shalom outpost in the Negev from Gaza, killing two Israeli soldiers and kidnapping Gilad Shalit, Hezbollah attacked Israel's northern border from Lebanon, killing eight soldiers and kidnapping reservists Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev.

Israel was neither in Gaza nor Lebanon at the time. The attackers' objective, therefore, was not to rid Gaza or Lebanon of Jews, but rather to rid Israel of Jews.

One can negotiate a compromise over territory, but one cannot negotiate a compromise over one's very right to exist and to live.

As of this writing, katyusha rockets have struck all along the north of Israel, including for the first time in Haifa.

Israel will fight this new alignment of Islamic enemies as they have fought all their enemies in the past: with one overriding, single-minded purpose, namely, to protect Jewish life and soul.

The communiqué issued by the government of Israel after the emergency deliberation of the cabinet last Wednesday made reference to the new alignment of forces arrayed against it and to Israel's determination to fight them. The following is an excerpt.

"This action [the Hezbollah attack against Israel] along with the events of the past month, creates a new and complex reality that compels us to deal with it. Today's attack... is the product of those who perpetrate terrorism and those who give it shelter.

"[T]here is no doubt that Hezbollah, a terrorist organization operating inside Lebanon, initiated and perpetrated today's action. Israel will act against it in a manner required by its actions.

"Israel must respond with the necessary severity to this act of aggression and it will indeed do so. Israel will respond aggressively and harshly to those who carried out, and are responsible for, today's action, and will work to foil actions and efforts directed against it.

"The international community understands that every country, including Israel, must act aggressively against enemy targets such as Hezbollah.

"The new reality in which the State of Israel is operating requires special readiness especially in light of the possibility that the enemy will seek to attack the home front."

An emergency is now upon the Jewish people. We must gather our resolve and mobilize our courage and our energies – wherever we live – to join in defence of the right of Jews to have one very small sovereign Jewish state of our own on this vast and mostly beautiful earth.

Rabbi seeks more interdenominational dialogue

'It's a little bit of a dance' that 'takes time to mature'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, senior rabbi of the Conservative movement's Beth Tzedec Congregation, is a strong proponent of dialogue among his Orthodox and non-Orthodox colleagues.

Such dialogue, however, is a delicate issue. While Orthodoxy has moved to the right, many Conservative synagogues have veered left – opening the doors to increased ritual participation by women, for example – in the process widening the gap between traditional Conservative Judaism and the more liberal sector of the Orthodox community.

In a recent Beth Tzedec bulletin, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl wrote that he has been "disappointed by recent public expressions of disagreement between the Orthodox rabbinate and the Conservative/Reform rabbis of Toronto.

"Whether this takes the form of divergent views about the participation of female voices of song in the community Yom Hashoah commemoration, or by the unwillingness of some elements of the Orthodox community to enter Conservative synagogues, I feel that such confrontation weakens our community and diminishes our capacity to work together on the serious challenges we all face regarding the retention of young Jews and the creative revitalization of Jewish life and commitment," he wrote.

The rabbi also mentioned that he has taken part in private, small-scale dialogue projects and that he hoped to initiate private and public dialogues in the year ahead.

But it's a simpler matter for him than for his Orthodox counterparts.

"What's essential to understand is that for Orthodox rabbis it's very important that the dialogue go on in a quiet way, a non-public way," he told The CJN.

"Anything that grants the perception that multiple denominations are equally legitimate is problematic," said Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, secretary of the Va'ad Harabonim's beis din and spiritual leader of Kehillat Shaarei Torah, a modern Orthodox congregation.

"That doesn't mean that Orthodox rabbis would look at non-Orthodox rabbis as being not sincere, not religious or not serving their communities. However, their approach to Judaism cannot be supported.

"It's a little bit of a dance... The sensitivity is the context... and the purpose."

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said there are "small things going on.

"In many ways it's still premature to talk about," he said. "Part of what's essential in any kind of dialogue to promote a deeper understanding is that it takes a long time to mature. It's not results oriented... The intent is more to understand each other."

The controversy over female singers at this year's community Yom Hashoah commemoration was not an isolated incident. The Toronto Board of Rabbis, whose members are mostly non-Orthodox rabbis, said it wouldn't participate in or endorse the Yom Hashoah event after organizers decided the full Renanim Youth Choir couldn't sing at the event because the group includes girls.

Kashrut has also been an issue. The Toronto-based Kashruth Council of Canada (COR) tightened its regulations recently, requiring kosher caterers and restaurant owners to have, and thus pay for, more hours of supervision and closer scrutiny of some vegetables by kashrut supervisors.

"In the traditional, but not Orthodox community, who want kosher, we have to be careful that we don't outprice kashrut," said Rabbi Philip Scheim of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

"The significant number of kosher consumers are moderate Orthodox, Conservative and Reform Jews," said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl. "They want to keep kosher and are supportive of kashrut... At the same time, they're very concerned with what is perceived as excessive stringencies."

The "moderate elements of kashrut" must also be accommodated, he said.

Rabbi Daniel Gottlieb, immediate past president of the TBR, made a similar comment before Yom Hashoah when he stated that the commemoration did not reflect the community, because the mixed choir could not participate.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said some TBR members, as well as others, "might have wished that the results were different."

In many cases, he noted, "you don't just vote for a conclusion. You vote hoping that a clear position will move everybody toward compromise."

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem plan to bring together the parties involved – most notably, the TBR and Toronto's Va'ad Harabonim – later this summer to reach "some form of resolution if it is possible," said Louis Greenbaum, co-chair of the Yom Hashoah event.

TBR president Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich said the community has become increasingly polarized. "My hope is that we've kind of touched the precipice and we're pulling ourselves back."

Morris Zbar, a senior vice-president of the federation, said the organization is committed to a community event. "Hopefully we can work something out."

Camp Robin Hood celebrates 60 years

MARKHAM, Ont. — Camp Robin Hood, the oldest privately established day camp in Canada, is celebrating its 60th anniversary by hosting a day of fun on Sunday, July 30.

To celebrate this milestone, Camp Robin Hood will open its doors between 10:30 a.m. and 4:30 p.m. to welcome current and past camp families, as well as staff alumni, for a day of camp fun. Guests will have the opportunity to participate in the kinds of activities that have made Robin Hood the summer camp destination for thousands of children since 1946.

In addition, guests will be entertained by the Duffel Bag Theatre Troupe, which will perform the play Robin Hood. Guests can bring a lunch or take part in a barbecue, with all proceeds going to Summer Dreams, a registered charitable foundation that helps underprivileged children attend summer camp who would not otherwise have the opportunity to do so.

Summer Dreams was formed in 1995 – in honour of Camp Robin Hood's 50th anniversary – by a group of past and present staff and campers, who wanted to offer others the same rich experience camp provided them. Since its inception, Summer Dreams has raised over $200,000, which has helped more than 300 children attend camps in Ontario.

Family owned and operated for the past 45 years, Camp Robin Hood, a member of Robin Hood Camps, is an accredited member of the Ontario Camping Association. On its 55 acres in Markham, Ont., it is dedicated to providing summer fun and lifelong memories for campers (ages three to 15) and their families, as well as its dedicated and highly professional staff.

The Robin Hood Camps family includes Robin Hood Sports Academy, S.A.C. Summer Camps, Madawaska Camps, Camp Walden, Camp Robin Hood and Roger Neilson's Hockey Camp.

Israel chooses to live

The attack by Hezbollah across Israel's northern border last week was not a spontaneous, reflexive act of copycat terrorism that mimicked the Hamas attack two weeks earlier across Israel's southern border. It was a carefully planned, long-practiced complex operation. And it was undoubtedly executed with the full prior knowledge, if not actual direction by Hezbollah's masters in Iran and Syria.

Hezbollah has amassed some 10,000, mostly Iranian manufactured, rockets along the Lebanese border with Israel. They are being launched even now, against Safed, Nahariya and even Haifa. As of this writing two Israelis have been killed in those strikes and more than 100 injured. Hamas, of course, has been launching Qassam rockets into the Negev from the very first days after Israel unilaterally withdrew from the Gaza Strip.

In response to both attacks, Israel mobilized its defence forces on two fronts and is now fighting a war to seek and destroy the terrorists' rocket capabilities and to try to retrieve its kidnapped soldiers.

We note with appreciation and high commendation the morally correct expression of support offered by Prime Minister Stephen Harper for Israel's military response. "Israel has the right to defend itself. The onus is on the other side," Harper said. U.S. President George W. Bush also backed Israel's right to defend itself and denounced Hezbollah as "a group of terrorists who want to stop the advance of peace." The European Union, on the other hand, criticized Israel for using what it called "disproportionate" force.

The government and people of Lebanon have a choice. They can expel Hezbollah, Iran and Syria's terrorist proxies in the south and regain sovereign control over their own country, or, they can surrender their fate and their existence as a free, independent people to the extremist Iranian and Syrian regimes.

The Palestinian people have a choice, too. They can reject the virulent anti-Jewish ideology of Hamas, the Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades and Islamic Jihad, or they can doom yet another generation of their children to a life of misery and unfulfilled national aspirations.

And the western governments also have a choice. They can fight the increasing menace of global jihadist terrorism, or they can close their eyes to it. They can coalesce behind the urgent common cause of stopping Iran's dangerous drive for a nuclear device, or they can hope, futilely, that the Iranian regime will not itself use the technology or distribute it to a willing cadre of terrorist organizations salivating at the chance to strike at western interests, the infidel, non-believers of the democratic world and the Zionist regime. But they must choose before it is too late. The enemies of freedom and of the West are marching.

Israel has already chosen. In accordance with the earliest teachings of the Torah, the Jewish state has chosen to live, to affirm its right to a sovereign existence along with all the other nations of the world. In the defence of one's existence against cruel and conscience-less enemies intent only on your annihilation, no force is "disproportionate."

25 years ago in The CJN

A ceasefire ended 16 days of shelling along the Israel-Lebanon border, but a radical PLO faction warned that it would continue military action. Israeli Maj.-Gen. Avigdor Ben-Gal, commander of Israel's forces in the area, said he was concerned the PLO would use the ceasefire as an opportunity to re-arm.

Church doesn't support 'Israel boycott'

With regard to the article "United Church supports Israel boycott," (CJN, July 6) the United Church does not support the "Israel boycott" as outlined by the Canadian Union of Public Employees' Ontario branch and Sid Ryan. The support came not from the Toronto Conference but rather from a committee of six or seven people. The Toronto Conference decision of three years ago, which only passed by a narrow margin, was to boycott five companies that were selling war materials being used in the West Bank and Gaza.

There are a great many of us within the United Church who are actively working to see fairness in the presentation of the issues surrounding a just peace in Israel and Palestine. We have over and over again affirmed the need for Israel to have safe and internationally recognized borders. We have rejected the idea of divestment because it is naive and simplistic and really accomplishes nothing. We disagree with the decision of the committee promoting the implementation of divestment, because it presents Israel as the cause of all the problems, which is completely untrue.

We pray that the ongoing cycle of violence and death will end and that both sides will commit to the finding of a just peace.

Jewish concern for human rights

While in absolute agreement with Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz ("Is it good for the Jews," CJN, July 6) that activist concern for human rights is also "good for the Jews," I deeply regret that he chose to associate the opposite, ethnocentric concept with the "era of Yiddish and chicken shmaltz." His rabbinical education should have made clear that it was precisely the Yiddish secular movements that pioneered global social concerns as part and parcel of modern Jewish culture – and still do. The leading philosopher of secular Jewishness, Khayim Zhitlovski, summed it all up in his famous aphorism: "vos mer yid, alts mer mentsh; vos mer mentsh, alts mer yid" ("The more Jewish one is, the more human; the more human one is, the more Jewish").

'Full picture' isn't unity

In her piece on parshat Balak, Rachael Turkienicz refers to the various views of the Israelites Bilaam the prophet has while standing atop a mountain, at the behest of King Balak ("A prayer for unity," CJN, July 6). Even though Balak's mission for Bilaam is to curse the Israelites, what issues from Bilaam is a blessing. Turkienicz, in her midrashic style, attributes this blessing to the fact that Bilaam finally has a full view rather than a partial view of the Israelites. "He could not help but bless" this so-called "beautiful portrayal of unity."

What Bilaam finally saw was the full picture. This does not necessarily connote unity. Turkienicz glosses her own view of the "full picture" by insisting that this is unity. Furthermore, this sentimentalization of the full picture becomes its own kind of tyranny, by insisting that, as Jews, we may engage in debate only from a platform of unity.

Dismay at immigration seminar

I was dismayed to learn that a Toronto law firm held a seminar on the immigration of Israelis to Canada.

It is needless to say that Israel needs olim from overseas and not the facilitation of emigration of Israelis to Canada.

I hope that Jewish organizations will express their disapproval of this negative activity.

Hilda Weil remembered

The community is saddened by the passing of the gifted educator Hilda Weil ("Longtime teacher was 'loving and caring,'" CJN, July 6). One of Weil's most ardent students was my late mother, Miriam Bohnen, who as a middle-aged homemaker undertook to master modern Hebrew. Attending Weil's classes at Keren Hatarbut was her greatest pleasure, so much so that she would attend morning, afternoon and evening classes for maximum exposure. I was a youngster at the time, but I vividly remember my mother's enthusiastic devotion to her favourite melamedet.

Community's new and brave energy

I thank Avrum Rosensweig for speaking up so eloquently for thoughts that fire through me so many times ("Rediscovering the community's spirit," CJN, June 22). I almost thought I was alone in my longing for the days when my community was "brimming with controversy, creative growth and life." Even his article was begging for creative feedback. I'm looking forward to seeing and experiencing new and brave energy in our Jewish community.

Time for a ground offensive?

By ANSHEL PFEFFER
Jerusalem Post

In the summer of 1993, a joint force of Battalion 13 of the Golani Brigade, on Achzarit armoured fighting vehicles, and the Barak Armoured Brigade, using Merkava tanks, spent three intensive weeks preparing for a widespread operation in southern Lebanon.

The Israel Defence Forces (IDF) was carrying out Operation Accountability, a widespread offensive of artillery and airborne bombardment of Hezbollah bases. The second stage was going to be a major incursion by ground forces – outside the security zone into the thin strip of southern Lebanon occupied by Israel between its pullback from most of Lebanon in 1985 and its final departure in 2000.

The mission's objective was to do what airplanes and long-range shelling couldn't do totally wipe out the main Hezbollah training bases in towns like Jibshit.

In the end, to the disappointment of the highly motivated troops, then-prime minister and defence minister Yitzhak Rabin decided not to activate the ground forces, and the operation was aborted. The fear of high casualties and the desire not to have the Lebanese situation escalate out of control led Rabin to make the decision.

This has been Israel's prevailing strategy over the last two decades – to make do with long-range artillery fire and airborne firepower and not commit large ground forces outside Israel's regular defence borders, which included the security zone up to 2000 and the Gaza Strip until last year's withdrawal.

There were a number of considerations behind this strategy. The trauma of the "Lebanese quagmire" gripped Israeli politicians and generals for years after the 1982 Operation Peace in Galilee, which brought home the limits of Israel's power. It was the first war to be deeply disputed by Israeli society and led to a deep reluctance to embark on larger military adventures.

The intifadahs that began in 1987 and 2000 tied up most of the regular army, and any large-scale operations would have necessitated calling up large reserve forces and caused major damage to the economy. There was also a realization that while air bombings might bring bearable international condemnation, it would be nothing in comparison to the diplomatic pressure Israel would have to withstand if it invaded an Arab country again.

Another political consideration added over the last few years was the desire to deny Hezbollah any excuse to act. Israel's withdrawal from the security zone seemed to end the Shi'ite movement's raison d'être, and Shiekh Hassan Nasrallah has been trying desperately ever since to provoke a conflict that will enable him to avoid international and international pressure to become head of just another Lebanese political party.

Last but not least, attacks from the air have been almost risk-free. Since Ron Arad's Phantom jet went down over Lebanon in 1986, Israel has not lost an aircrew member in a bombing mission. Land operations, as we saw tragically last week, are more likely to result in casualties. For all these reasons, Israel's reactions to Hezbollah provocations have always been relatively limited.

In 2000, then-prime minister and defence minister Ehud Barak refrained from launching a major ground operation when Hezbollah captured three soldiers in an attack similar to that made last Wednesday. And in 1991, on a wider scale, Yitzhak Shamir's government also rejected plans to send an airborne division to capture the H2 and H3 areas in western Iraq, relying instead on U.S. and allied air power to eliminate the Scud launchers firing at Israel.

Over the last few years, the IDF's infantry units, with proud histories of cross-border operations up to the 1980s, have been forced to concentrate solely on low-intensity warfare against Palestinian terrorists. The only major ground offensive of recent years was Operation Defensive Shield in 2002 against terror bases in the Palestinian cities of the West Bank, but even that was merely against enclaves within Israeli-controlled territory, not incursions deep into enemy territory.

Long-term military planning has been in accordance with this policy. There has been less reliance on reserve forces and large ground units, including a planned decommission of brigades, a reduction in the number of tanks and increased spending on the IDF's strategic arm, long-range bombers and submarines. Most reserve units have not trained properly for more than three years and many have not been called up for any kind of duty since the beginning of 2005.

Aside from a few longer-range operations, mainly by special forces, the role of IDF ground forces ever since the pullback to the security zone has essentially been a defensive one. Even over the last three weeks following Cpl. Gilad Shalit's capture by Hamas, most of the units massed around the Gaza Strip have gone only a few kilometers inside in relatively limited force, taken care to avoid built-up areas, and then left after a few days. The prevailing strategy has remained and the IDF has yet to commit a major ground force to combat.

All that may be changing now. Following Hezbollah's attack, Israel is facing two kidnapping situations and emboldened enemies on two fronts, while the situation in the West Bank, where the Paratroopers Brigade have been busy in a low-profile offensive for the last couple of months might also flare up.

The IDF command is pushing for a major offensive on both fronts that will drastically change the rules of play and will mean a widespread operation, including probably dozens of casualties, incurring the wrath of the international community and calling up thousands of reservists, a step that will have widespread implications for the army's long-term plans and the Israeli economy as a whole.

In addition, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has proposed a realignment plan. Many in the government and the IDF believe that such a step is now unavoidable, and that a sharp and painful lesson to Hamas, and especially Hezbollah, is long overdue.

Israel must regain its deterrence that has been severely eroded by the pullbacks from Lebanon and Gaza. Air strikes coupled with rhetoric are no longer enough.

Menachem Begin, together with his defence minister Ariel Sharon, was the last Israeli leader to send thousands of soldiers over Israel's border 24 years ago. The operation that received consensus at the outset turned into a bitter national dispute over the "war of choice," which landed Israel in the Lebanese quagmire.

So far, the retaliation to the Hezbollah attack has been relatively limited on the ground. Special forces backed by a small number of tanks does not a second war with Lebanon make.

It falls now to Olmert and Defence Minister Amir Peretz to decide whether Israel will retake the upper hand by acting forcefully and smashing Hezbollah with the IDF's full might. They are both fully aware that it's much easier to go into Lebanon than to leave and that they might be playing into Nasrallah's hands. Either way, it's an almost impossible choice.

We must support families

I'm not a demographer and I don't usually pay attention to population statistics. Much to the dismay of my demographer friends, I'm bored by the Torah portions that list tribes by numbers. But when I was in Israel last May, I heard a number that made me pay attention.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

One Israeli scholar declared that 75 per cent of all Jews under 15 live in Israel. I checked with those previously mentioned demographers and Israel studies specialists, and they agreed that the number was more likely 65 per cent. Coupled with other demographic facts, the statistics give us a picture of a growing and healthy population in Israel. On the other hand, it indicates that we in the Diaspora may not be so healthy.

The good news: Instead of a steady growth in Arab birthrates, Arab numbers have started to decline. Amazingly, Israeli Jewish birthrates have increased so much that Israel has the highest fertility rate of any industrialized nation.

In Israel, birthrates have increased for each sector of the population – not only among religious Jews but also in every other group, at every educational level and in every class.

It's amazing and totally unexpected: Israel is more than maintaining its own growth. It is a young country in every way, one that values children and acknowledges its dependence on its youth (regrettably, this has not reached political institutions).

The bad news: Jewish birthrates have dropped in every Diaspora country. What does this mean to us in the Diaspora? We used to think Israel depended on us making aliyah, but it now might be that if we want more grandchildren, we should encourage aliyah. It means that Diaspora communities are aging and not replenishing our numbers. It means we need to rethink our policies and future plans.

Can we actually encourage and affect birthrates? Perhaps.

There is a semi-serious joke making the rounds that claims the most effective method of birth control is the high cost of day school education. Listening to my children and their friends discuss their fiscal overload and future financial planning, I think the joke is on us. They've decided that they can't have more children because they can't afford tuition. Even here in Montreal, where we are blessed with government support, school fees are a drain and a factor in planning children.

We must lower the costs of Jewish education, not just for those receiving scholarships but for everyone. We need to signal to our young couples that we truly value children and that we as a community will help to educate them Jewishly. If we do not find a way universally to support and educate families with many children, we lose.

Tasting medieval Jewish life in Venice

Let me state unequivocally that I do not criticize the deeply held faith of my Christian friends (yes, I do have them) who would not for a moment condone or defend the acts I am about to mention.

But after five weeks in Europe, east and west, I have a new appreciation of what it must have been like for Jews living in Christian states throughout the centuries, and the sights and sounds they experienced.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Every day they could encounter grand processions with venerated relics, splendid costumes and the chanting of hymns.

Their small synagogues could not compete with the majestic and looming cathedrals, with their ornate decorations, mosaics and paintings of hell and retribution, domes and carved interiors. The pomp, ritual and liturgy of the Catholic church was everywhere. More than ghetto restrictions, these would have been constant reminders of Jewish powerlessness.

We have returned from a unique holiday to Spain, Venice, Florence and Croatia. In this column, I will focus on Venice, which for centuries was known as the queen of the Adriatic.

Venice, as those of you who have been there know, is filled with boisterous Renaissance and Baroque art, much of it illustrating (at least nominally) scenes from the Christian scriptures, the lives of the saints, and stories by later church writers.

What struck us as we toured the galleries and admired St. Mark's square and the Ducal Palace was the number of items plundered from other places in the Venetian empire. The bronze horses over the doors to the cathedral, for example, were snatched from Constantinople when the Crusaders (hired by the Venetians) plundered that city. St. Mark's relics were also liberated from Turkish hands, supposedly smuggled out in a barrel of pork to avoid Muslim inspection.

In its art and texts, Venice does not shrink from acknowledging these thefts and others. The relics (and much else) were taken to Venice because they gave it access to the lucrative pilgrim trade, the forerunner of today's tourism in that thousands of devout pilgrims would endure horrific travel conditions to come venerate those relics. A fairly crass economic motive, one must say.

The pilgrimage as a way of connecting with a site embodying special sanctity is well-known to us from pictures of the Haj to Mecca. But for centuries, and to this day, many pious Christians have also gone to places fraught with sanctity – indeed, Israel itself advertises to, and profits from, Christian pilgrims. In fact, one of our tour guides in Croatia hastened to tell us that his mother had, the previous year, made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, a trip she had waited her whole life to take.

I have a problem, however, with the snatch of sanctity that Venice embodies. Pilgrimages as a way of connecting with the holy are fine, but the worship of bones and the trade in them is not. And don't that think we Jews don't do this. Think of the shrines to holy men and "saints" springing up in Israel and the territories.

The Venetian buildings that left lasting impressions, however, were the simpler, early churches whose facades reflected a quieter piety, in whose interiors one could sense the attempt to bridge the gap between the world of here and now, and the world above. Those who feel our synagogues, with their spare interiors and clean lines, are in need of more decoration, should reflect on why one enters a sanctuary. I prefer places where one enters a community of prayer, not a shrine.

Often there was an explicit message in the images we saw of the church's triumph over the synagogue. But I have to say that in our tour of the Venetian Ghetto synagogues, we never got the feeling that the guide (you have to have a guide to get in) thought of Jews as relics. Maybe it was the fact the men had kippot at the ready, or snatched one as soon as they entered, or maybe it was our decoding of the Hebrew inscriptions or the yeshiva bochers who came with us, but Jews and Judaism were treated with respect.

In any case, we came away with renewed appreciation of our own traditions. They are so right for us.

Preserving our heritage

We keep scrapbooks, journals, photo albums and mementoes to help us record and remember our life-cycle events, vacations, family and friends. We treasure photographs – from old family portraits taken in formal studios before we were born to the newest pictures, produced digitally, which we receive along with e-mails.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Scrapbooks, journals, photo albums and mementoes help us preserve our memories and heritage and put our lives in an historical context. The scrapbooks of our civilizations are the museums and archives and similar places where we can observe, absorb and reflect on some aspect of our past. They also offer us a way to put our present and future in a historical context.

The Ottawa/Hull region alone has 29 museums including 12 national museums. But museums are not simply tourist attractions reserved for our nation's capital. Museums, archives and other collections across Canada celebrate the legacy of our history and the people who built our country. These museums and collections make information about ourselves accessible to all Canadians.

Some collections have a narrow focus. For example, the Globe and Mail recently published a story on the many specialized and unusual museums in Canada. These include a gopher museum, a potato museum and a Canadian clock museum, among others.

Museums are growing in number and in scope. For example, in Calgary, work is proceeding on the establishment of a new military museum that will merge the Naval Museum of Alberta and the Museum of the Regiments.

One of the most ambitious recent projects is the national human rights museum being established in Winnipeg. A dream of its principal advocate, the late Israel Asper, this museum project has been described as "one of the most transformational projects currently before our nation." This centre will promote both participation and action and will move Canada to the forefront in advancing the cause of human rights both nationally and internationally.

Why do we feel so strongly that museums are an important feature of the modern landscape? There are at least two reasons.

First, we rightfully appreciate the importance of history as a guide to and a measure of current and future direction. Museums achieve this through audio, visual and tactile displays.

Secondly, there is a fear we will miss opportunities to have a significant record of our past. Although there is more emphasis on historical studies at all levels of our education system than before and there is an ever-increasing amount of information on the Internet, we still need systematic collections and displays of the facts and artifacts of our history.

The Jewish community is, of course, particularly sensitive to the need to remember. We know how important it is to support Holocaust memorials and museums that keep alive the memories of our people's struggles and triumphs. Yad Vashem in Jerusalem is now expanding. Similar museums exist in Washington and Montreal. A quick Internet search reveals a page-long list of such memorials around the world.

Not everyone, however, shares our passion or even our sense of importance of Holocaust museums. For example, a French-born Montreal comedian, Dieudonne Mbala Mbala, recently stated that museums dedicated to the preservation of the memory of the Holocaust are tantamount to "memorial pornography." Fortunately, most persons do not share this perverse view.

For many years, the Canadian Jewish Congress has been an active player in the preservation of our heritage through the CJC National Archives and Reference Centre in Montreal. These archives contain records related to the CJC, records of related organizations and records of individuals, including arts and artifacts, photographs, sound recordings and film. Recently, the CJC archives established a database on Canadian Jewish casualties in the Canadian armed forces.

The growth of museums is no less than a recognition that our collective national history forms an integral part of our national identity. Accordingly, museums ought to be vigorously promoted so that the present and future generations will better appreciate how we define Canada and Canadians. Museums are a means of achieving a greater understanding of the Canadian experience through an appreciation of our antecedents and our roots.

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books...

The Middle East, as usual, is in the news again. Israel is conducting a ground and air offensive in the Gaza Strip and battling Hamas. Iraq is embroiled in vicious sectarian violence. Syria is suppressing internal dissent and tightening its alliance with Iran. The following books will give you a broader, deeper appreciation of the context in which these events are unfolding.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Since its unexpected victory in last January's Palestinian parliamentary elections, Hamas – the Islamic Resistance Movement – has presented Israel with still more challenges and dilemmas. Matthew Levitt's timely book, Hamas: Politics, Charity, and Terrorism in the Service of Jihad (Yale University Press), charts the menacing connections between Hamas' charitable activities and its involvement in terrorism. Drawing on declassified reports from the Shin Bet, FBI, CIA, the U.S. Department of Homeland Security and Canada's spy agency, Levitt persuasively argues that Hamas' political leadership, social services network and terrorist wing are completely integrated and function as a seamless unit. A lawyer and political scientist, he is deputy assistant secretary for intelligence and analysis at the U.S. Department of the Treasury.

Ahmad's War, Ahmad's Peace (Carroll & Graf), by American journalist Michael Goldfarb, traces his unusual and moving friendship with an Iraqi Kurdish newspaper publisher whose struggle against tyranny cost him his life. Ahmad Shawkat was subjected to imprisonment and torture when Saddam Hussein ruled Iraq, and in the post-Saddam era, he decried Islamic violence. This is a portrait of a courageous man who was not cowed by intimidation.

As Iraq struggles for normalcy amid an increasingly bloody insurgency spearheaded by Sunni Muslims and Islamic fundamentalists, the heretofore persecuted Shiites struggle to take their rightful place in Iraqi society. In Reaching for Power (Princeton University Press), Brandeis University historian Yitzhak Nakash speculates on the role the resurgent Shiites may play in the new Iraq and what influence they may wield in the Arab world, particularly Lebanon.

David W. Lesch, in The New Lion of Damascus: Bashar al-Assad and Modern Syria (Yale University Press), cogently examines the challenges that confront Syria's inexperienced president at home and abroad as globalization spreads, the United States tries to plant the seeds of democracy in the Middle East and Israel redefines its relationship with the Palestinians.

Hebrew University sociologist Baruch Kimmerling is a gadfly. In Politicide: The Real Legacy of Ariel Sharon (Verso) and The Invention and Decline of Israeliness (University of California Press), he claims that the former Israeli prime minister was committed to "politicide" – the destruction of the Palestinians' political identity – and that Israel is a very different country than its Zionist founders envisioned. You may disagree with Kimmerling's dissident views, but they merit some attention.

The burning issues of the Arab-Israeli dispute are grist for Israeli novelist Amos Oz's slim volume, How to Cure a Fanatic (Princeton University Press), which is never less than thought-provoking. Yakov M. Rabkin stirs debate in A Threat From Within: A Century of Jewish Opposition To Zionism (Fernwood Books). Taking his cue from Torah-based opposition to Zionism, Rabkin, a University of Montreal historian, raises pointed questions about whether Israel's interests coincide or conflict with those of Jews in the Diaspora.

Israeli Arabs are caught between two opposing forces, their citizenship as Israelis and their identity as Palestinian Arabs. In Coffins on our Shoulders: The Experiences of the Palestinian Citizens of Israel (University of California Press), Dan Rabinowitz and Khawla Abu-Baker address this unresolved problem in unorthodox fashion. And in The Lemon Tree: An Arab, a Jew, and the Heart of the Middle East (Bloomsbury), a poignant book that covers similar ground and is set mainly in the Israeli town of Ramla, Sandy Tolan builds his story around a Bulgarian Jewish woman and a Palestinian Arab whose family was displaced by the 1948 Arab-Israeli war.

Immigration is Israel's lifeblood. Through the stories of three American Jewish families, Liel Leibovitz, in Aliya (St. Martin's Press), chronicles the dreams, hopes and fears of new immigrants. And in An Anzac Zionist Hero: The Life of Lt.-Colonel Eliazar Margolin (Vallentine Mitchell), Rodney Gouttman introduces us to a Russian-born Australian figure who commanded the Jewish Legion in Palestine long before Israel's statehood. A Strange Death (Public Affairs), a novel based on a little-known period in early 20th century Zionist history, revolves around the fabled Aaronsohn spy ring in Zichron Yakov. Author Hillel Halkin conjures up an imaginative tale of Oriental intrigue.

David Biale's bold, interdisciplinary and erudite three-volume work, Cultures of the Jews (Schocken), takes us from the biblical era to the present, while Studies in Jewish Civilization (University of Nebraska Press), edited by Leonard Greenspoon, Ronald Simkins and Brian Horowitz, focuses on Jewish life in eastern Europe in the 19th and 20th centuries. Jews and Port Cities 1590-1900 (Vallentine Mitchell), edited by David Cesarani and Gemma Romain, fleshes out a topic that has lain dormant for far too long. The Life of David (Schocken) by Robert Pinsky and Betraying Spinoza: The Renegade Jew Who Gave Us Modernity (Random House) by Rebecca Goldstein are models of biography. The Dead Sea Scrolls (Oxford University Press), by Timothy Lim, is a useful primer, while Yosef Hayim Yerushalmi's Haggadah and History (The Jewish Publication Society) is magisterial in scope.

Nitsa Ben-Ari, in Suppression of the Erotic in Modern Hebrew Literature (University of Toronto Press), argues that censorship impoverished the canon well into the 1970s. Etgar Keret, the Israeli novelist, is hardly constrained by such puritanism, judging by his satiric and erotic stories in The Nimrod Flip-Out (Chatto & Windus). The Israeli-born Canadian writer, Edeet Ravel, wrestles with matters of the heart in an intense novel, A Wall of Light (Random House), set in Tel Aviv. Wilham Weintraub is in top form in Crazy About Lili (Douglas Gibson Books), his picaresque novel about a young Jewish man in 1940s Montreal. Joseph Epstein weaves a mosaic of top-flight short stories in Fabulous Small Jews (Thomas Allen). Suite Francaise (Alfred Knopf), a taut novel in two parts by Holocaust victim Irene Nemirovsky, evokes the terror of the Nazi occupation.

Reiner Stach, in Kafka: The Decisive Years (Harcourt), evokes a rich period in the author's development. In Shining and Shadow: An Anthology of Early Yiddish Stories from the Lower East Side (Susquehanna University Press), Albert Waldinger showcases the stories of eight writers from Sholem Asch to Avrom Reisen. The Schocken Book of Modern Sephardic Literature (Random House) and Contemporary Jewish Writing in Sweden: An Anthology (University of Nebraska Press), edited, respectively, by Ilan Stavans and Peter Stenberg, engage the imagination.

A Concise History of the Third Reich (University of California Press, by Wolfgang Benz, is both succinct and comprehensive. Heather Pringle's The Master Plan: Himmler's Scholars and the Holocaust (Viking) is a fascinating account of a German research institute expressly established to validate cockeyed Nazi racial theories. Alan E. Steinweis' companion volume, Studying the Jew: Scholarly Antisemitism in Nazi Germany (Harvard University Press), skillfully investigates the careers of German scholars who fabricated an empirical basis for persecution and genocide. Kristallnacht: Prelude to Destruction (HarperCollins), by Martin Gilbert, deftly recreates the 1938 pogroms in Germany that marked a turning point in Nazi policy toward Jews. The Jews of Bohemia & Moravia (University of Nebraska Press), by Livia Rothkirchen, is a meticulous-researched work about the Nazi murder of Jews in Czech lands. Beyond Justice (Harvard University Press), by Rebecca Wittmann, expertly recounts a moment in Germany's confrontation with its past, the 1963 Frankfurt trial of former Auschwitz guards.

In general... Montreal Then and Now (Thunder Bay Press), by Alan Hustak and Johanne Norchet, is a first-rate architectural exposition of the city's landmarks through photographic juxtaposition. Overflowing with gentle and sardonic humour, The Complete Cartoons of The New Yorker (Black Dog & Leventhal) contains every cartoon, 68,647, published by that iconic magazine since 1925. What a treat! Braving a treacherous river and impenetrable jungles, and fending off hostile Indians, Theodore Roosevelt, the former president of the United States, completed an extraordinary expedition into the unexplored wilds of the Amazon basin in 1912. In The River of Doubt (Random House), Candice Millard brilliantly describes the trip.

If you're a curious traveller, you'll be drawn to Lonely Planet's Blue List and The Cities Book, both distributed by Raincoast Books. The first lists things to do and see in countries from Argentina to Zambia, and the second captures the flavour of 200 cities. Lonely Planet's Middle East, which includes Israel, and USA, which is chock full of information, are excellent guides.

The myth, reality and juicy gossip of Los Angeles' film industry unfold in The 50 Most Unforgettable Actresses in the Studio Era (Raincoast) by Andrea Sarvady and Adventures of a Hollywood Secretary by Valeria Belletti (University of California Press).

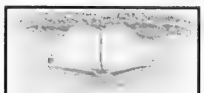
Word of honour – it's more than a promise

By RABBI EZRIEL SITZER

"I'll call you right back." "It'll be done by tomorrow." "I'm leaving the office in five minutes." "I will definitely look into it."



Rabbinic Reflections

These expressions and hundreds more ring hollow in our ears in a society that has lost its sensitivity toward honouring one's word. The Mishnah teaches that acquiring a good name (which of course is only accomplished by keeping one's word) is better than any other worldly possession. But according to our Torah, it goes even further than keeping a promise.

Parshat Matot, the first of this week's double Torah reading, contains the clearest warning in the Torah that we are not to violate our word: "He shall not profane his word, but must do everything that emerges from his mouth." The verse isn't merely urging us to keep our promises – not to do so is a profanity! Imagine that. A profanity – something vulgar and sacrilegious. But why?

The Baal Shem Tov, the founder of Chassidism, taught that every person is allotted a given number of words during his life. When he has used up his quota, he dies. (I once heard of a computer geek who believed that each person has a limited number of key taps in his life and refused to use the shift key!)

With his analogy, what the Baal Shem Tov wanted to impart was that the Torah is not teaching us just the importance of speech but also the essence of speech. To reveal to man that human life is speech. That is our life. And when a person's words run out, he has no further purpose or means by which to continue living.

But it goes even further.

In the account of the genesis of man the Torah says, "And God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and Man became a living being – l'nefesh chayah – in the original Hebrew. The translation of those Hebrew words according to Onkeles (a Roman convert who, our tradition says, wrote a translation received through prophetic inspiration), is "a speaking spirit." In other words, the quality that makes us uniquely human is the power of speech – not communication – but speech. Many lower beings communicate, including animals, birds, fish and insects. But speech includes the ability a human has to convey his or her unique thoughts, including vision, insight, humour, emotion or a commitment.

The Mishnah in Ethics of our Fathers reveals that God created the entire universe with 10 utterances. It is an important lesson for us to learn – that it wasn't His thoughts or His hands, but His mouth that created all that exists outside of Him. (Abracadabra, a Hebrew-based word, literally means "I will create while I speak.") Only man, about whom it is written, "Let us make man in Our likeness," was endowed with the same ability as God to create through speech.

This is a paramount lesson. For the person who takes this lesson to heart, it can be life altering. Never mind lying, exaggerating, hurtful or shameful speech. That's all Level 1. Level 2 is recognizing and utilizing the power of our words to create, to produce and to fashion.

Just imagine the impact of a simple "Hello." Or "I love you." Or "I'm sorry." Words that change worlds. Words that change people. And this is the bottom line, because nothing is more beautiful or more important than creating, developing and perfecting our own humanness through proper and responsible speech. And when that is accomplished, the ultimate speech will return again, when God will talk to man and man to God.

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By RABBI ELYSE GOLDSTEIN

I am honoured to offer the first in a series of monthly columns for The Canadian Jewish News called "Ideas on Identity" reflections on the complicated state of what it means to be a Jew in the modern world. Based on my observations both as a rabbi with 15 years in the field of transformational adult education and non-denominational outreach, and also as "a Jew in the pew," I welcome your suggestions for topics you find challenging or interesting.

I'll begin with a topic close to my heart. Last month, I attended an amazing conference in Boston called "Pouring New Water into an Ancient Vessel: Reclaiming Mikvah." Hosted by Anita Diament (famous for her book The Red Tent), it launched the opening of Mayyim Hayyim Living Waters Community Mikveh in Massachusetts. Mayyim Hayyim is a pluralistic mikvah that encourages both traditional and non-traditional uses of this ritual.

More than 200 men and women from across the denominational spectrum studied the mitzvah of mikvah and pondered both halachic and creative uses. Papers ranged from my own on The Mikvah as Spiritual Therapy (taking people for healing after rape, chemotherapy, infidelity, etc.) to an Orthodox mikvah attendant's on Demystifying The Laws of Family Purity.

I was touched more deeply by the cross-denominational dialogue than by all the scholarship. You see, the Orthodox mikvah lady and I became fast friends, and on the plane ride home, I wondered how that happened so naturally.

She and I would not feel comfortable in each other's shuls, for sure. She believes liberal Judaism is seriously misguided on some key issues, and I believe exactly the same about Orthodoxy. She is wary of change in Judaism and I embrace it. And so on. But she was willing to see that, despite her misgivings, I am a committed, passionate Jew. And I was willing to see that, despite my misgivings, she is also a passionate, committed Jew. We know we are both on the same "team" though we disagree on how to play the game.

We each know that the other cares deeply and is willing to do anything in her power to help Judaism not only survive but thrive. We respect the other's right to do it her way. We even respect her right to be wrong, even if only in our own opinion.

I have always felt that Jewish women have the power – and the challenge – to bridge the seemingly intractable denominational gaps. Once outsiders to the system, women who are now insiders can affect great change when we put our minds and hearts into it. This "commonality of womanhood" often supersedes even the thorniest of philosophical disagreements.

Yitz Greenberg, an Orthodox Rabbi, once wrote, "I don't care if we argue, as long as we argue in the same language."

My new friend and I did not have a meeting of the minds – we had a meeting of the hearts. She told me that she often shares information from my website with the kids in the Orthodox day school where she teaches, and I promised to share some of her teachings at Kolel.

She also admitted that, in a few weeks, she is taking five of her closest female friends – two of whom are haredi – to Mayyim Hayyim for a personal healing ceremony, something unheard of in her community.

But she is not afraid. She proclaims freely that she has something to learn from other Jews and other ways of being Jewish, and I proclaim the same. If more of us would just "dip in" at that level, the whole community would feel the power of living waters.

French air tax flies off course

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

The French government recently approved plans for a new tax on airline tickets, to be levied on all passengers boarding a plane in France, that would be distributed to the world's poor. Is such a tax ethically sound?

Jewish tradition recognizes that charitable giving must consist of both a private and public component. This combination allows both public needs and personal preferences to be met. Whereas public trustees must follow very strict rules regarding allocation of funding, private donors have much greater leeway in choosing the recipient of their largesse. Private donors may – and perhaps must – give priority to a close relative, something that would be a terrible breach of trust if done by public foundations such as a federation.

The existence of a public system of charitable giving means that Jewish law recognizes a coercive nature in assessing minimum charitable requirements. While the Diaspora Jewish community is no longer able to enforce this most crucial of mitzvot, secular governments can and continue to do so. This forced charity is what we call taxes supporting as they do health care, education, the unemployed and the needy. Jewish law recognizes that governments have tremendous latitude in determining the public interest. If halachah recognized this right in the premodern era of monarchs, dictators and the like, it is all the more important in democratic countries where the government truly are the people's representatives. This new French initiative would thus appear to be a wonderful way to raise funds for a worthy cause, one that many would otherwise not contribute to.

Nonetheless, on closer analysis, it appears to me that this law raises ethical issues that seriously question its appropriateness. One of the requirements of a Jewish social service system is the need for universality. Every member of society must participate in helping to alleviate poverty. As charitable giving benefits both the recipient and the donor, even those who themselves are recipients of charity must donate, albeit in very small amounts, to anti-poverty efforts. A law that targets only airline travelers fails to meet this criterion. It could even be argued that such a tax is inherently discriminatory and thus illegal under Jewish law.

Furthermore, as the many airlines who have lobbied against passage of this law have noted, it places airlines at a competitive disadvantage. While adding a user tax designated for such things as capital improvements at the airport would seem to present no ethical problem despite a similar increase in costs, doing so for extraneous purposes would unnecessarily wreak economic harm on an already beleaguered industry. This would violate the ethical responsibility of a government to pursue policies that encourage economic growth and development. Whereas general taxes may be spent as the government sees fit, taxes levied on particular industries should be spent on those industries.

Another issue relates to the nature of airline travel. With France being the leading tourist destination in the world, attracting more than 100 million visitors a year, a large proportion of those travelling to and through France are citizens of other countries. While the specifics vary depending on the type of charity involved, Jewish law does not levy communal taxes on those just passing through a particular locale. For instance, the laws of Passover begin with the codification of the obligation to ensure the poor have their needs met for the holiday, but only those who have settled permanently or have resided in a particular place for 12 months must participate.

The concept of a designated tax to help alleviate poverty is a beautiful one and should definitely be encouraged, provided it is assessed across the board. However, singling out air travellers is not the way to go.

Promoting a website, blog or podcast

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

So you've created your own Jewish website. Congratulations!

Now you want the world to know about it.

Maybe you have a Torah story to tell or a political blog to publicize or a Yiddish podcast you've been slaving over. After all that hard work, you want to make sure as many people as possible to visit. There are some great sites that will help get the word out about your Jewish site – free. Today, I'll tell you where to find them.

In truth, the best time to think about attracting visitors to your site is while you are still building it. There are a few basic principles you need to consider to make your site search engine-friendly. And these rules apply to any kind of site, Jewish or not. Because, face it, most people who are doing a search turn to Google or Yahoo first. For a good primer, check out the Wikipedia article on Search Engine Optimization. [http://tinyurl.com/hdmh4] You'll learn about the importance of the title area of your web page and you'll be warned against trying to fool search engines by overloading your site with keywords. [www.submit-it.com/subopt.htm]

Although most search engines operate by sending automatic programs (known as spiders or robots) to troll the web, there are services around that rely on humans to do the categorizing. And you can submit your site to them for consideration. The Google Judaism directory [http://tinyurl.com/fsgxe] gets its information from the Open Directory Project, which calls itself "the largest, most comprehensive human-edited directory of the web." Its Judaism directory currently lists more than 2,500 sites. [http://dmoz.org/Society/Religion_and_Spirituality/Judaism/] You can submit your site directly to them [http://tinyurl.com/kv8zs] as well to a similar directory at Yahoo. [http://tinyurl.com/eromz]

As for directories and search engines that specialize in Jewish sites, the most famous is probably MavenSearch.com, which was founded in 1994 and currently lists more than 15,000 websites. It accepts applications for listing at this page. [www.mavensearch.com/submit/submit.asp]

By the way, as you visit these sites, you will notice a common theme. Most directories of Jewish sites say that they will not accept listings for Christian messianic groups. They have their own directories for that. Despite that precaution, those messianic groups do sometimes appear if they have opted to take out commercial listings. To read more about the fight to fool search engines, take a look at my previous article, Of Google and Joogle Bombs. [www.cjnews.com/viewarticle.asp?id=3234]

If you like to be the first to hear about new Jewish and Israeli sites, I highly recommend subscribing to the MavenSearch newsletter. [www.mavensearch.com/newsletter/subscribe.asp] You'll receive a regular e-mail updating you on recently launched sites. (That's how I just came across the new – and habit-forming – site, Guess Who's The Jew. [www.guesswhosthejew.com/]) Shamash, another of the early Jewish sites, operates the similar Jewish-Announce mailing list on which you can publicize your site. [http://tinyurl.com/fagez]

The lists of Jewish lists continues: Hareshima [www.hareshima.co.il/ADDURL.ASP]; Nu?! [www.jewishsites.org/addurl.htm]; JewishStar [www.jewishstar.com/addsite.htm]; Yehud [http://tinyurl.com/g9l3o]; 123 ABC Jewish [http://tinyurl.com/hvaql]; and Kineret. [www.kineret.com/]

And then there is a favourite search engine of mine. Actually, I'm not really sure if it does the best job but it does have a great name for a Jewish Google wannabe: Koogle. [www.koogle.net/]

If you have a Jewish blog more people should know about, tell the folks at JewishBlogging.com. [www.jewishblogging.com/addBlog.php] And for your Jewish podcast, look at the link at the bottom of Podcast.net's Judaism page. [www.podcast.net/cat/117]

There is one more way for you to get the word out about your Jewish site. Tell me about it. Write to me at the address below about the Jewish or Israeli website, blog or podcast you've created and I may mention it in a future column.

Upper Canada Lodge marks 60 years of chesed

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Since 1946, the members of B'nai Brith's Upper Canada Lodge have performed numerous services for the Jewish and general communities.

As the lodge celebrates its 60th year, it can look back on its outstanding accomplishments and selfless dedication from its first president and founding father, former Toronto mayor Phil Givens (1946-47), to its newly elected 36-year-old president, Franklin Switzer (2006-08).

The Upper Canada Lodge (UCL) has lived up to its motto, "People helping people," through such volunteer projects as visiting the sick, outings for seniors and adults with disabilities, Meals on Wheels deliveries, Chanukah and Passover parcel deliveries, Clowns-on-the-Town, hospital projects, participation in the League of Human Rights, and the list goes on and on.

First president was Toronto mayor Phil Givens

The UCL is well known for building and maintaining the Upper Canada Lodge seniors housing complex at 4266 Bathurst St. The residence helps many seniors and people with disabilities live affordably and well. The lodge's day-to-day involvement with the building's operation and with its social and educational programming have become a model for community living.

Switzer, 36, told The CJN that when he returned to Toronto from university in 1995, he wanted to play sports. "Someone put me in contact with Steve Lubek, who was then the commissioner of basketball for B'nai Brith. He got me involved in the sports program."

Switzer, who operates a law enforcement outerwear manufacturing plant, says Lubek, a past lodge president, exposed him to UCL, and he became active in the lodge and in B'nai Brith Canada.

"In 1996, when Steve Lubek became president, he asked me to join the executive, and I became the third vice-president of UCL, and I just moved my way up."

He adds that his grandfather and father were in B'nai Brith's lodge system.

The younger members and the more senior members get along very well, Switzer says. "We all work well together – some of our members are in their 90s."

Switzer is proud of the UCL's legacy.

"Once I became active in the lodge, I was very impressed with their services and I want to insure that it is carried on into the future. I am delighted that I and some of the younger members are working along with the senior members. It makes us stronger."

Established as a men's group, the lodge has since opened its membership to women, and it installed its first female president, Judy Gordon, in 1992.

Albert Waisglass, a World War II veteran and a founding lodge member who is currently second vice-president, said that along with its many other services to the community, the lodge is proud of its Sabbath and holiday services that are held in the chapel of its housing complex and at the Harold and Grace Baker Centre retirement home in the former city of York.

"But above all," says Waisglass, "I have enjoyed the camaraderie and the friendships that I have made and the colleagues I have worked with over the years. I have not only contributed to the community, but I have personally gained so much."

Upper Canada Lodge's year of celebrations will culminate on Sunday, Oct. 20 at a gala dinner and dance at Paradise Banquet & Convention Centre.

Jewish Canadian Idol contestant falls short of top 10

Nancy Silverman

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Nancy Silverman may not have made the top 10 on Canadian Idol, but the Jewish resident of Thornhill made Jewish Canadians proud by outlasting 12,000 other hopefuls to make it as far as the top 14.

About 3.3 million voters put Silverman and three other contestants in the bottom four last week, ending her quest to win the fourth season of Canadian Idol.

It's only natural for Silverman to be disappointed after being eliminated from the competition in a live CTV broadcast.

But in an interview with The CJN a few days before the show, she talked of how blessed she felt to have been a part of the process.

"Even if you're the first person voted out, you've gotten to do what you love for the whole country. If you're here, you've already won," said Silverman, who preformed songs such as Could I Be Your Girl by Jann Arden, Fallin by Alicia Keys, and Stupid by Sarah McLachlan.

"We're working with incredibly skilled performers – the best in the field. The training is amazing," she said.

The 19-year-old will be continuing her training when she enters her third year in the musical theatre program at Sheridan College.

Although Silverman said she has only been singing since her last year of high school three years ago, dancing has been a part of her life since she was just a kid.

"I began dancing at nine. I took jazz, tap, ballet and hip hop. But I really became interested in pop music in my first year of college."

She also said that even as an elementary and high school student, she was very involved in the arts. She went to Baythorn Public School, and Unionville High School, which are both known for their extensive arts programs.

She said that because she only started singing in the last year of high school, she wasn't physically or mentally prepared to audition for Canadian Idol until this year.

"I needed the time to build my self confidence," she said, adding that the training she has received as part of her musical theatre program – which includes half-hour, one-on-one vocal training sessions – has helped her improve her range.

About the competition itself, Silverman said she didn't know what to expect.

"On a typical day, I come to the studio, I workshop a song, do a couple of interviews, and we have to find time to practise," she said of her routine.

"It was hard to anticipate what the experience would be like. But it's been great fun, very challenging and I've learned a lot."

While the judges often described Silverman's style as unique, she said, "my vocal style is influenced by the artists I listen to. My favorites are Alanis [Morissette], Fiona Apple and India Arie."

She said that since she was competing with "the most talented singers in the country," she never expected to make it as far as she did in the competition.

Despite the fact she didn't win the competition, Silverman said there is still no telling where the show, and the exposure it's given her, will take her.

"I just want to share what I do. I'm trying to touch people in any way that I can," she said.

She said that although she was the only Jewish contestant on the show, it didn't change the way she approached the competition.

But it did provide her with a sense of pride.

"I'm very proud to be representing the Jewish community. It's about time there was a Jewish competitor in the top 10."

Maybe next season.

Golf tournament raises funds for breast cancer research

The 10th annual Henry's Tournament fore Health will be held at the Angus Glen Golf Club in Markham, Ont., on Aug. 3. The event will benefit the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre at Mount Sinai Hospital.

Organizers hope to raise $200,000. The tournament has raised $1.2 million since its inception.

Co-chairs Debbie Kimel and Tiana Koffler Boyman, as well as Marvelle Koffler, founder and inspiration for the centre, will be taking part. In addition to the golf, there will be both a live and a silent auction.

Tee-off time is 9 a.m., with breakfast at 7:30 a.m. Although the event is sold out, people can donate to the cause, or sponsor a player, by going online to www.mtsinai.on.ca/henrysgolf.

The Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre, which opened in October 1995, sees some 33,000 people a year. It is an outpatient facility specializing in all aspects of breast health and breast care. It integrates services from the departments of surgery, medicine, radiology, pathology, psychiatry, nursing, palliative care, nutrition and social work.

Education director stresses inter-denominational tolerance

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Debbie Spiegel has a somewhat rare vantage point relative to Judaism's three major religious streams.

As director of education for Holy Blossom Temple, with responsibility for its preschool, religious school and adult education under the auspices of the synagogue's Schwartz/Reisman Centre for Jewish Learning, she serves the city's largest Reform congregation. She also has close ties with Orthodox Judaism through her synagogue affiliation and lifestyle, and with the Conservative movement as assistant director of Camp Ramah in Canada for 13 years until 2004.

Debbie Spiegel

"I really feel very strongly that however you express your Judaism is terrific... I want everyone to be proud and enjoy being Jewish. The way you make Shabbat at home may not be the way I make Shabbat at home, but that doesn't matter. [What matters is that you] make Shabbat. Have that time in your life."

Spiegel, a 51-year-old mother of four, likes to focus on things like Jewish holidays that all Jews have in common. Jewish education can also be a common denominator, she believes. Whether parents choose to send their children to day school or supplementary school, she said, she wants them to "do it wholeheartedly and with the right head."

She believes there needs to be "a lot more tolerance [and] a lot more respect" among the denominations. "We're a small people. We need to be unified. We're not doing anyone any favours by making comments about another movement. We need to be friends.

"If people are accepting, and there's no 'but' in the equation, there's no problem," she believes.

As an administrator, Spiegel, who has a BA in Judaic studies and a teaching certificate from the University of Michigan, believes in an open-door policy with her teachers and in "looking at the big picture." She doesn't want to ignore details, she said, but she does not believe in getting "bogged down by minutia."

Two personal experiences have had a strong impact on that philosophy. One was serving as a chaperone on March of the Living in 2004 and 2005. The other involves her daughter Miryam, an 18-year-old graduate of Ulpanat Orot and a survivor of leukemia, diagnosed when she was just 22 months old.

"We take nothing for granted. We cherish each and every moment," said Spiegel, who took on her current position in an interim capacity last August and assumed it officially over the winter.

In the schools, she said, "we want to make sure we create an environment where kids have a wonderful place of learning, a place they can call home and feel great about being Jewish."

Spiegel also worked at Holy Blossom before her stint at Ramah, as Hebrew school and senior school supervisor, and said it was "like coming home" to return there.

The one-night-a-week senior school for grades 7 to 10 is undergoing curricular changes and enhancing its social action program, changes that reflect the synagogue's strategic plan to implement change, Spiegel said.

Included in the change is a more integrated program with the synagogue's youth group.

"I believe in informal education. I think kids learn well that way," said Spiegel, whose own background is heavy on informal Jewish education, even before her stint at Ramah.

As a child growing up in the Conservative movement in Detroit, she was a United Synagogue Youth member, a Ramah camper and later a staff member. She also served as a student teacher at her synagogue, and took part in leadership training programs as part of her religious school experience. "I just loved it," she said.

She met her husband, Randy, a native of Hespeler, Ont. who is executive director of Zareinu Educational Centre of Metropolitan Toronto, at Camp Ramah in New England in 1980. They married two years later.

This summer, Spiegel will spend a week working at Camp George, the Reform movement's summer camp in Ontario.

Much of the rest of her summer will be devoted to the Schwartz/Reisman centre, and to revamping curriculum and working with teachers, a prospect she finds exciting.

"Our expectation is that they will give their all for the sake of creating future Jews, and that's what it's all about."

New USY president plans to reach out to others

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

Julie Zucker, the new executive regional president of United Synagogue Youth's Eastern Canadian region, wants to reach out to people who haven't found USY or don't know what it's really about.

"I hope to make it a lot more appealing to people who don't have a Jewish [connection] in their life," said Zucker, 17, who was elected in the second week of May. "I just hope that a lot of people who have not experienced a [Jewish] youth group find USY."

Her term as president will last until May 2007. USY, the youth branch of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, has more than 25,000 high school-aged members in Canada and the United States.

It has 17 regions and more than 400 chapters. Eastern Canadian, the only completely Canadian region of USY, consists of Ontario and Quebec, and boasts a membership of over over 700. There are 130 active members in the region, said Zucker, who lives in Thornhill, Ont.

"[USY] is really for everybody. It's just a matter of how much you want to look for it or how much you want to care about it. Everyone who has come to [any] convention has really loved it and has come back," she said.

In order to run for the presidency, Zucker, who was formerly vice-president, had to collect 50 signatures of USY members and submit an essay. There was one other candidate running for regional president, Zucker said. She did not want to disclose the name of her opposition.

"It was very nerve-wracking. The competition was neck-and-neck. There was no person with leverage over the other," she said. "People really want an opportunity to get involved with the region that they love."

Zucker was introduced to USY through her synagogue, Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto, and quickly became an active member of Kadima, USY's group for kids in grades 6 to 8. At 15, Zucker became president of USY at Beth Tzedec.

The week-long international USY conventions held each December – this year's will be in Boston – attract approximately 1,200 members.

"Everyone I know who has gone to a convention has loved it and come back. You just have to take the time to actually go," said Zucker, who went to United Synagogue Day School for elementary school and is going into Grade 12 at Thornhill Secondary School this fall.

"There was just a program a couple of weeks ago for Shavuot with USY where we all stayed up and studied all night, which was a lot of fun," said Zucker with a soft giggle. "I got home at eight o'clock in the morning after being up all night."

Since elected to her new position, Zucker has been caught in a flurry of activity.

Julie Zucker

"It has been ridiculous. I haven't been able to start anything that I've wanted to," she said. "I've had to organize the mailing of 400 flyers for a [regional] convention that's happening in August. I have a goal meeting for the entire executive board, so I've been on the phone every night these past two weeks with my staff, trading goals with the rest of the [executive body]. It's just been very crazy," she said.

"It's all because of my sister. She was extremely involved with USY. She, herself, was on the regional executive board," she said. "When I was in Grade 8 in 2002, she took me to my first convention."

Eva is currently the communications director at Hillel at York University.

Once she graduates from high school, Zucker hopes to spend a year in Israel doing USY's nine-month-long Nativ program before studying business at university.

"I joined USY not knowing many people, but [members] are incredible. They are so much fun," she said. "I've made a lot of my best friends through USY."

Kosher chicken now available in Cuba

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

A halachic-based humanitarian and educational organization has begun slaughtering kosher chickens for the Cuban community on an ongoing basis.

"Even though in the past we had periodic chicken slaughtering… [From now on] every few weeks we'll have another few slaughterers go down," said Rabbi Simon Aisenbach, executive director of the Canadian Friends of Cuban Jewry (CFCJ).

"Every two to three weeks, a team goes down there to slaughter chickens, and we'd love to do more, but it's based on how much we can put together. It's a very costly project, but the more money we get the more we can do."

Rabbi Aisenbach said it's difficult for the average Cuban to access poultry or meat on a regular basis.

"It's very costly and the average individual makes very little there," he said. "They have a few dollars that they accumulate, they'll spend it on something else, like vegetables and eggs, which you can get more of for that same price."

Two hundred and twenty families receive the 500 kosher chickens from the CFCJ. The number of chickens distributed to each family varies according to need, said Aisenbach.

While the organization has made strides making chicken available, there is still some work that needs to be done before kosher beef is available to Cuba's Jewish community, which Rabbi Aisenbach estimates to be around 1,000 and is centred mainly in Havana.

He said that while it is possible for the community to obtain a certain number of cattle from the government, "it's not simple for them [the government] yet to digest this concept that in Jewish law a big part of the animal would not be kosher, and a big part of the animal, which maybe is kosher, is not halachically allowed to be eaten."

"The Halachah with beef is a lot more complicated. There are tens and maybe hundreds of details, which… exist in kosher slaughter, pertaining [to] the cattle versus the chicken," he said.

The CFCJ wrapped up its 101st mission to Cuba on July 9. The next group of shochtim (kosher slaughterers), all of whom are from South America, arrived in Cuba July 16 for a three-week stay.

Its annual summer camp there, Gan Israel, begins July 23 and wraps up on Aug. 31.

The camp program is structured for the children, but parents or older siblings are invited to enjoy a day out and have a good, satisfying meal and "to enjoy different experiences that they cannot and would not all year round," Rabbi Aisenbach said.

"We provide these kids with meals on a daily basis, and we thought we could provide the parents as well with the physical sustenance as well as the educational component."

Rabbi Aisenbach said religious education and spiritual support is provided solely to the Jewish community, but the organization will not deny anyone humanitarian assistance, regardless of religion.

"We never differentiate, not only with the halachic Jew, but between the Jew and the non-Jew at all," he said. "Even recently, we got a call for help to provide medicine from a completely non-Jewish couple. As much as we can, we try to help everybody. It's important to help every human being for that matter."

Rabbi Aisenbach is pleased with how his organization has been received by Cuba's small Jewish community.

"It means everything for them, the fact that they know that they have an address and literally whatever they need, besides the ongoing humanitarian aid distribution," he said.

"We have our representatives there, and anyone can turn to them, at any moment, with any subject, be it religious, educational or primarily humanitarian… [For] anything like shoes, clothes and medicine, [the community can] turn to us."

Yacht club hosts disabled Israeli vets

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

On a lovely Sunday earlier this month, the Island Yacht Club (IYC) hosted a group of disabled Israeli veterans for a day of sailing, lunch and camaraderie.

Ten yacht club skippers volunteered their boats and crews for use by visiting veterans and their Toronto host families.

The Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel-Beit Halochem (Canada) hosted the veterans. Gillian Sarfin and Rachel Weisman were the local itinerary co-chairs for Beit Halochem and Sid Golden was the IYC's co-ordinator for the club visit.

"Everyone was warmly greeted by our commodore Cynthia Amsterdam and our committee members. The club members welcomed the veterans and [member] Uriel Domb addressed the group in Hebrew," Golden said.

After a picnic lunch, the 10 boats left the docks for what Golden called "a highly touted sailing adventure. Our guests were not disappointed."

He added, "The winds on occasion were quite brisk. When a sudden gust of wind hit our boat followed by a sharp heel, I heard the plaintive 'Yisgadal' [of the Kaddish prayer] being softly chanted in the background."

Golden said that along with the warm thanks the members received from the veterans, "the feedback I received from the IYC skippers, crews, guests and Beit Halochem officials was all very positive and very satisfying."

The 10 skippers who volunteered were Cynthia Amsterdam, Harvey Barth, Uriel and Michael Domb, Jeffrey Engel, Sid Golden, Stephen Gurza, Howard Levinoff, Lawrence Litvack, Nathan Mechanic and Jeff Solway.

Canadian MDA arm celebrates 30 years

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — At 93 and coping with hearing loss, Sydney Lithwick can no longer be as active in his favourite charitable cause, Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel (CMDA), but he is determined to still make a contribution.

Lithwick was one of the major supporters honoured at CMDA's 30th anniversary celebration last month. He has been with the organization almost since it began, and is now an honorary member.

"I can still speak and see, so two out of three isn't bad," Lithwick said cheerfully in accepting the tribute.

Despite his impairment, Lithwick is fulfilling a lifelong dream by taking piano lessons. He is practising twice a week for two hours each session. His goal is to learn to play Rhapsody in Blue well enough to do so in public. When that happens, and he figures it will be by the end of this year, Lithwick pledged to put on a benefit concert for CMDA.

Lithwick said his proudest memory as an active CMDA member was helping raise funds in Canada for the establishment of the first national blood centre in Israel, which today supplies almost all of the country's needs.

Also honoured was Oscar Costin, 90, another CMDA pioneer. He is now an honorary director.

Since 2000, CMDA has sent more than $6 million (all figures US) worth of ambulances, equipment and medical supplies to Magen David Adom in Israel.

Over the past 10 years, this has included 113 ambulances: 72 standard models, 39 mobile intensive care units (MICUs) and two bloodmobiles. Canadians are now sponsoring an average of 10 to 15 ambulances a year, said national executive director Arnold Rosner, to help replenish MDA's fleet of more than 700 vehicles, of which 10 per cent are retired annually.

A standard ambulance costs the donor $82,500 and the larger, more specialized MICUs, $105,000. That covers the cost of the vehicles, with only minimal equipment, Rosner said. Full equipment can add another $25,000 to $50,000 per ambulance.

Overall, Canada is behind only the United States and Britain in its level of support for MDA, he said.

According to its charter, CMDA must donate actual goods, not send money to Israel for ambulances and equipment, he said.

The ambulances are manufactured by Ambulances Demers based in Beloeil, Rosner said, which has the added bonus of supporting jobs in Quebec.

Lithwick recalled that Canada's $500,00 contribution to the construction of the national blood centre in Tel Aviv is one of the highlights of the organization's three decades.

CMDA's next big project is to buy at least 200 computerized "shaker and scale" machines at a cost of $600,000. These machines send information on each donated blood unit to a central computerized system, thereby allowing it to get to recipients faster.

The organization has also contributed more than $300,000 to the development of MDA's cord blood bank, a project being undertaken with the country's hospitals to advance stem-cell research and development of treatments for cancer and blood disorders.

The bank collects donated umbilical cord blood following the birth of healthy babies, a practice which the religious authorities have deemed acceptable. It is anticipated that the MDA cord blood bank will become a major resource for Jews worldwide, as well as for the Arab population.

Many Canadian Jewish young people also volunteer in the summer with MDA, often going on to health-care professions. CMDA's fundraisers are rejuvenating, too. At the celebration, the young leadership division of the Communauté Sépharade Unifiée du Québec presented a cheque for $6,800, part of the proceeds from its "Bachelor/Bachelorette" auction, where bids were taken for dates. It's the second year the group has supported CMDA.

MDA, Israel's emergency medical, disaster relief and blood supply service, was founded in 1930.

CMDA, under the national presidency of Miriam Lang of Montreal, has offices in Toronto, London and Edmonton, as well as chapters in Hamilton, Ottawa and Vancouver. Chapters are being formed in Winnipeg and Calgary.

CMDA is planning a mission to Israel from Oct. 18 to 29, which will include the opportunity to donate blood directly to MDA's bank and then recuperate at a Dead Sea spa.

Fairness suffers as columnists rip into Israel

The Daily News in Halifax served up a dual attack on Israel July 9 in its "Perspective" section: a piece by syndicated writer Gwynne Dyer ("Excessive force?") and another by the paper's own columnist, Stephen Kimber ("Do we need a little more MAD?"). Talk about balance!

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Dyer began his article by siding with the European Union in its criticism of Israel for using "disproportionate" force in its military operations in Gaza in response to the kidnapping of Cpl. Gilad Shalit. Like the EU, Dyer conveniently omitted any mention of the other acts Israel was forced to counter – such as the incessant firing of about 700 Qassam rockets from Gaza into Israeli sovereign territory since Hamas took control of the Palestinian Authority in January. No other country in the world would tolerate such provocations, as Israel tried to do month after month.

The very EU members who have "rediscovered their backbones," as Dyer puts it, never once criticized the Hamas-led PA for failing to prevent the Qassam launchings, or for condoning and even encouraging so-called "armed resistance," which lacks any commonsense basis a year after Israel's full withdrawal from Gaza.

Many journalists have taken issue with certain tactics of the Israel Defence Forces. They often cite the destruction of one of the main power stations, which has left a great many Palestinians temporarily without electricity. Dyer not only joins the ranks of these journalists, but he focuses exclusively on finding fault with Israel, making it appear that Israel has set out, with barely any cause at all, to impose "collective punishment" on the Palestinians. "There is no sense of proportion here," wrote Dyer about Israel's Gaza operation, oblivious to the fact the very same statement applies to his own one-sided analysis.

Dyer's invective further confuses readers by erroneously comparing pre-state Israel with the Hamas-led PA. He attempts to draw a parallel between the Jewish Agency and the Haganah on one hand and the "political" and "military" wings of Hamas on the other. Dyer insists that Hamas cannot control its "military wing" which, along with "various other radical groups" is attempting "to discredit mainstream Palestinian organizations that want a negotiated settlement with Israel."

Such utter nonsense appears in virtually every sentence Dyer writes. The Haganah asserted its authority over rival forces, and the Jewish Agency developed a fully functioning civil society dedicated to peace and territorial compromise. By contrast, Hamas whose "political" and "military wings" are not, contra Dyer, distinct, is far more consumed with waging violence and terrorism against Israel than in providing sustenance and economic development for its own people.

Thus Hamas remains what the international community, including even the EU, has branded it – a terrorist organization that is dedicated to the destruction of Israel. It is certainly not trying to achieve any "negotiated settlement," as Dyer ludicrously implies.

Like Dyer, Kimber also lacks even a hint of proportionality and fairness where Israel is concerned. Referring only to the IDF's military actions without providing any context, and characterizing them in a cartoonish fashion, Kimber insists that Israelis are killing "innocent [Palestinian] civilians because… well, because they can." That's a canard against the IDF, which, despite regrettable accidents, tries to prevent civilian casualties – a task made infinitely more difficult by Hamas' propensity to operate in residential areas.

Reversing cause and effect, Kimber tramples over the truth: "Who's going to stop [the Israelis]? Certainly not the pitiably ill-armed Palestinians, whose response weapons-of-necessity consist of little more than a few pathetic, homemade, unguided Qassam missiles. No wonder they resort to suicide bombers and soldier kidnapping."

By the way, Kimber, in addition to being a Daily News columnist, also teaches journalism at the University of King's College in Halifax. One can only have compassion for his students who need to learn about journalistic ethics of fairness and accuracy, and concern for what he might be teaching them about the coverage of Israel and the Middle East.

Notification by the State of the Netherlands
4 April 2007: final closing date for restitution applications
'Cultural objects and the Second World War'

Following the liberation of the Netherlands in 1945, many works of art that had been confiscated or purchased by the German occupying forces were brought back to the Netherlands. These works came into the custody of the State of the Netherlands and formed the 'NK collection' (named after the SNK, Stichting Nederlands Kunstbezit). The NK collection consists of 4,217 works of art. In some cases the owners were Jewish.

Since 2001, the Netherlands has pursued a liberalised restitution policy for cultural objects from the NK collection that, as a result of the Second World War, were involuntarily lost by the then owners, provided they belonged to a persecuted group.

The Restitutions Committee (Adviescommissie restitutieverzoeken cultuurgoederen en Tweede Wereldoorlog) advises the State Secretary for Education, Culture and Science on individual applications for the post-war restitution of cultural objects that are currently in the custody of the State of the Netherlands.

Under the liberalised restitution policy, written applications for restitution may be submitted no later than 4 April 2007. Please send your application (including the grounds for your request) to the:

Yad Sarah hopes to raise $1M in Canada this year

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Yad Sarah is one of Canada's best-kept tzedakah secrets – except among people who travel frequently to Israel.

It's one of the best-known volunteer organizations in Israel, mainly because of its free short-term lending programs for medical equipment and for its health services.

The enthusiasm of Arlene Weisbart, the recently appointed director of Canadian Friends of Yad Sarah, is infectious as she speaks of the many services provided to Israelis and visitors to Israel through Yad Sarah's headquarters in Jerusalem, as well as through its 103 lending stations across Israel.

Yad Sarah lends more than 300 different types of medical equipment, from walkers to crutches, to hospital beds and wheelchairs, Weisbart told The CJN, "and if you can't go for it, they will arrange to bring it to you."

Uri Lupoliansky, now mayor of Jerusalem, launched Yad Sarah in 1976 when he was a school teacher and realized the need for a service that lends medical equipment.

Weisbart said the Israeli government is unable to fund such a service, and it's estimated that Yad Sarah saves the state more than $320 million (US) annually in hospital and long-term care costs.

Last year, Yad Sarah volunteers helped 380,000 families. The organization relies on volunteers and private donations, 80 per cent of which come from Israel and 20 per cent of which come from abroad.

The Toronto office of Yad Sarah opened in January and is a registered Canadian charity.

"Already there is great enthusiasm across Canada", said Weisbart, who noted that Baycrest has donated 100 wheelchairs to Yad Sarah in Israel.

"We hope to raise $1 million this year, which will buy more equipment and help with the maintenance of the 32 specialized vans that operate in Israel. Some of the services that will benefit are a women's crisis centre, a children's play therapy centre for children with disabilities and their families, a geriatric dental clinic, a legal aid service for those in need, and much more," Weisbart said.

"We encourage Canadians travelling to Israel to visit Yad Sarah and to volunteer to do some hands-on chesed during their tour and to see the amazing work they are doing there."

Recently, a gala reception was held for Yad Sarah at the home of John and Lori Ulmer. Israel's consul general in Toronto, Ya'acov Brosh, spoke of his personal experience with Yad Sarah and said it was important to every individual who requires medical equipment. Satirist and author Allan Gould was the featured guest artist.

The Canadian Friends of Yad Sarah also recently held a information meeting at the home of Joseph and Lee Minkowitz, where guests heard about Yad Sarah's non-sectarian medical and rehabilitation services.

To raise money, Yad Sarah sells tea boxes that are hand-decorated by its rehab clients. The attractive boxes are filled with kosher flavoured teas. A small one is $25 and a large on is $45.

"If I lived in Israel, I would be a [Yad Sarah] volunteer," Weisbart said. "They don't only loan medical equipment, they loan their hearts. I would like to hear from people who have been helped by Yad Sarah."

To purchase tea boxes or to donate to Yad Sarah, contact Canadian Friends of Yad Sarah at 416 781 6416.

Aurora woman will swim in support of breast cancer

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

Debbie Albaum of Aurora, is once again going to Swim for The Cure at the end of the month, to raise money for breast cancer research.

Swim For The Cure, now in its sixth year, invites participants to swim whatever distance they feel comfortable with, down the Severn River near Coldwater, Ont., (north-west of Orillia). This year's swim will be July 29.

"Last year, because it was my first year, the eight-kilometre swim took me about 4½ hours. I want to do the full 13-kilometre swim this year," she said. "It's equivalent to just over 500 lengths. It's a lot of swimming, but it's for a great cause." This year, she expects the swim to take her more than six hours.

Albaum, who is a dental hygienist, raised approximately $600 for breast cancer research last year, and she hopes to raise $1,000 this time.

"I'm still collecting [sponsorship], but I'm hoping to at least surpass what I had last year," said Albaum, who had received $400 worth of donations at the time of the interview. "I'm still collecting. There are people who are still giving and money outstanding, so I don't know exactly how much [I'll end up raising]."

Dr. Marla Shapiro, medical specialist on CTV and host of Balance on the same network, is a survivor of breast cancer. She was Albaum's inspiration for the 2005 swim.

"When I had [finished the swim last year], I wrote her an e-mail because she's really been my inspiration. I think she's just a wonderful person – very well balanced. I watch her TV show all the time," Albaum said. "I wrote, telling her that my swim was dedicated to her last year because she had developed breast cancer, and I believe she's fought it."

"It was really nice. I will be thinking about her when I do my swim again this year," she said.

Event organizer Debbie Bang said the swim has raised a total of $51,000 for breast cancer research in its five years.

In 2005, Swim For The Cure's most successful year, there were 26 participants and $14,000 was raised. So far, nine people have signed up for the 2006 swim, but Bang expects that figure to jump to 20.

All participants must have a boat, canoe, kayak or paddleboat in the water beside them to monitor their well-being during the swim.

Albaum's colleagues, Steve Sedore and Leah Tallon, will be Albaum's crew for the second year.

Members of the Orillia district of the Canadian Cancer Society will be on hand at the event to collect donations in support of breast cancer.

Debbie Albaum

Albaum will begin her swim at 6 a.m. in order to make it to her 12-year-old daughter Erin's baseball game in Niagara Falls later that day

"It's a two-hour drive to Niagara Falls afterward. My mom is going to have to help me drive out there cause I'm probably going to be falling asleep. It's going to be a very interesting day for me," she said.

Albaum said that while the swim can be gruelling at times, the cause makes it all worthwhile.

"For the first part of the swim, it's amazing because your muscles are stiff and you're trying to warm up. The second part of the swim I start to think about what I'm making for dinner that night. By the time I get to the middle or end of the swim, I'm in so much pain that that becomes the point when I start to think of all these [people] and the pain and the trials and tribulations of everything related to the cancers and the pain [they endure]," she said. "My heart is going to be with them."

Torontonian enters unique Israeli medical program

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Toronto native Ilana Pister will join a class of medical students in Israel this month to learn how to advance global health and provide medical care to diverse communities around the world.

Pister, with a degree in biophysics from Yeshiva University, will learn about international health issues, including infectious diseases, nutrition, disease prevention and humanitarian emergencies, at the Ben-Gurion University of the Negev Faculty of Health Sciences Medical School for International Health in collaboration with Columbia University Medical Center.

"They have classes that are specifically designed for international medicine and teach you to interact with different cultures and how to deal with communities that have no idea what western medicine is," Pister said.

"They have their own methods of dealing with whatever ailments they have. [The classes teach you] how to approach the situation, because you don't want to insult anyone, but you want to provide them with the proper care."

At only 22, Pister has volunteered as an ambassador at Mount Sinai Hospital in New York, worked as a laboratory assistant at Brookhaven National Laboratory, co-authored two published research articles, and presented at both the annual meeting of the American Chemical Society and the American Physical Society.

After deciding that finishing her education in Israel was something she wanted to do, she discovered the Ben-Gurion University program.

"I was looking into programs in Israel and I saw this one, and it really interested me because it is directed at international medicine," she said.

"Going into medicine, I thought you're really able to help someone because you're providing medicine to populations that don't normally get it."

The medical school, located on the Be'er Sheva campus, offers a four-year "American-style" curriculum to accommodate the international student body.

"This is an American-modelled program as opposed to the Israeli-European system, where there is no undergrad and medical school. You just do it all at the same time over six or seven years. But for this program, you have to have a bachelor's," Pister explained.

While students are free to decide where they want to do their residency after completing the program, they are required to complete a two-month clerkship in less-developed communities in Ethiopia, Kenya, India, Israel, Nepal or Peru, during their fourth year.

"I think I'll wait a little bit longer before I make a final decision on that," she said about choosing where she wants to do her clerkship.

"One thing I did think of, is [that] I did some research in a lab, with parasites found in South America, so I thought that might be interesting."

Not only were the students given the opportunity to get to know each other before meeting in Israel, they were also educated about the crisis in Sudan while spending an afternoon at the National Mall during the protest.

"Because of the nature of the program, it seemed like something we'd be interested in doing," she said, adding that another group of classmates who live on the West Coast met in Seattle for the Darfur rally there.

She said after meeting only a handful of her future classmates, she was very impressed with them.

"It looked like they really hand-picked people for the program. We're all at different levels. One has done a master's and one has spent the last four years working all over the world," Pister said.

"I just like that everyone brings something unique to the group."

Food, Scrumptious Food

Reisman stresses importance of balance, moderation

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

According to weight loss maven Rose Reisman, you can have your cake and eat it, too.

The Toronto-based lifestyle guru and media personality – she's the new face for McCain Foods – preached a message of balance and moderation at a recent cooking demonstration held by the Holy Blossom Temple Sisterhood.

Proceeds from the event, which drew about 100 people, went to the Reena Foundation and the One Family Fund, which aids Israeli victims of terror.

The evening culminated with coffee and low-calorie desserts based on recipes from Reisman's various cookbooks.

An award-winning and prolific cookbook author, Reisman has written 15 books and raised more than $1 million for breast cancer through the sale of her books. The most recent, Secrets for Permanent Weight Loss (Whitecap 2006), includes advice on weight loss, health, and longevity, along with 150 recipes.

Reisman, a mother of four, made her name by creating low-calorie recipes with great taste. At Holy Blossom, she shared her weight loss know-how, offering advice on serving up healthy, appealing meals, along with lifestyle tips that foster weight loss.

She confessed that she, too, has struggled with her weight over the years.

"I would go up and down 15 pounds every 1½ to two years," she said. "I avoided the scale."

However, Reisman said she recently managed to lose the weight and this time it has stayed off for two years because of lifestyle changes she has made.

She stressed the importance of exercising and eating most of your daily calories early in the day. "I only take a little bite of food after 7 [p.m.]." Between 8 and 9 p.m., you shouldn't have more than 200 calories, she added.

Reisman does make adjustments in her eating, however, to accommodate social functions. She said it's all part of a lifestyle of moderation that allows for social engagements and holidays, rather than strict rigidity around food.

She cautioned people to beware of extremes in eating behaviour. "Don't become carb-phobic," she advised.

She suggested that people choose complex carbohydrates such as vegetables and whole grains, "which keep you full longer." She also recommended eating a good dose of protein, which will not cause weight gain.

"Protein is not the culprit," she noted.

As for creating low-calorie foods that taste good, Reisman has a variety of ways to cut back on fat, from choosing ingredients packed in water to using small quantities of foods that are high in taste to add a culinary spark to a dish. For example, she will add small amounts of brie cheese or candied pecans to salads so that there is "something rich in every mouthful."

CAULIFLOWER MASH WITH CARAMELIZED ONIONS AND ROASTED GARLIC

1 head of garlic, skin on
2 tsp. vegetable oil
2 cups of sliced sweet onions
2 tsp. brown sugar, packed
1 tsp. balsamic vinegar
½ tsp. cinnamon
1½ lb. of cauliflower florets, chipped (about 6 cups)
¼ cup of vegetable or chicken stock
1 tbsp. olive oil
⅛ tsp. salt
⅛ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
Garnish: 3 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley

Preheat oven to 425. Wrap garlic in aluminum foil and bake 25 minutes, or just until tender. Cool, then squeeze out garlic. Set aside. In a non-stick skillet sprayed with vegetable spray, heat oil over medium high heat and cook onions for 5 minutes. Stir in brown sugar, balsamic vinegar and cinnamon. Reduce heat to medium low and cook until onions are golden, about 10 minutes.

Steam or boil cauliflower just until tender, about 7 to 5 minutes. Drain and place in a food processor with stock, olive oil, salt and pepper. Puree until smooth. Stir in the onions and garlic until combined. Garnish with parsley. Serves 6.

1 lb. butternut squash, peeled and cut in 2-inch cubes
1 red bell pepper, cored and cut in 4 wedges
1 yellow bell pepper, cored and cut in 4 wedges
1 large sweet onion cut in 8 wedges

Dressing
1 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
1 tbsp. olive oil
1 tbsp. pure maple syrup
½ tsp. cinnamon

IDF forces foil infiltration attempt on northern border

By YAAKOV KATZ
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — IDF forces foiled an infiltration attempt by Hezbollah operatives near an Israel Defence Forces post close to Zar'it on the northern border on Friday.

Troops opened fire toward the infiltrators and clashes erupted in the area.

Meanwhile, fighter bombers blasted Beirut International Airport in the third attack on the nation's sole international facility since the military offensive was launched against Lebanon three days before.

Airport officials said one of the three runways was hit with two missiles, and Lebanese eyewitnesses reported that a nearby residential building was struck in the raid. No casualties were reported.

About an hour before Friday's raid, the five remaining Airbus jets belonging to the national carrier Middle East Airlines flew to Amman for safety reasons, officials said.

Earlier, the air force struck the main Hezbollah headquarters building in Beirut as well as an adjacent structure that housed security guards.

The IDF said that the headquarters, which was in the Shiite neighbourhood of Dahiya, was used to direct terrorism around the world.

Police said that three people were killed and 55 wounded in overnight air strikes against the Lebanese capital's southern suburbs where Hezbollah has its strongholds.

Israel widened its offensive on Lebanon early Friday with an air strike on the southern suburbs of the capital that are strongholds of Hezbollah and a raid on a large fuel storage tank at a power station, police and witnesses said.

The impact of at least seven missiles were heard in the attack on south Beirut in the hours before dawn on Friday, according to an AP photographer, reporter and other witnesses. Anti-aircraft fire from the ground echoed in other suburbs of Beirut as the planes roared over the Lebanese capital. Hezbollah's Al-Manar TV said there were several injuries from the attacks, which started fires in the area. Some of the wounded were hit in their apartments by flying glass.

Lebanese police officials, who were talking on condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to speak to the media, confirmed the air raid.

Some news reports said a playground where Hezbollah leaders hold rallies for thousands of their supporters was also targeted.

Israeli officials had warned that south Beirut, a densely populated neighbourhood of Shiite Muslims where Hezbollah has its political headquarters, could be targeted. Leaflets dropped in the evening told people to stay away from Hezbollah offices.

Early Friday, an Israeli plane also fired a missile at a fuel storage tank for the power station at Jiye on the Mediterranean coast in central Lebanon, just north of the port city of Sidon, witnesses said.

The attack started a huge fire in the area, about 20 miles south of the Lebanese capital, but the power station itself was not hit. There were no immediate reports of casualties.

Late last Thursday evening, three people were reportedly killed when the air force bombed the highway linking Beirut to the Syrian capital of Damascus, closing the country's main artery.

IDF fighter jets attacked a highway section high in the mountains of central Lebanon, in Mdeirej. The targeted area was an old road extension, and the bridge on the nearby main highway remained intact, the officials said.

Another air strike apparently targeted the main bridge's exit. Authorities turned back motorists, who had to take long detours through other winding mountain roads.

Because of the darkness, it was not immediately clear what the extent of damage on the main highway was. Authorities said they were turning back motorists as a precautionary measure.

Earlier last Thursday night, the IDF began bombing Beirut's southern neighborhoods following the firing of two rockets at the northern Israeli city of Haifa.

Navy gunboats shelled Beirut's airport for the second time Thursday. Witnesses reported that two fuel tanks were hit, while large flames could be seen at the airport.

Following a day of Katyusha rockets raining on northern Israel on Thursday, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert approved the widening of the scope of IDF targets in Lebanon.

"The air force is ready for any operation that will be necessary during the current military campaign against Lebanon," Brig.-Gen. Yohanan Locker, commander of the Israeli air force told the Jerusalem Post last Thursday night.

Locker revealed that fighter jets, helicopters and AWAC surveillance planes had participated in hundreds of airborne operations over Lebanon since two soldiers were kidnapped and eight others killed in a Hezbollah attack along the northern border last Wednesday.

Palestinians cheer Hezbollah attack

By KHALED ABU TOAMEH
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Palestinians across the political spectrum welcomed the kidnapping of the two IDF soldiers by Hezbollah and expressed optimism that the move would lead to the release of thousands of prisoners from Israeli jails.

Spokespeople for a number of armed and political groups also expressed their hope that the Arabs and Muslims would eventually join the fight against Israel.

Both Fatah and Hamas officials hailed the attack as "heroic" and urged Hezbollah not to release the soldiers unless Israel agreed to free all Palestinian prisoners.

In several places in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, Palestinians took to the streets to celebrate the kidnapping of the two soldiers and to voice their support for Hezbollah.

Families of prisoners gathered outside the offices of the Palestinian Legislative Council in Gaza City and handed out sweets to passers-by.

"This is a great day for the Palestinian people," said Um Amjad, whose son Muhammed has been in prison for nearly 10 years. "We want to thank [Hezbollah Secretary General] Hassan Nasrallah for this wonderful gift and we hope that today's heroic operation will result in the release of all our sons from Israeli prisons."

Also in Gaza City, gunmen belonging to various Palestinian groups opened fire into the air as an expression of joy and called on Hezbollah and Hamas to kidnap more soldiers.

Palestinian lawyers and human rights organizations reported that thousands of prisoners held in Israeli jails began chanting and dancing as soon they heard about the abduction of the two soldiers.

"The prisoners are celebrating because they feel that they will be released soon now that Israel has three soldiers in captivity," said a Bethlehem-based lawyer who represents security prisoners. "They feel that they are close than ever to freedom."

The Hamas government said in a statement that the Hezbollah attack was a "natural response to Israeli crimes against our people in the Palestinian territories."

Federations start emergency funds

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and FEDERATION CJA in Montreal have established emergency Israel crisis relief funds to help residents of northern and southern Israel who are facing rocket fire from Hezbollah, Hamas and other Palestinian organizations.

Haifa is recovering from a Katyusha rocket barrage, and missiles have already struck more than a dozen Israeli communities. As of The CJN's deadline, more than 100 people have been injured and two people have been killed in rocket strikes by terror groups.

In Toronto, the fund will help send children from communities facing rocket fire to camp in other parts of Israel and be used to provide such things as toys, books and games for bomb shelters. The weekly cost of camp for one child is $350 (US). Donations will also be designated for other requirements as needs increase.

CJA FEDERATION in Montreal has also set up a fund to help provide social and recreational activities for children during the crisis, particularly in Israel's north.

In Toronto, contributions can be made at www.ujadonations.com/israelcrisis or by calling 416-631-5705. In Montreal, call 514-735-3541.

An opportunity to restore deterrence

By EFRAIM INBAR
Jerusalem Post

Comment

The artillery barrage by Hezbollah on Israeli villages along the Lebanese border, and the killings and kidnapping of Israeli soldiers there, come as no surprise. Military intelligence has warned about such a scenario time and again. Nevertheless, July 12 saw a military fiasco, coming just two weeks after the attack at Kerem Shalom on the Gaza border and compounding the problems of grappling with the chaos there.

Israel seems to be caught in a war – albeit a limited one – on two fronts. This has already required a partial mobilization of the reserve force. The relatively new government headed by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, which includes the inexperienced defence minister, Amir Peretz, faces its first serious challenge.

The option of a prisoners' swap has become untenable politically. This government is unlikely to give in to the demands of Hamas and Hezbollah because much more is at stake than the lives of three soldiers.

Beyond the importance Olmert and Peretz attach to their political careers, they understand that Israel must restore a modicum of deterrence and its ability to secure some tranquility for its citizens living along the borders.

Indeed, the kidnapping of the soldiers provides the trigger to deal with larger strategic issues. In Gaza, it is the Qassam rockets, and in Lebanon, it is Hezbollah's missile arsenal that pose serious threats to a large part of the country.

For some time, the defence establishment has considered the Hezbollah armaments an important enough target to justify pre-emptive action. Therefore, the removal of the missile threat and the perceived strategic parity that has constrained Israel's reaction to past Hezbollah provocations must be the primary goal of an Israeli invasion of southern Lebanon.

Eliminating the Hezbollah missile threat will allow greater freedom of action against Syria and Iran. The "search and destroy" mode of operation required for capturing and/or destroying the missiles hidden in numerous locations necessitates the use of ground forces. But, of course, even their cautious employment under an aerial umbrella might be costly. To a large extent the success of Israeli actions in Lebanon will be measured by the counting of casualties.

Israel may well capitalize on its missile hunt in Lebanon to expand the goal of the operations. Israeli threats to seriously punish Hezbollah probably mean targeting its leadership. A "gloves off" policy to decapitate Hezbollah could paralyze this terrorist organization for several years. This would clearly signal Israel's determination to deal with terrorist threats and with Iranian proxies.

A further expansion of goals concerns Syria – the channel for Iranian support to Hezbollah. Damascus still hosts the headquarters of Hamas and Islamic Jihad, despite promising the Americans a few years ago to close their offices.

Israel may enjoy much freedom of action versus Syria because Syria frustrated the American and French attempts to limit its influence in Lebanon in their quest to restore Lebanon's independence. Washington, in particular, may relish military pressure on a Bashar Assad regime in Syria that allows infiltration of insurgents into Iraq from its territory.

Syrian targets could be attacked by an Israeli Air Force that could easily suppress the Syrian air defences and acquire aerial supremacy. Israel may also decide the time is ripe for attacking the Syrian long-range missile infrastructure, whose threat hovers over most of Israel.

Escalation has often been the Israeli response to the wars of attrition waged by its enemies. A successful Israeli military operation in Lebanon and in Syria would have many ripple effects in the region. Radicals advocating terror against militarily superior powers could be constrained. The Palestinians might pay attention and calibrate their goals accordingly.

Perhaps most important would be the impact on a nuclear-aspirant Iran that seems to believe that it can defy a modern military force. It has been some time since Israel had a resounding military success. Hezbollah may have provided the opportunity, and hopefully the IDF can meet the challenge.

Necessary steps for Israel

By MICHAEL OREN

Analysis

For the first time since the Yom Kippur War in 1973, Israel is facing hostilities on two fronts. The exceedingly volatile situation is liable to embroil other Middle Eastern states, culminating in a regional conflict similar to that of the 1967 Six-Day War.

Faced with such a prospect, Israel could yield to international appeals for restraint and allow tensions to subside. By doing so, however, it would accelerate a process by which Syrian- and Iranian-backed terrorist groups in Gaza, the West Bank and Lebanon can keep the country in a state of perpetual military mobilization, paralyzing it economically and deepening its diplomatic isolation. To deny the terrorists this victory, and indeed to survive, Israel must take bold action to fundamentally alter the security situation on its northern and southern borders.

Paradoxically, Israel has been attacked from the two territories from which it unilaterally withdrew with the approval of much of the international community. Since the pullout of Israeli forces from southern Lebanon in May 2000, Hezbollah terrorists have periodically fired rockets at civilian targets in Israel and ambushed soldiers across the U.N.-recognized border. Since the withdrawal from Gaza last year, Hamas and other Palestinian groups have fired more than 1,000 rockets into Israeli territory and have repeatedly attempted to conduct terrorist raids across the border.

Israel refrained from large-scale military reprisals for this aggression, confident of having won international goodwill through its withdrawals and fearful of being dragged back into the Lebanese and Gazan morasses. But Israelis have learned that unprovoked violence against them raises little outcry in the world and that failure to react to isolated acts of terror invites unremitting terror.

Today a united Hezbollah-Hamas axis has emerged, financed and trained by Syria and Iran, with the goal of destabilizing Israel and frustrating its efforts to disengage from the conflict. In spite of the perils that this front poses to Israel, and the ethical dilemmas that fighting it raises, Israel can transform the situation into one that promotes both domestic and regional stability.

In countering Hamas and Hezbollah, Israel has little choice but to strike at those who authorize the attacks: the heads of those organizations. Both Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh in Gaza and Hezbollah leader Sheik Hasan Nasrallah in Lebanon appear indifferent to their own peoples' safety. For propaganda purposes, they order rocket crews to operate in densely populated areas so that Israeli retaliation will inflict the maximum number of civilian casualties. But these leaders remain extremely reluctant to pay for terror with their own lives, a fact that Israel discovered when its policy of targeted assassinations compelled Hamas to agree to a ceasefire.

By contrast, punishing the Palestinian and Lebanese peoples collectively, as Israel has been doing, only strengthens their support for terror while creating painful ethical problems for Israelis. And negotiating with the terrorists for their hostages' release merely encourages them to kidnap more Israelis. Ultimately, Israel has no alternative other than convincing these leaders that terror incurs a personal cost.

But even targeted assassinations are no substitute for deterring state sponsors of terror. Israel cannot hope for quiet along its borders as long as Hamas leaders continue to direct terror with impunity from Damascus and as long as Hezbollah receives orders from Syria and Iran.

Efforts by the United States, the United Nations and the European Union to dissuade Iran and Syria from activating their terrorist agents have consistently proved ineffective. Therefore, Israel has no realistic option but to convince these states that the price of promoting aggression is prohibitive. If Israeli soldiers and civilians are the targets of Iranian- and Syrian-backed terror, then the Iranian and Syrian militaries must become targets for Israel.

By eliminating the terrorist leaderships in Gaza and southern Lebanon and deterring Syria and Iran from prodding their proxies to war, Israel can restore a reasonable level of security to its citizens. Such measures will also be implicitly welcomed by Israel's Jordanian and Egyptian neighbours, who are similarly threatened by these same terrorist groups. Only by establishing a new and more stable status quo along Israel's borders can Prime Minister Ehud Olmert proceed with his plan of redrawing those borders permanently, either unilaterally or in cooperation with a non-violent Palestinian partner.

Nasrallah may be a target

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Israel's Justice Minister Haim Ramon suggested July 13 that Hezbollah leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah was a target for assassination.

"Hezbollah is a target wherever it is located in Lebanon, in Tripoli, in Beirut, in every place," Ramon told Army Radio. Asked whether Nasrallah was a target, Ramon said, "All those who plan the attacks, all those who allow such terror activities, are also a target."

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said that day that Israel's military operation in Lebanon was designed to move Hezbollah away from the northern border and force the Lebanese government to deploy its troops to take control of South Lebanon.

"We have a goal," Livni said. "The goal is to move Hezbollah out of southern Lebanon." Livni, speaking to Channel 2 soon after a rocket hit Haifa, said that during a cabinet meeting on July 12 where the Israel Defence Forces operations in Lebanon were approved, the ministers took into consideration that Hezbollah would make good on threats to hit Israeli cities in the north.

A communiqué issued after that meeting said, "The new reality in which Israel is operating requires special readiness, especially in light of the possibility that the enemy will seek to attack the home front."

"We had no other choice," Livni said of the army's operations. "For a number of years, Israel waited, as Hezbollah was arming itself, for the Lebanese government to move it out of southern Lebanon."

Livni said Hezbollah was not only an issue on the Lebanese border. "Hezbollah is a proxy of Iran and Syria with an open front with Israel, and Nasrallah wants to become a regional leader and block any possibility for an agreement. He is a regional provocateur; it was impossible to continue with it anymore. We had to respond, and that is what we are doing today."

She said that the operation was not intended to avenge the July 12 attacks, in which two soldiers were captured and eight were killed, but had larger strategic goals. "There will be a point of time where the Lebanese government will need to decide that Hezbollah does not promote Lebanon, is a burden on the Lebanese people and the Lebanese government, and that they will need to send the army south to areas that are now empty."

Livni said that as a result of the IDF's actions, the Lebanese government can no longer claim it doesn't have the ability to dislodge Hezbollah from the south, since to a large degree the IDF has already done that.

Part two of a series

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

ADDIS ABABA — For eight of her 18 years, Felaguche Abe Amara has waited. And waited.

When she was a little girl growing up in a rural area of Gonder province, she tended sheep. Now, she lives in a cramped one-room shanty whose only decorations are newspaper and magazine articles that wallpaper the 12-by-12-foot room. The floor consists of hard-packed dirt covered in green strands of a grass-like plant. Two beds are crammed into the space along with what appears to be a vinyl bench, now tattered with its stuffing seeping out. She shares the room with her mother and three brothers.

There is no indoor plumbing and potable water is available at a communal tap nearby.

When she considers her fate, she acknowledges life was a lot better in Gonder. But there is one advantage to her current situation – it's in Addis Ababa and it's a lot closer to the Israeli embassy, through which Falash Mora en route to Israel pass.

Felaguche is among the thousands of would-be Falash Mora immigrants who hope to one day leave Ethiopia for the Holy Land. Her father and half-sisters are already there, but she and her Christian mother have been turned down. Falash Mora are the descendants of Ethiopian Jews who converted over the past 100 years or so to Christianity.

Speaking through interpreter Micha Feldman, who organized the Operation Solomon mass evacuation of Ethiopian Jews in 1991, Felaguche said that "we left our village to move to Addis according to the promise that God gave that [Israel] will be the land we will live in."

Although her father lives in Ashdod, Israel, she is ineligible to make aliyah because her mother is Christian. "When I was a child, I did not go to church, but my mother did," she said.

Felaguche and her mother are unable to immigrate to Israel under that country's Law of Return, which applies to Jews. And because she has no maternal Jewish ancestry, she is unable to move to Israel under the country's current immigration policy vis-a-vis Ethiopians, which was adopted in January 2005, Feldman said.

Instead, she and her family in Addis are living in harsh conditions – to be fair, many Ethiopians seem to reside in the same kind of shanties – hoping that one day Israel will change its immigration policy.

Six other families from Gonder live near them in a compound not far from the centre of town. Felaguche said her family was inspired to move to Addis after several relatives did so and were accepted for aliyah.

Up to a year-and-a-half ago, she attended school, but that facility has closed and she can't afford classes anywhere else. She spends much of her time at a clinic in the Israeli embassy compound, where prospective olim receive medical treatment, are vaccinated and are educated about personal hygiene. An aspiring actress who hopes to pursue a career in theatre in Israel, Felaguche and two others perform an AIDS awareness skit to educate Falash Mora about the dangers of the sexually transmitted disease.

Working in the clinic is tough on her: "We see people leave, we want to leave already," she said.

Returning to Gonder, however, is out of the question. As Feldman explained, "if they go back, no one will accept them. It's also a question of honour. They can't go back."

* * *

In the departure lounge in Addis Ababa's international airport, hundreds of Falash Mora sit quietly waiting for the boarding announcement for the two flights that will take them to Israel that night.

Yezina Birhanu is there with her husband and four children. She grew up in northeastern Ethiopia near the border with Sudan in an area generally not considered an area of Falash Mora settlement. She's been living in Addis Ababa for eight years, anticipating this moment.

Her parents are waiting for them in Israel – they've been there four years.

Asked why she is moving to Israel, she said, "It's by the order of God. All Jews should go to Israel."

Honalign Atalo, 20, has been in Addis for nine years waiting for approval to make aliyah. Born in Gonder, he said, "I want to be in Israel. Life is better there."

An aunt and uncle preceded him. They have been living in Netanya for three years.

Looking around the departure lounge, Honalign said that "today everyone is happy because they are making aliyah to Israel."

* * *

Waganesh Fenta, whose name translates loosely as "you are a prize," hails from the village of Wollo in eastern Gonder. As Micha Feldman translates her story, she reveals that her mother is Christian and remains in her village. "I was raised Christian," she said, "but I am ready to be Jewish."

She said she has been in Addis six years waiting to be reunited with relatives – an aunt and an uncle in Israel. However, her mother is still back in the village and Feldman, an old hand at Ethiopia immigration, shakes his head that Waganesh has been found eligible to immigrate to Israel.

"Hashem sheli Adisu [my name is Adisu]," the 27-year-old writes in Hebrew in my notebook. Adisu has been waiting eight years in a town near Addis for the flight to Israel. His parents are in the Jewish state and he has lots of other relatives in Ashdod and Haifa. To prepare himself for life in a new country, he has been studying Hebrew. He knows that "it is hard to live in Israel without work," but his dream is sports. A long distance runner with a specialty in 5,000-metre races, he plans to continue his athletic career.

* * *

At the other end on this night's aliyah, a couple of dozen former Ethiopians wait in the arrival level at Ben-Gurion Airport for the passengers from two recent flights to arrive. Wadoo Ayala, 39, was born in Gonder and arrived in Israel in 1998. He lives in Ashdod and he is waiting this day for his sister, her husband and two young children. In all, he has been waiting eight years for his sister to join him in Israel.

His mother, another sister and brother already live in Israel and one sister remains in Ethiopia, waiting for permission to join them.

Habtamis Worku is likewise waiting in anticipation of the arrival of family from Gonder. "It's difficult, it's hard," he said of the 15-year separation from his sister, who is coming with her husband and two children.

Asked if the family is Jewish or Christian, he replies that they "always felt Jewish."

A factory worker, Habtamis said life has been hard in Israel. But he always encouraged his sister to join him. "Even if life is not good here, come here, the family is here," he told her.

Looking back on their lives in a tiny village near Gargora, in the Gonder region of Ethiopia, Habtamis said some Beta Israel converted to Christianity and lived as Christians. "But in the end, they are Beta Israel."

His view echoes a finding by Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, a former Sephardi Chief Rabbi of Israel, who has ruled that the Falash Mora remain "the seed of Israel."

Habtamis reclaimed his Jewish roots in Israel, eventually converting to Judaism.

Leo Salomon was part of the first wave of Ethiopian immigrants to Israel – the group that largely departed Ethiopia on foot and experienced numerous hardships before a secret airlift arranged by the Mossad brought them to the Promised Land in 1984. Some 4,000 Beta Israel died – many in Sudanese refugee camps – during that exodus.

Salomon was a youngster when he moved to Israel and over the course of his life there, he joined the Israel Defence Forces and rose to the rank of captain. He is married with three children.

He's back in Gonder now, an employee of Israel's Ministry of the Interior whose job it is to interview the Ethiopians who have applied to make aliyah.

"Not only people connected to the Jewish people want to go to Israel, but also their friends and neighbours," he said in his modest office in the Jewish Agency compound in Gonder. "Israel has a lot of appeal, so we have to check everyone.

"Beside interviews, we do a lot of social work, as it is hard to say no to someone who feels they have the right to go to Israel."

He and a colleague try to deal sensitively with those who will be disappointed by their decisions. But, he explained, "Israel can't give refuge to everyone. It has to take care of its own. So it's the hard part of the job to tell them no and to settle themselves back in Ethiopia."

Israel Briefs

Immigrant killed in attack

One of the people killed in a Hezbollah rocket attack on northern Israel was an Argentine immigrant. Monica Saidman, 47, died July 13 when a rocket hit her apartment in Nahariya. The Jewish Agency for Israel in Argentina said Saidman immigrated to Israel three years ago with her husband, Dario, and their youngest daughter, a teenager, after Argentina's 2001 economic crisis. A second person, unidentified as of The CJN's deadline, was also killed in a rocket attack on Safed.

IDF hostages still alive

Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Dan Halutz Halutz said July 13 that soldiers Ehud Goldwasser, 31, and Eldad Regev, 25, who had been kidnapped by Hezbollah the day before, were still alive. "We know the soldiers are alive and we hold the Lebanese government completely responsible," he said on a tour of the north. The body of one of four soldiers killed in the July 12 attack was retrieved by the army, which was struggling to evacuate the bodies of all the soldiers from the vehicles in which they were killed due to ongoing fighting and rocket attacks in the area.

Soldiers identified

The soldiers killed July 12 in an attack by Hezbollah across Israel's border were Sgt. First Class (res.) Benin Eyal, 22, of Be'er Sheva; Sgt. First Class (res.) Torjeman Shani, 24, of Beit She'an; First Sgt. Nazel Wasim, 27, of Yanuach; Sgt. Nimrod Cohen, 19, of Mizpe Shalom; Staff Sgt. Gadi Moisayev, 19, of Acco; Staff Sgt. Alexei Koshnirski, 21, of Nes Ziona; Staff Sgt. Shlomi Yirmiyahu, 20, of Rishon Letzion; and Staff Sgt. Yaniv Bar On, 19, of Maccabim.

'Two states' called irrelevant

Israel must abandon the two-state paradigm when it comes to dealing with the Palestinians, its former military chief said. "The two-state paradigm is not relevant," Moshe Ya'alon said at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, where he has been a fellow since leaving the military last year. "Israel should issue a new paradigm." Asked to elaborate, he said one scenario could involve a regional arrangement among Israel, Jordan, the Palestinians and possibly Egypt. He said the Hamas regime, Iran's increased role and Palestinian instability made Palestinian statehood unrealistic for now. He said Israel should establish a "defensible-borders" policy, which would include a heightened military presence in the West Bank and pressure on the international community to recognize Israeli sovereignty in West Bank areas close to Israeli population centres.

Amnesty criticizes Israel

Amnesty International criticized Israel's military retaliation against Lebanon and called on Hezbollah to treat captured Israeli soldiers humanely. "Israel must put an end to attacks against civilians and against civilian infrastructure in Lebanon, which constitute collective punishment," the group's Malcolm Smart was quoted as saying. The group also said Hezbollah should allow Red Cross officials to meet with the hostages, as per the Geneva Conventions.

Film fest celebrates Canadian talent

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — The 23rd Jerusalem Film Festival (JFF) opened with a bang on July 6. Thousands of moviegoers gathered for a loud and colourful fireworks display at the Merrill Hassenfeld Amphitheater at Sultan's Pool, sandwiched between the retaining walls of the Old City and the upscale German Colony neighbourhood, to kick off the 10-day celebration of cinema with the debut screening of Someone to Run With, by Israeli director Oded Davidoff.

But Davidoff was not the only director honoured at the festival's opening event. Two great Canadian film talents were also singled out: director Atom Egoyan and producer Robert Lantos, who each received an achievement award for his contribution to the cinematic arts.

Lantos and Egoyan were two of the nine Canadian celebrities in the JFF's Canadian Retrospective program this year, in which each participant introduced one of his or her films and followed it up with a post-screening question and answer period with the audience. The other Candians were actresses Kim Cattrall (who played Samantha in HBO's Sex in the City), Arsinee Khanjian (Exotica, 1994) and Marie Josée Croze (Ararat, 2002); director/producer Simcha Jacobovici (who debuted his new documentary The Exodus Decoded, which presents evidence to suggest that the biblical Exodus actually did occur), actor Paul Gross (Due South, 1994); producer Denise Roberts (The Barbarian Invasions, 2003); and director Patricia Rozema (Mansfield Park, 1999).

"It was very moving for me to be honoured in that environment," said Lantos, at a private luncheon for the Canadian guests at the posh Te'enim Restaurant in Yemin Moshe the day after the festival opening. Lantos, a longtime Zionist who first visited Israel in 1969 as a water polo player for Canada at the Maccabiah Games, organized the star-studded mission with help from the JFF, Israel's ministries of Foreign Affairs and Tourism, the Canadian Embassy in Tel Aviv, the Canada-Israel Committee and El Al Airlines.

"The festival provided the perfect opportunity for me to expose my influential Canadian colleagues to Israel," Lantos said. "The best way to combat the onslaught of propaganda about Israel that passes for fact in the western world is to bring people here to see the country with their own eyes. You can't spend a week here and walk away thinking that the country shouldn't exist. On the contrary, you invariably walk away with the realization that Israel must exist – even if you are not a Jew."

Lantos' method proved effective. "This is a spectacular country," said Gross, whose participation in the festival marked his first trip to Israel. "The sense we get of Israel from the media – that it is hopeless and miserable and awful is totally inaccurate. The spirit here is unlike anything I ever imagined. It's very exciting."

Egoyan, who last visited Israel in 1988 when he screened Family Viewing (1986) at the 18th JFF, expressed similar sentiments. "The image that a lot of people in Canada have of Israel is that it's a really dangerous time to visit. I think that makes the trip here all the more important," he said. "To be fearful is to become a victim of the hype, and as cultural figures, it is our role to somehow transcend that hype."

Egoyan's contribution to the effort included calling all of his Canadian friends from his cellphone at the festival opening, while the fireworks exploded in the background. "I have a droll sense of humour," he said with a wink.

In addition to attending screenings and other festival events, the Canadian delegation crammed in a whirlwind tour that included Masada, the Old City, the Israel Museum and the Yad Vashem Holocaust Museum.

Yad Vashem was the most touching and controversial stop for Egoyan, who, like his wife, Khanjian, is of Armenian descent. Egoyan's Ararat – the film selected to screen at the JFF – deals with the Armenian Genocide 1915-1917, when the Ottoman Turks deported and murdered 1.5 million Armenians. Because of its political relations with Turkey, Israel officially does not recognize that genocide.

"There is a huge connection between Jews and Armenians, due in no small part to the tragedies in our respective histories," said Egoyan, in reference to the Holocaust and the Armenian Genocide. "We see Israel as a place where it is possible to have a national dream, to survive unbelievable traumatic circumstances and form a state. That is truly inspiring. But [our common histories make] Israel's active denial of the Armenian Genocide, absurd."

"Being in Israel is a very emotionally charged experience," said Khanjian, who was born in Beirut and first visited Israel with Egoyan in 1988. "There is a certain catharsis in visiting a people who have finally returned to their homeland. But if Israel wants the world to memorialize the Holocaust with the gravity of universal responsibility, it cannot for political purposes deny the tragedy and horrors that other peoples have endured. To deny the Armenian Genocide ultimately damages Israel's own remembrance process."

Khanjian believes it is remembrance and a love of history and storytelling that make Israeli filmmaking unique. "Jewish culture in general, and Israeli culture in particular, has this great love of telling history," she said. "There is an amazing talent pool in this country, and all sorts of amazing stories. Film is being used wonderfully for that purpose."

"Israeli film is booming," Lantos said. "In the last few years, Israelis have been making wonderful, inspiring films. I am very impressed."

Egoyan concurred, and said he wished he could say the same about films coming out of English Canada. He believes the English Canadian film industry – which because it shares a language with the United States finds itself competing with Hollywood – can learn from the Israeli film industry. "What's really impressive is that the last time I was here, no one in Israel went to see Israeli films, and since that time, they have been able to capture a huge domestic audience," he said. "We [in English Canada] look at what has happened in Israel with envy because that is exactly what we want – namely, to capture more domestic box office. Obviously someone has been doing something right in order to turn that around, and to get Israeli audiences to grace their own cinema."

Israeli filmmakers also stand to learn from their Canadian counterparts. "The festival provides a great opportunity for people in the local industry to get to know people from abroad. It's about mingling and getting to know each other, and hopefully, to build strong international relationships," said Eran Riklis, director of The Syrian Bride (2004). "When you have great guests from abroad – like this year, with our guests from Canada – it gives the festival a certain flavour, and really puts it on the map as an international film festival."

"That's what makes the festival so amazing," concluded Egoyan. "Film festivals are about different cultures interacting and discovering how different people experience the world. Historically, Jerusalem is a place that has been a real meeting point. So symbolically it is the ideal place to have a film festival."

Jaffa's fortunes tested relationship between Jews and Arabs

City of Oranges: Arabs and Jews in Jaffa* by Adam LeBor, Raincoast Books.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jaffa, Tel Aviv's next door neighbour, was once the cultural, political and spiritual capital of the Palestinian people. Ruled by a succession of conquerors from the Egyptians to the Ottomans, Jaffa was a hub of the Middle East as the first Arab-Israeli war broke out.

When Jaffa fell to Israeli forces on May 13, 1948, just a few thousand of its original population of about 100,000 Arab Muslims and Christians remained behind.

Adam LeBor

As Jaffa crumbled into decrepitude and Tel Aviv prospered, Jaffa's status as a redoubt of Palestinian nationalism faded into obscurity but was never really forgotten by the Palestinians who had departed.

Adam LeBor, a British journalist, has written a lively book about Jaffa's changing fortunes. City of Oranges: Arabs and Jews in Jaffa unfolds through the stories of six families – three Arab and three Jewish – that symbolize the sheer complexity of Israel's relationship with the Palestinians.

And while the stories of such families as the Arab Abulafias and the Jewish Chelouches are of interest and brimming with a certain nostalgic charm, City of Oranges is strongest in recounting Jaffa's long and intricate history.

As previous writers have pointed out, Tel Aviv was founded by Zionist pioneers in 1909 as a counterpoint to Jaffa, which was considered congested and unhygienic.

Jaffa was home to some 11,000 Muslims, about 3,000 Christians and the same number of Jews when an assimilated Austrian Jewish journalist named Theodor Herzl published The Jewish State in 1896.

By then, agriculture was the mainstay of Jaffa's economy. Peaches, figs, grapes, melons, almonds and vegetables were among the crops cultivated by farmers. But Jaffa was most famed for its shamouti and baladi oranges.

In 1917, fearing that allied armies would conquer Palestine, the Turkish authorities expelled the Jews of Jaffa, many of whom were foreign citizens.

Four years later, serious clashes broke out between Jews and Arabs, causing the deaths of 55 participants and bystanders, triggering a massive Jewish exodus from Jaffa to Tel Aviv and undermining hopes that Palestine could be mutually shared.

As LeBor observes, the 1936 Arab Revolt – in essence the first Palestinian uprising – forced the British to place Jaffa under curfew. By that juncture, Jaffa had already come under the influence of the fundamentalist Muslim Brotherhood.

Under the 1947 United Nations' Palestine partition plan, Jaffa was to have been included in a future Arab state.

But the Arabs rejected the proposal and proceeded to attack Jewish settlements. Jewish and Arab snipers in Jaffa and Tel Aviv traded shots, touching off the flight of middle-class Arabs to surrounding Arab countries. Many believed they would soon go back to their homes.

Interestingly enough, Jewish and Arab orange-grove owners signed a non-aggression agreement that enabled them to harvest and export their respective crops.

LeBor writes that Jaffa's Arab fighters were assisted by Bosnian Muslims and Palestinian Germans from old Templar colonies like Sarona and Walhalla, which had been established in the 19th century.

With Jaffa's surrender, the ornate Ottoman villas of the Ajami and Jebaliyyeh quarters fell into a sad state of disrepair. Many were taken over by new Jewish immigrants, mainly from Bulgaria. By 1949, virtually the entire Bulgarian community had settled in Israel.

Meanwhile, taking security and demographic considerations into mind, the Israeli government refused to permit Arab refugees to return to Jaffa.

The citrus groves survived the war, but since they required vast quantities of water and were a reminder of a Palestinian society that had been dispersed, most of the orange and lemon trees were uprooted for housing developments. Furthermore, Arab street names were replaced and named after Jewish heroes and rabbis, and Jaffa itself was amalgamated with Tel Aviv.

Manshiyyeh, Jaffa's northernmost quarter, which had been virtually destroyed during the war, was left as a pile of rubble. Ironically, one of the last original buildings standing there was converted into a museum extolling the Irgun, the right-wing Jewish militia that had seized Jaffa from the Arabs.

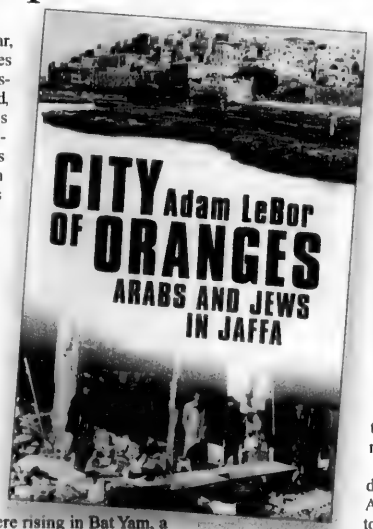
Conventional wisdom held that Arab houses in Jaffa should be bulldozed and replaced by cheap high-rise apartment buildings such as were rising in Bat Yam, a southern suburb of Tel Aviv.



But sanity prevailed and Tel Aviv's municipality agreed to preserve Old Jaffa as an artist and tourist quarter.

LeBor's account of this volte face is quite interesting, but he suggests that the majority of Tel Aviv's art dealers resisted the temptation to relocate to Jaffa.

As always, Jews and Arabs in Jaffa lived side by side but separately, with their lives usually intersecting only in commerce and business.

Today, two-thirds of Jaffa's 45,000 residents are Jewish, but the Arab birthrate is higher, as it is elsewhere in Israel.

LeBor reminds a reader that Jaffa is a high-crime area, a central node of Israel's drug trade and a place where Arab and Jewish criminal gangs co-operate. He quotes a Jewish police officer as saying, "If there was co-operation like that in the peace process, we would have peace by now."

During the opening days of the Al- Aqsa Palestinian uprising in 2000, Israeli Arab rioters blocked off Yefet Street, one of Jaffa's main thoroughfares, and hurled bricks and stones.

Across town, Jewish extremists tried to set fire to the Hasan Bek mosque in Manshiyyeh.

According to LeBor, these doleful events prompted Jews and Arabs to turn inward and some Jews to boycott Arab shops in Jaffa.

But long before the intifadah, a minority of Israeli Arabs in Jaffa had drifted toward radicalism and Islamic piety.

In ending, LeBor claims that Jaffa could yet become "the laboratory for a new Israel, even a new Middle East, where Arab and Jew, Israeli and Palestinian, learn not necessarily to love another, but at least to live alongside each other in peace."

It may be a faint dream, but hope springs eternal, even in Jaffa.

Stacey Farber back for sixth season of Degrassi

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

When I first hear Stacey Farber answer one of my questions, I begin to think she's been well media-trained. Or has become mature beyond her years, growing up on a TV set playing Ellie in the popular teen show Degrassi: The Next Generation.

She talks in solid sentences, instead of the usual fast chatter I hear from most 18-year-olds taking the TTC. "In hindsight, I'm happy I chose working on Degrassi than going to camp four years ago," she says, smoothing her red hair.

And certainly her fans, both in the United States and Canada, are also happy she made that decision. In the four years since her character first appeared on Degrassi, the ever-brooding Ellie has evolved into one of the more likable teen girls on the show.

Although Ellie sported fish-net stockings and Goth-style garb in the first two seasons, she replaced her morose mood with a more practical attitude. It was this transition that intrigued Farber.

"I love the change and I love being challenged," she says. "When I can put myself in someone else's shoes, that's what I like about being an actor."

Like many of the Degrassi ensemble, her real-life persona varies widely from the character she plays. Ellie is shy and can't make eye contact; Stacey is bubbly and won't break a gaze. Ellie prefers a sharp, sarcastic sense of humour; Stacey will act out sketches and comedy shows with her friends. For fun.

Stacey Farber

One more big difference: Ellie acts off instinct, while Stacey thinks ahead. Take this wild ride many call show business. Farber is already practical about how her career can change instantly.

Although she's back for the sixth season of Degrassi: The Next Generation (airing in the fall on CTV), Farber will attend a New York City university in September. She already finished her first year at York University, where she took writing for the professional. (How appropriate – in season six, her character attends her first year of university and volunteers as a student journalist.)

"Acting can be such a risky business," Farber says. "It's so crowded and there's so much rejection. I really value my education and getting a degree."

Spoken like a true honours student. Farber excelled in academics at the Claude Watson School for the Arts in Toronto, where she first felt the pull of theatrics. Back then, she would experiment with homemade videos by acting out scenes from The Parent Trap with her sister.

Farber swings her mouth into a smile. "I still do that kind of thing with my friends."

When she landed the role as Ellie, Farber didn't know what to expect. She likely wasn't prepared for all the black enveloping her character: black boots, black eyeliner, black personality. Ellie might have swung into darkness, even taking a blade to her wrists in one harrowing episode, but Farber says reality is the show's focus.

And not the reality some other programs peddle. "We don't look like supermodels like the kids from The O.C., but we're not incredibly homely, either," she says. "We pride ourselves on portraying realistic students at a realistic school."

That's a statement the original Degrassi cast, from 20 years back, would gladly endorse. The writers of the half-hour drama know teen problems and are not afraid of exposing subjects too taboo for family-oriented programming: gay sex, abortions, suicide, life-threatening anorexia and even religious extremism. Being part of such a ground-breaking series is empowering – according to CTV, the Canadian viewer average is 759,000 for last season. But it also creates a legion of fans. Screaming teenage fans.

"We don't do mall tours anymore," Farber tells me bluntly. "I was in L.A. once with another actor, and more than 4,000 kids showed up at this mall appearance we did. Uh, it was kinda dangerous."

There it is. Wait. A glimpse of the teenage Farber, the one who snowboards, goes to Toronto Rock (lacrosse) games with her dad and shops with a smile on her face. It's there beneath the maturity of a child actor, waiting to overflow as it surely does when Farber is with her friends.

But now she's talking about the grown-up world she finds herself in. "I'm learning about the business side of acting," she says, "like maintaining contacts and even how to do taxes."

The savvy, practical side of Farber is paying off. She enjoyed a minor role in the crime film Narc, a guest appearance in the TV series Doc and will be seen as a prostitute in the upcoming indie film King of Sorrow.

Oy, what's a nice Jewish girl having a gun pointed to her head in a movie? I don't ask this question, but I can tell Farber relishes the challenge, the change of pace.

"And no matter what, my family will be supportive," she says. "They're so excited for me."

Of course. What other mother can say, "You can watch my daughter on television, once a week at 8:30 p.m. And you know what, they're also making graphic novels of these Degrassi actors!"

It's all well and good now, but a kid needs variety. When it comes to the future, how would Farber like Ellie's university years spent?

"Maybe the writers can send her on a trip to Italy," she says, only half-joking. "And not just an Italian set. Shooting on location."

Farber has that gleam in her eyes and, once again, the woman becomes the girl.

CBC TV profiles concert promoter Michael Cohl

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Michael Cohl is the most famous concert promoter you may never have heard of.

The reclusive, Toronto-born impresario, whose clients have ranged from the Rolling Stones to Michael Jackson, has been notoriously close-mouthed and inaccessible, at least until now.

But on Monday, July 24 at 8 p.m., the CBC TV documentary Life & Times of Michael Cohl, directed by Barry Avrich, will be broadcast, and the veil will finally be lifted.

Blending interviews with archival and concert footage, this is a film that draws a surprisingly open portrait of a man – the world's most powerful concert promoter – who values his privacy and keeps a low profile.

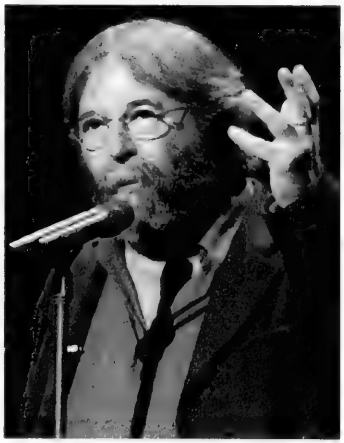
Avrich's revealing documentary is the story of a driven, strong-willed, disciplined visionary who found a niche and exploited it to its fullest potential.

Marty Onrot, a competitor who clearly admires him, says Cohl "created opportunities." In addition to promoting rock stars, Cohl has produced major sporting events and theatre productions (Cats and The Lion King, to name but two) and has crafted extremely lucrative merchandising and sponsorship deals for which his clients should be eternally grateful.

In a frank admission, Cohl acknowledges that he has made tons of money for his roster of clients. An example: His first Stones tour grossed $240 million, a record. No wonder Mick Jagger and Keith Richards speak highly of him.

Cohl, whom Onrot describes as a combination of aggressiveness and intelligence, hails from a middle class Jewish family. Little is said about his father, who was a lingerie manufacturer. But his mother, Adele, is held up as an influential factor in Cohl's life.

Portrayed as ambitious, Cohl admits he had a burning desire to succeed. "Whatever I did do, I had to win," he says.



Michael Cohl

A star debater in high school, Cohl still has a way with words and can out-argue virtually anyone, Jagger says.

Eager to establish a financial base, at the age of 18, Cohl opened a strip club in Ottawa. But it was soon busted by police.

When he learned that a friend had earned $5,000 from promoting a rock concert, a light lit up and he realized he had found his calling.

His first venture as a promoter was a fiasco. The band he had booked didn't bother to show up. But fortune beckoned when Harold Ballard, the owner of Maple Leaf Gardens, signed a contract giving Cohl exclusive rights to stage concerts at that popular venue.

In another coup, Cohl wrested the Rolling Stones away from the legendary Bill Graham, who fumed, "Today, I watched my lover become a whore."

To his credit, Avrich does not glorify Cohl, mentioning a Toronto Star allegation that accused him of skimming concert receipts.

All in all, Life & Times of Michael Cohl is a balanced and entertaining account of a Canadian entrepreneur who has practically cornered the market in a cutthroat business.

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN PART I: THE IMMORTAL 'POTASH AND PERLMUTTER'

For years the magazines sent him rejection letters, inferring that his short stories about a pair of Jewish cloak and suit makers in New York were about as unmarketable as last year's suits and dresses.

But in the early 1900s, Montague Glass broke through to the big time as major American magazines like The Saturday Evening Post and Cosmopolitan began clamouring for his tales about Potash and Perlmutter, a pair of lovable shlemiels in New York's cutthroat shmatte trade. The duo's hilarious business misadventures eventually translated into a string of popular movies, radio dramatizations and stage-plays that broke attendance records in both New York and London.

Born in Manchester in 1877, Glass came to New York at age 12 and studied at City College. He trained as a lawyer and joined a Jewish law firm that represented many of the immigrant garment factories that were a dime a dozen in New York. The experience gave him the ability to write about the tailoring milieu from the inside – a world that, for anyone else, would have seemed far too common to be glamourized in fiction.

Glass' heroes, Abe Potash and Mawruss Perlmutter, are so ordinary, and their business surroundings so mundane, that their very representation in literature is already cause for laughter.

Bookman, a literary journal, praised the 1911 collection Potash and Perlmutter: Their Copartnership Ventures and Adventures for its "photographic sketches of Hebrew types found on the East Side of New York," adding that Glass' various characters – cutters, designers, travellers, bankers, lawyers, fashion models, factory owners occasionally seem as vivid as "Pickwick, Becky Sharp or Falstaff."

"They come to us dripping with faults; they shock us by their manners and their meannesses, by their money-lust and sharp practice; but they grow on us until we accept them as relatives – that is, we see their faults merged into a universal humaneness, a humaneness that we share ourselves."

"Mr. Glass blazes a trail of his own in current fiction by presenting certain types of Jewish businessmen who appear to us as real human beings and not caricatures," The New York Times noted when the volume Abe and Mawruss appeared in 1912.

In one story, Mr. Siegmund Lowenstein, proprietor of a Galveston dry-goods company, wants to place a large order, using the fact that he has also visited the rival house of Garfunkel and Levy as leverage. "I looked over their line and I may place an order with them, although they ain't got too good an assortment," he says.

"Far be it from me to knock a competitor's line, Mr. Lowenstein," Perlmutter replies, "but I honestly think they get their designers off of Ellis Island."

Garfunkel and Levy have a more generous credit policy, a fact that Lowenstein uses to persuade Perlmutter to extend his credit terms from the usual 30 days to 90 days. "The house what gives me the most generous credit gets my biggest order," he says. Despite the certain knowledge that Potash will be aggravated, Perlmutter gives Lowenstein 90 days to pay.

Glass depicts cloak and suit makers as being capable of engaging in friendly truces while still remaining fierce competitors: "While they cheerfully exchanged credit information from their office files, they maintained a constant guerilla warfare for the capture of each other's customers." But in this case Abe Potash acquires information all on his own that Lowenstein is untrustworthy.

While on vacation, Potash visits his brother-in-law, Hyman Margolius, an auctioneer in Pittsburgh, and helps him unload a huge consignment of garments purchased at distressed prices. To Potash's astonishment, the shipment consists of his own company's plum-coloured Empire gowns, Style No. 4022. The seller is "a feller called Lowenstein in Galveston," Margolius explains. "He wrote me he was overstocked."

Surmising that Lowenstein is planning to declare bankruptcy to avoid paying for the goods, Potash wires his partner not to fill the bulk of Lowenstein's order. Thus the episode ends well for the duo, who remain largely unscathed when Lowenstein indeed declares bankruptcy and absconds to Mexico. But in their continuous bid to outsmart their competitors and customers, they are often foiled.

In one story, they quarrel over the practice of selling single garments below cost to friends, but Abe finally allows Mawruss to discount an Empire gown to his wife's servant-girl, Lina, who would be saving about two dollars. The hefty Lina squeezes inelegantly into the dress just as a major client, who had ordered hundreds of that garment that morning, returns to finalize the purchase. Seeing Lina, he abruptly changes his mind and flees the showroom.

In the capable hands of Glass, who quit lawyering to work full time as a writer, such unlikely material easily becomes the stuff of literature and stage comedy. Glass felt that he was able to see the dramatic possibilities of New York society because he was an outsider due to his English birth.

His ironic characters are presented in a realistic and somewhat farcical light: they are Jewish knights locked in combat with untalented designers, shifty suppliers and cantankerous labour unions.

Glass rightly considered his representations of Jews to be a sharp improvement over the gross caricatures that had been common in vaudeville. But surprisingly, he wrongly believed he was writing in a romantic vein; instead, along with writers like Abraham Cahan and Anzia Yezierska, he was one of the early American Jewish realists who sought to portray their subjects not idealistically but as they really are.

Glass died in 1934 and is largely forgotten today. Most of his works are out of print and many of the movies they inspired have disintegrated into dust. However, the New York-based Arno Press reprinted a volume of his stories in 1975 and another collection is available free as an e-book on the Internet through Project Gutenberg. Visit www.gutenberg.org for details. Aficionados of Jewish writing will find his stories old-fashioned but still highly entertaining.

'Souls were present' at Polish cemetery rededication

By CYNTHIA GASNER

Nineteen descendants of Polish Jews who lived in the small shtetl of Ilza – also known as Drildz – stood transfixed with emotion during a recent memorial service at the place where a once-thriving Jewish community buried its dead.

The cemetery was established in 1837 and was completely destroyed during World War II.

The Germans forced the Jews to transport its gravestones to swampy areas for road-building near the city of Radom. What remains is a densely forested area on the outskirts of the town.

In 2003, on the 70th anniversary of Toronto's Drildzer Congregation and Society, the members, under the presidency of the late Mae Waese, formed the Ilza Historical Cemetery Restoration Project to restore the 3½-acre graveyard.

With a small committee, they established the groundwork in North America and Poland and began a three-year process of researching, fundraising and arranging for construction.

Brenda Dales told The CJN that when she was standing in the cemetery during the May 22 ceremony, "I felt like my great grandparents were there, along with my late grandmother who came to Canada in 1920 and died in 1961. I felt their presence and my grandmother was hugging me. To me, it is important that they are remembered."

Norman Weinberg, a scientist in Buffalo, N.Y., and president of the Polish Jewish Cemetery Restoration Project, was instrumental in directing the reconstruction.

The chief rabbi of Poland, Michael Schudrich, oversaw aspects of halachah related to cemeteries, and Monika Krawczyk of the Foundation for the Preservation of Jewish Heritage in Poland also contributed to the project.

The 19 visitors – 11 from Canada, four from New York and one from Brazil – and their spouses spent one week in Poland visiting Warsaw and small communities around Drildz. Some were even able to locate where their families once lived.

Participant Debbie Cowitz said the trip "was a profound experience for all of us, especially the younger people in the group. I didn't think this would impact on me as it did. I felt that my ancestors were all around me. The soul is for eternity, and I felt all their souls were present there."

There are no Jews left in Drildz, but there is a regional museum with a small Jewish exhibit. The town was known for its pottery, and a local pottery company was owned by a Jewish family.

The sombre rededication ceremony was attended by 200 people, including the mayor of Ilza, the local priest, students and members of the community.

Brenda Dales thanked those who helped with the restoration and urged those present to locate and return stolen gravestones.

The memory of a Christian family from the area who saved Jews was also honoured, and Dales asked anyone who knows of other Christian families who tried to save Jews to contact her.

The mayor of Ilza also spoke, as did Marcia Lightman of Toronto, who spoke in memory of her late sister Mae Waese.

Two large granite stones were placed in the cemetery, including one on the site of what is believed to be a mass grave.

It reads, in part: "This cemetery has been rededicated in blessed memory of the vibrant Jewish community of Ilza (Drildz) Poland and its surrounding communities who were buried here and to those Jewish people who perished in the Shoah without proper burial.

"They left a lasting heritage that will forever be remembered by their descendants who pray that their souls rest in peace and will remain in the embrace of the Almighty for all eternity."

Rooting for a World Cup wildcard

By A. MARK CLARFIELD
Special to The CJN

BEERSHEVA, Israel — Those who can't read are termed "illiterate," those who can't compute, "innumerate." But what do you call someone who knows nothing about sports? "Unsportsmanlike?" That doesn't do. "Not sporting?" That doesn't quite capture it, either.

But whatever you want to call this character trait of mine, it may explain why, of all countries in the world to root for, I was pulling for a rogue nation to win the World Cup.

To understand why, you need to know a bit about my sporting history. As all young boys are wont to do, I dabbled a bit in sports growing up in Toronto, where I was expected to take part in the usual games: baseball, football, and above all, hockey. In fact, although I did get a bit involved in these tough team sports, I much preferred the gentler one of volleyball. My favourite activity, gymnastics, was quite individual in nature and I was actually not too bad at it.

However, while the peer pressure to take part in discussions about sports waned during my university years, it absolutely disappeared in medical school. Who had time? And no one really bothered me anymore. If someone asked about last night's game, which I hadn't watched, I could easily get away with "I was on call," or "I was post call," or "I was studying." No one took umbrage and no one seemed to think less of me.

Once, 30 years ago, after a particularly gruelling three-night/four-day stint as an intern on call delivering babies at Mount Sinai Hospital, I was finally liberated one bright sunny morning.

Desperate to leave the hospital and see life on the streets again, I wandered out onto Toronto's University Avenue. Unusual for a Sunday morning, the sidewalks were filled with people – young and old – and the street, a broad boulevard, was blocked to vehicular traffic. The six lanes were full of marchers, floats, bands and mounted police. It was all very exciting, in a hallucinatory kind of way, but I had absolutely no clue what was going on.

Still in my hospital whites, stethoscope dangling from my neck and the usual manuals, papers and reflex hammers spilling out of my pockets, I asked a police officer what was going on.

Shocked by the apparent rank stupidity of my question, he looked at me as if I had just arrived from Mars.

"Where are you from that you don't know?" he asked, with both surprise and derision in his voice. Post call, all I could do was stare back blankly, happy just to be outside the hospital. Seeing that he was going to get nowhere with me, the cop said, somewhat archly, "It's the annual Grey Cup football parade."

I thought quickly, wondering how best to defend myself against the implied slur of total ignorance. I hadn't actually been to a football game in decades and hadn't watched one on TV for years.

"How should I know?" I replied, at a total loss as to how best to defend myself. I settled on the obvious riposte, "I'm from Jamaica!"

Believe it or not, that little white lie – the truth was that I had never visited the island – worked very well.

"Oh, I am so sorry, sir. I thought you were from here. Welcome to Canada!" he offered, now smiling broadly. Who says Canadians aren't friendly?

Now, several decades later, and after having changed countries, I haven't managed to improve much on my gamesmanship (maybe that's the word?). If I didn't have two boys, both of whom are fairly sports-mad, I wouldn't have a clue as to who is playing whom.

And with my sons egging me on and the world celebrating a collective mania around soccer's World Cup, who could remain completely indifferent?

But whom to root for?

Unfortunately, as neither Canada nor Israel made it into this year's tournament, I had to look further abroad.

My choice was influenced by the realization that professional sports serves a useful societal function – beyond selling hot dogs and beer. I've concluded that such games actually play an honourable part in avoiding armed conflict. They are, quite clearly, war surrogates. (Isn't it interesting that peacetime military manoeuvres are called "war games"?)

Isn't it better to cheer a national team that's chasing a ball or skating after a puck than to encourage masked men armed with rocket-propelled grenade launchers or suicide bomb vests strapped to their midriffs? And what if a country wants to acquire an atom bomb it doesn't need? And even worse, what if it decides to use it – especially if the president of that country is a Holocaust denier and wants to wipe my home, Israel, and the whole Jewish people, off the map?

It would be better for all concerned if that country's young men were caught up in the proxy contest of football, rather than a real one of armed conflict.

And, at least until they were ousted from the tourney after tying Angola, I screamed myself hoarse with the cheer, "Viva Iran!!!"

Raptors sign Maccabi Tel Aviv star

Free agent swingman Anthony Parker, who as a member of Maccabi Tel Aviv sunk the Toronto Raptors with a buzzer-beating basket in an exhibition game last season, has signed with the Dinos.

The 31-year-old guard/forward has been called the best player outside the NBA and is a two-time Euroleague MVP.

"At his age and at his skill level, I think it was the right time for him to make the transition into the NBA," Raptors GM Bryan Colangelo told a news conference. "We think that by securing Anthony, we are getting one of top free-agent guards that was available."

A former draft pick of the New Jersey Nets, Parker has played the last six seasons with Maccabi Tel Aviv. Last year he scored 14.7 points per game while averaging 6.5 rebounds and 3.9 assists.

Parker signed a three-year contract with the Raptors valued at more than 12 million (US).

Late-life depression

By MICHAEL GORDON

We met walking out of the university hospital. "Hi, I haven't seen you in years. You looked after my grandmother many years ago," the man said.

I immediately recognized him, as we were residents at about the same time, almost 30 years before, and had some professional interactions over the years, as he had gone into surgery and worked at one of the university hospitals. But we had not seen each other for at least five years.

The Senior Side of Life

He continued: "I learned a lot from my grandmother and your diagnosis and treatment of her depression, to which she responded. She not only went back to her bridge games but lived another 10 years.

"Most interesting, my sister developed some depressive symptoms years later that we recognized because of grandma. She, too, got better with treatment."

As we walked along, I replied: "She was one of the first patients whose late-onset depression I recognized, whose loss of interest in her lifelong love of bridge was a diagnostic clue that I have often used as part of my teaching anecdotes.

"I remember just how dramatic her response to antidepressants was and how wonderful I felt when she returned and told me, 'I played bridge again last week, and won' – which was an indication to me that the treatment was successful."

Since that patient almost 30 years ago, I have dealt with many older people with depression. Over time, from a condition that was not readily understood by many physicians, late-age depression is now known to be common; it is often misdiagnosed or ignored, and therefore inadequately treated.

Those with late-age depression may be unable to fulfil their potential in life, and in some more tragic cases, depression may result in disastrous results including death from not eating or lack of self-care, or sometimes, in desperate situations, self-inflicted death. Severely depressed older people who are intent on ending their lives are tragically often successful in their attempts.

The good news is that with increased awareness of the condition and a wide array of treatments, many older depressed individuals can be successfully treated and can return to a level of function that meets their expectations and that of their loving families.

Late-life depression can occur in many scenarios, with potentially different implications of the illness. It can be treated with drugs or psychosocial therapy or, as often happens, a combination of the two.

At one end of the spectrum are those who experience and demonstrate evidence of depression for the first time. The symptoms often include a sense of dread, rumination (going over again in their mind or in talk, terrible events or experiences from the past) or a sense of loss, hopelessness and worthlessness. Sometimes there are physical symptoms with almost every ailment being mimicked, and quite often there is a loss of interest in food, entertainment and family interactions. One test I use I call the grandchild kvel test. When grandparents have lost all interest in the well-being of their grandchildren, it is often a symptom of profound depression.

If someone has been depressed before and has responded to treatment, that bodes well for treatment of another occurrence in later life.

Depressive symptoms can be a premonitory sign of early or future cognitive impairment that may develop into dementia. That can be recognized only as the illness progresses and the response to treatments unfold. It may then be necessary to address the dementia as well through various treatments, including newer medications that may provide some benefit.

Depression should not be discounted by family members and physicians. With proper recognition and treatment, beneficial outcomes can often occur, to the satisfaction of all concerned.

Another word that I don't like

Since I have, in previous columns, expressed my distaste for such acceptable Jewish terms as "continuity" and "survival," the time has come to deal with yet another word that I find problematic: "secular".

Seymour Epstein

I don't like when curricula label some studies secular and others sacred, even though I realize that some schools see this terminology as part of their ideology. My personal belief (not to be confused with the policies of any organization I work for) is that once a school decides to include general studies such as mathematics, English or geography in its curriculum, it should see these studies as having the same spiritual potential as limudei kodesh (holy studies).

In the religious world, studying the intricacies of God's zoology or planetary system should lead one to an even greater perception of God's greatness. Hence, chemistry becomes a religious subject, very close to Talmud. Both are illustrations of human potential for observation, insight, and deduction – all God-given attributes from Day 6 of Creation.

But I also have problems with the word "secular" when it's used to mean the opposite of observant Jews of any religious denomination. There was a period when "secular Jew" denoted a veritable movement of Jews who actively opposed Jewish religion on ideological grounds. Most of those original secular Jews came from backgrounds that afforded them profound literacy in Jewish sources, which they then opposed ideologically. Except for certain specific groups in Israel and some Diaspora settings, there is little of that left. Most Jews who are labelled "secular" these days are just indifferent or somewhat assimilated, but not proactively secular in any ideological sense of the word.

The error in labelling usually occurs when the Israeli division of secular and religious (chiloni, dati) is applied to Diaspora settings where it does not apply. I know and respect the fact there are some secular Jewish organizations in Diaspora communities, but they are small and they do not represent the vast numbers of Jews who are not affiliated with one of the religious denominations.

There are, then, two instances where the label "secular" is misused and leads to a lack of clarity.

Thoughts on Jewish warriors

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Cpl. Gilad Shalit was captured by terrorists and hidden away for the Israel Defence Forces to find. His tragic situation elicited so many thoughts and feelings in me about who we are as Jews, and our place in the world. Here are a few.

How many of us thought about – but never spoke of – the images we had of how this soldier, this young Jewish man, was tied up? How many of us imagined Gilad in a crouching position, unable to move his arms and legs, and the fear he felt to be blindfolded and guarded by violent thugs? The thoughts were dreadful.

We read the newspapers and followed his father's pleas for Israel to release Palestinian prisoners, yet as a reader, we felt a certain safety and fortune in knowing that we could get relief from a father's pain by putting the paper down. Gilad is not our son.

How strange the differences between our reality in Canada and that which exists in Israel. Here, our neighbours smile when we meet them. They harbour either a liking of, or basic indifference to, our Canadianism.

In the Land of Milk and Honey, however, you need only walk by a construction site with Arab workers to feel the anger and hatred for Israeli Jews that lies within many of their souls. And a Shabbat walk in Jerusalem's Old City brings you close to the Arab Quarter, a place we believe is filled with anti-Semites, terrorists and assassins.

To live in Israel and to fight in its army is to be a warrior, and warriors live and die hard. They sculpt our peoplehood, whether in Israel or in Canada, because they allow us space and time to be free in a land of our choice.

Gilad reminds us that to be a Jew is to live close to the edge, where danger lurks and vigilance is our protector. Yoni, the only rescuer or hostage to die at Entebbe, reminds us that to be a Jew is to know that our bravery will be called upon at some point.

Gilad tests our commitment to our Jewishness, and our loyalty to our people. Each one of us must remember where we were when he was abducted, and what we did in the course of that day in his honour, in support of Israel and the Jewish people. It's not enough to feel bad when "Gilads" happen. A Jew must act.

Yoni forces us to reflect on our ability to do so – to act. When and where will our Uganda be? Only time will tell. And when it does, his courage will call out to us, like a man on a soapbox – leading us forward, cheering us on.

When peace is at best a slogan in Israel, I am compelled to thank Jews in Israel over and over, to show my indebtedness to the Gilads and their families and a commitment to never forget every valiant Jew, like Yoni, and what their legacy represents to us.

At the time this column was written, Gilad's fate was unknown. By the time you read this, you might know whether this young warrior lived or died, about how he was treated, and of the emotional state of his family. How strange to be writing about him without this knowledge, yet knowing that you might have it. Gilad is our son.

Looking forward, looking back, Gilad, know that we prayed for your life, and for peace for your family and the Jewish people. We collectively expressed our gratitude for the fight you chose to wage on behalf of Jews, everywhere.

Gilads never really die. They can't. We won't have it. The souls of Jewish warriors live.

Harper rejects moral equivalence between Israel and terrorists

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Prime Minister Stephen Harper delivered a strong message of support for Israel last week and rejected criticism his government had shifted Canada away from its traditional role as an honest broker between Israel and its adversaries.

Paraphrasing on several occasions a statement by former British prime minister Winston Churchill, Harper said Canada would not remain neutral between a fellow democracy and a terrorist organization.

"What we refuse to do is to be drawn into a moral equivalence between a pyromaniac and a fireman," Harper stated in a telephone interview with The CJN.

Israel is well within its rights to defend itself from Hezbollah, a terrorist organization bent on using violence to destroy Israel. If a terrorist organization crossed Canadian borders, kidnapped our soldiers and hurled missiles at our population centres, Canada would do the same as Israel, "fight back," the prime minister said.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper

Harper's position on the ongoing conflict between Israel and Hezbollah, which set off the conflict three weeks ago when it captured two Israeli soldiers and killed eight, stands in marked contrast to that of interim Liberal Party leader Bill Graham. Graham, a former minister of foreign affairs, said "we're very concerned about Mr. Harper's change in Canada's traditional position of working with all sides in the Middle East for long-term peace by being able to work with all sides of the conflict to bring them together and in a dialogue.

"Canada has always been able to act as an intermediary, but we can only serve in that capacity if both our comportment and our actions enable us to play that role."

Liberal consular affairs critic Dan McTeague said Liberals were "disappointed with Harper's decision to depart from Canada's traditional role of peace broker and follow U.S. President George W. Bush's Mideast policy prior to the release of the joint statement by G8 leaders."

Liberal leadership candidates weighed into the issue, with some publishing their view of the Hezbollah-Israel conflict. Bob Rae issued a statement saying Canada should respond to the humanitarian crisis in Lebanon and live up to the spirit of Nobel Peace Prize-winner and former Canadian prime minister Lester Pearson, "who used his experience and understanding to defuse a crisis."

Family awaits word on abducted son's fate

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

He had been trying all day to get some information about his brother, Ehud, who he knew was completing his last day of army reserve duty on the Lebanese border. When he heard early-morning news reports that Hezbollah had abducted two soldiers and killed eight others in an unprovoked raid, he quickly got on his cellphone and dialed Ehud's number. When there was no answer, he contacted Ehud's wife of 10 months, Karnit, but she, too, had had no luck in reaching Ehud. Yair then began the grim task of calling local hospitals to see if his brother was among the dead or wounded.

After several hours had passed and there was still no word about Ehud, "we started to be a little bit worried, he said.

At 3 p.m. – nine hours after the incident occurred – army officers finally arrived at his home in Nahariya. "I immediately knew. I saw them on my doorstep and I knew they were going to give me bad news."

With the army's confirmation that his brother had indeed been captured along with fellow soldier,

CANADA

Groups Get Status

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada have been granted intervenor status at the judicial inquiry into the 1985 Air India bombing off the coast of Ireland that killed 329 people. Sikh extremists seeking a homeland in India are believed to be responsible for the attack. Two men were acquitted of criminal charges in the case last year. Testimony in the inquiry starts next month, and a report is due next year. The groups will comment on anti-terrorism policy.

Camp Director Killed

TORONTO — A director of a Jewish camp in Michigan that specializes in wilderness trips for teens died July 17 in Ontario's Algonquin Provincial Park when a tree fell on his tent during a thunderstorm. Jeff Grey, 26, of Oak Park, Mich., a Detroit suburb, was leading a trip with six staff and 17 campers from Camp Kennedy in northern Michigan. A counsellor from the Detroit area, Aaron Lebovic, 19, was also injured by the tree. He has been released from intensive care at Toronto's St. Michael's Hospital and is set to go home this week for further care.

Standing With India

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada's executive vice-president Frank Dimant expressed condolences last week to Satish Mehta, India's consul general in Toronto, at a Queen's Park rally to recall the 207 victims of the July 11 train bombings in Mumbai. About 200 people, attended the event.

New Training Program

TORONTO — Four directors of Ontario camps are among 20 from across North America selected for a new program that will teach them about leadership, business and Jewish ethics. Miriam Allman of Camp Moshava in Ennismore, Ron Polster of Camp George in Parry Sound, Michael Wolf of Camp Ramah in Utterson, and Brenda Tessler-Donen of the B'nai Brith Community Camp in Kenora will be the first participants in the New-York-based Foundation for Jewish Camping's Executive Leadership Institute, the foundation said last month.

CIC Extends Regrets Over Lebanon Deaths

OTTAWA — Canada-Israel Committee chair Marc Gold expressed "deep regret" at the deaths of four UN observers, including a Canadian soldier, who were killed last week when an Israeli jet bombed a UN observation post in Lebanon.

"On behalf of Canadian Jewry… I want to convey sincere condolences to all the families who have suffered losses in this tragic accident," said Gold, who added that he has confidence in the ongoing Israeli investigation into the incident, which Israel described as an accident and came during strikes on Hezbollah positions in southern Lebanon.

Gold also expressed "great appreciation" to Prime Minister Stephen Harper for his "thoughtful and encouraging comments" on the incident. After the UN post was hit, Harper said he doubted it was deliberately targeted and wondered why it was still manned two weeks into the fighting. He also repeated his view that Israel has a right to defend itself.

Gold also extended condolences to the families who have suffered losses in the current crisis, including a family of eight Lebanese Canadians from Montreal who died July 16 during Israel's shelling of Hezbollah positions in Lebanon.

"Both Israelis and Lebanese are the innocent victims of Hezbollah and neither country will be able to reolaim normalcy until the threat of Hezbollah is eradicated," Gold said.

He added that "the CIC is grateful for the principled position articulated by the Canadian government," which has demanded an end to the support of terror by Iran and Syria "and the return of the Israeli nationals kidnapped by their proxies, Hamas and Hezbollah."

WORLD

Monument Vandalized

BRUSSELS — A Holocaust memorial in Brussels was found vandalized on July 24. The gate of the memorial's crypt was pulled out, documents were destroyed, windows broken and an urn containing ashes from Auschwitz victims was emptied, the European Jewish Press reported. Belgian Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt said he is shocked by the attack.

More Looted Art?

NEW YORK — U.S. museums may still have many Nazi-plundered artworks, says a new report by the Claims Conference and the World Jewish Restitution Organization. Only 12 per cent of art in U.S. museums possibly stolen from Holocaust victims has been fully researched and the results publicized, Gideon Taylor, executive vice-president of the Claims Conference, said July 25. The 140,000 artworks in question were created before 1946 and bought after 1932, and changed ownership during that time. Some major U.S. museums, such as the J. Paul Getty Museum in Los Angeles and the San Francisco Museum of Modern Art, didn't take part in the survey.

8,000 rally for Israel in Toronto

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

A crowd of 8,000 supporters of the Jewish state gathered for an emotional evening at the Stand for Israel Rally last week in Toronto.

The occasion was to "commend our government for its principled support of Israel's obligation to protect its citizens," said famed film producer Robert Lantos, who was master of ceremonies for the July 26 event, held at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, with an overflow crowd of more than 5,000 people gathered in nearby Mel Lastman Square.

Lantos received a standing ovation when he thanked Prime Minister Stephen Harper "for standing tall and making me proud to be Canadian" because of the prime minister's "unequivocal support" of Israel's "fundamental right to live in peace and to protect itself when under attack".

Applause and laughter followed Lantos' declaration that "I hereby take off my lifelong federal Liberal hat to you. Symbolically, I toss it away, if there were anyone willing to catch it."

Tears soon followed that laughter, however, when Toronto resident Moti Markizano, 38, and his 28-year-old brother, Guy, an IDF artillery commander currently positioned on the Lebanese border, were reunited face-to-face for the first time in more two years via satellite as the entire crowd watched on video monitors.

A live, two-way video feed linked the northern Israeli town of Metulla with the audience in Toronto at 3:15 a.m. Israel time.

Guy Markizano and some of the 50 artillery soldiers he commands were featured in the feed, along with the mayors of Kiryat Shmona and the Upper Galilee municipality. Seeing Guy positioned on the front lines of war and being able to talk with him for all to see was "incredibly emotional" for his brother in Toronto.

"I haven't seen Guy for the last 21/2 years," Moti told The CJN. "The last time I saw him was when he got married in Israel. It was so moving to hear his voice and to know what he's been through."

There were few dry eyes among audience members as they witnessed this virtual reunion of brothers. "It was so marvellous for me and my family to show that we are behind him," Moti said. "I am so proud to be his brother."

Not all the people at the rally were Jewish. In addition to the numerous MPs, MPPs and Toronto city councillors in attendance, friends of Israel from other faiths – such as Ron Banerjee, director of communications for the Hindu Conference of Canada; Barb Boraks, executive director of the Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto; Manoj Pundit, past president of the Indo-Canadian Chamber of Commerce; Alistair Gordon of the Canadian Coalition for Democracies; and Maher Rizkalla, president of the Ontario chapter of the Canadian Coptic Association – came to show their solidarity with Israel.

Israel at War

The big lie, again and again

From the editor's desk

Supporters of Israel must not become emotionally or physically fatigued in defence of the Jewish state. We do not have the luxury of fatigue. For Israel's enemies are counting on Jews around the world to become tired of the "conflict" and ultimately turn their backs on the "problem" they are determined to ensure will not go away.

And, to quote Rabbi David Hartman of Jerusalem, we certainly do not have the luxury of despondency or despair. For despair is the very antithesis of the meaning of Jewish history and tradition and in a profound sense, a betrayal of all who came before us and all who will come after us.

In truth, however, it is so very difficult – and so very human – not to feel disheartened and even uneasy at the way in which the war Israel is waging against the malevolent Hamas-Hezbollah-Syria-Iran axis is being portrayed.

To watch, especially the television news coverage of the war, one would think that bombs are falling only on Lebanon. The predominant focus of the coverage was typified by one CTV correspondent who said last week, "The world is baffled by what it sees, united in sympathy for Lebanon." As of this writing though, mostly ignored by the commentators who sympathize with Lebanon, is that more than 1,500 rockets have been deliberately launched into areas in Israel only populated by civilians.

Aside though from the distortion in the coverage of the war's carnage, we – Israel's supporters – find unfathomable that we must once again answer the calumnies and big lies that opponents of the Jewish state rush to retell.

But answer them we must. We must always answer not for the sake of attempting to persuade the propagators of the lies, but rather for the sake of buttressing the sense of purpose of the younger generation – Jew and non-Jew – who must always hear the truth.

Nor must we doubt that there is an objective truth about this conflict that can withstand scrutiny by honest, well-intentioned individuals.

Throughout history, the haters of Jews have resorted to the big lie. Nothing has changed.

Common variations of the big lies were on rampant display last week in Toronto and Montreal when anti-Israel protesters took to the street.

"End the occupation" was one of the recurring slogans of the marchers. But what is the "occupation" that they demand come to an end?

"Occupation" is one of those loaded words that will always inspire indignation among conscientious, socially aware, anti-colonial activists. But in reference to Israel, it is a code-word understood – not by all the protesters – by all those intent on Israel's demise.

For them, the entire State of Israel is an "occupation" of lands that belong to the Arabs. Thus, inescapably, when they shout "End the occupation" they mean "End Israel."

How can honest, well-intentioned individuals support such a cause, we ask ourselves?

Another slogan cheerfully waved by some protesters was "Stop [the] Holocaust in Lebanon." (See the photo inset.)

The word "holocaust," of course, is synonymous with genocide and racism. Some people would just shrug off the reference as heated hyperbole. But the ignorant, unaware or gullible may begin to believe the reference as being accurate. The truth of the matter, however, is that the use of "holocaust" in reference to the war against Hezbollah in Lebanon is obscene.

How can honest, well-intentioned individuals support such an obscenity, we again ask ourselves?

But what creates the greatest sense of disquiet among supporters of Israel is embodied in the second photo inset into this column. Its message is unambiguous, without any code words.

"Israel out of Palestine" is a bellicose call for the elimination of the Jewish state. The portraits of Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah cinch the matter for the elimination of the Jewish State has been their main message since they rose to the positions of their power.

Rabbi Daniel Gordis, in a recent Internet communication, expressed what the vast majority of Jews know to be the truth about this war. "This is not about the 'occupation.' This is not about creating a Palestinian state. This is about whether there will be a state called Israel."

How can honest, well-intentioned individuals, we ask ourselves, not support Israel when it defends itself against the enemies who want, more than anything, to destroy it?

And though we may be disheartened with the answer, we are forbidden to despair.

Israel at War

Tourism takes hit, but many travellers stick to plans

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN and FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporters

Until the recent crisis in Israel began in mid-July, the country was enjoying "a gangbuster summer" for tourism, according to Avi Rodak, vice-president of Aufgang Travel in Toronto.

"There were no rooms. Everything was packed," he said.

But about half the families his agency has booked for trips in the next couple of weeks have cancelled, he said last week.

The other half will use modified itineraries, avoiding the northern part of the country.

El Al and Air Canada are allowing people to reschedule their trips at no fee for the next six months, subject to availability, Rodak said.

Like Rodak, Ehud Telem, president of Peerless Travel, said that about half of his clients who had plans to go to Israel on an imminent group trip have cancelled. People whose plans are for later in the summer, for the most part, had not made any changes as of last week.

"A lot of people are postponing, cancelling, changing [their plans]," said Telem. But many are still going, he added. He even has customers who have made plans to go because of the situation, to show support or offer help, he said.

Aside from Israel's north — where hoteliers in places such as Haifa, Tiberias and Rosh Pina are shutting down operations and turning off electricity – tourism in the rest of the country is mostly holding up.

However, tourism workers all over Israel are worried their livelihoods may be devastated if the fighting drags on. That, in turn, could wreak havoc on the economy as a whole.

The economic impact on Israel's tourism industry already has run into the millions of dollars, according to a JTA report.

Rather than cancelling their trip, many of those planning a visit to Israel have altered their itinerary, said the director of the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO).

"No doubt, we have had cancellations, but people are still going. They're focusing their trip on such cities as Tel Aviv or Jerusalem," said Dani Shahal.

Up until now, he said, this year has been the best ever with regard to tourism. "From January until the end of June we had about 30,000 tourists, and we had expected about 65,000 to 70,000 before the end of the year."

Although individuals within tour groups have cancelled, he said, all organizations that have plans for tours are going ahead with them.

Airlines, hotels and tour operators are being urged to be flexible with regard to cancellation fees and deposits, said Shahal.

"I understand it is a very difficult time. People are being cautious, and that is why we are trying to get organizations to plan solidarity missions.

"We need to show support so we can increase the morale in Israel, and help the economy. We can only rely on our brothers and sisters and on the Christian organizations that support Israel."

In a letter that the IGTO sent to rabbis and their congregations across Canada, Shahal said that in most of Israel, things are totally normal. "Kids are going to summer camp, parents are working, and life goes on.

"In the centre of the country as well as the south, restaurants are full, beaches are packed, shopping malls and tourist sites are busy. All is 'business as usual.'"

In Israel, the letter said, "there is no panic, there is no rushing to leave, the airports are operating normally. Flights are arriving in Israel full, and they are leaving empty.

"We're responsible people, [and] it would be against our interest to endanger tourists. If the situation were so bad, the last thing Israel would want would be the added burden of dealing with worried and frantic tourists."

Perry Romberg, director of campaigns and community resources at United Israel Appeal Federations Canada, said his organization is planning a solidarity mission. "We're looking at it as an important part of our support for Israel, and we're looking at which groups to target."

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, which spearheaded last week's Stand with Israel rally, has already sent one solidarity mission and as of last Friday had raised more $8 million toward its $20-million goal for its Israel Crisis Relief Fund, established July 13.

It seems few who were in Israel when the fighting began have cut their trips short. The Reform movement North America-wide has more than 600 youth on programs in Israel, said Rabbi Sharon Sobel, executive director of ARZA Canada and of Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ). "They're all staying," she said, adding that parents are updated daily and the groups are staying away from the north.

A group of 150 youths now travelling in Israel as part of Canadian Young Judaea Bilium Israel, is making no plans to cut its trip short, said Michael Silverman, national director of Canada Israel Experience, the trip's organizer.

"We believe we can offer a secure, safe and educationally sound program. We have replaced some activities in the north with activities in the centre and south of Israel, and Canadian Young Judaea is in constant touch with the parents," he said.

David Altshuller, a member of the national board of Canadian Young Judaea, said he is in daily contact with the tour, "and the kids are in excellent spirits. There are photos on the website, and I don't see a frowning kid.

"Parents feel like they're getting all necessary information, and they are confident in the measures we are taking. Our trips have run through some very interesting times over the years, and every year we have different contingency arrangements," said Altshuller, who was director of programs in Israel from 1995 to 2001.

In Canada, a number of organizations are raising money and encouraging the community to also help Israel in other ways.

Organizations here are taking whatever measures they can to help Israelis caught in the north part of the country, and most are raising money and taking in evacuees into their organization's facilities in the central and south.

The CCRJ, in addition to collecting money for Israeli Reform congregations and for a more general fund, is encouraging people to support Israel by doing things such as writing letters to newspapers and local politicians, participating in rallies, and voting in media polls soliciting opinions about Israel.

Chabad Lubavitch of Markham held an emergency prayer meeting on July 17 and is encouraging people to take on mitzvot such as affixing mezuzot in the hope that God will intervene and protect the Jewish nation, according to a news release sent out by the organization.

Nfld. Muslims and Jews partner to help war victims

ST. JOHN'S — The president of the Muslim Association of Newfoundland and Labrador, Mahmoud Haddara, and Arnold Bennett, speaking for the Jewish Community Havura, announced an "emergency partnership" last week to raise funds for victims of the conflict in the Middle East.

The Jewish and Muslim Emergency Partnership will contribute equal amounts to the Red Crescent and Magen David Adom, which are both associated with the International Red Cross.

"In the Newfoundland tradition of neighbours working together in time of disaster, our partnership expresses our joint commitment to helping those in trouble," Haddara said.

"Many of us are already contributing to special humanitarian charities operating in one or another country in the Middle East. Many of us have relatives and close friends under fire or in bomb shelters. Our partnership rises above politics and concentrates on helping all who are suffering, on all sides," Bennett said.

Haddara and Bennett said that St. John's Al-Noor Mosque and the Havura would ask for donations at services this past weekend, and they called on churches and other religious groups to ask for donations at their weekly services as well.

Tax deductible donations can be made by cheque to the Emergency Partnership and mailed to the Muslim Association of Newfoundland and Labrador, 430 Logy Bay Rd., St. John's, Nfld., A1A 5C6, or to the Jewish Community Havura, 2750 Topsail Rd., Conception Bay South, Nfld., A1W 4B1.

Jewish groups warn community of possible attacks

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

B'nai Brith Canada has released a security alert that warns Jewish communities across the country of an increase in anti-Semitic incidents and of Hezbollah "sleeper cells" that may be planning attacks against Jewish and Israeli targets around the world.

Ruth Klein, the national director of the League of Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, said that in two incidents last month, an Orthodox synagogue in Montreal received a bomb threat and that members of the same shul had stones thrown at them outside the synagogue after evening prayers.

B'nai Brith also reported that a Jewish family was sent a decapitated pig.

"There is a tremendous amount of fear in the community when these things happen. If there is any publicity, they fear they may be targeted again," Klein said. "The family has allowed that the incident be talked about, but they are so concerned, they don't want even the city they live in mentioned. This was a particularly nasty incident. [The pig] was left in their backyard. It was very gruesome."

Len Rudner, the director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, also reported an increase in anti-Semitic incidents.

"Since the beginning of July, which roughly corresponds with the first kidnapping by Hamas, the increase in tension in the [Middle East], the second kidnapping, and Israel's military response to that, I think it is fair to say that we have seen, nationally, an increase in incidents," Rudner said.

The B'nai Brith security alert, which was released last week, also warned that "according to sources in Israel, Hezbollah sleeper terror cells outside Lebanon have been put on standby and may be planning attacks against Jewish and Israeli targets throughout the world."

"Within Israeli intelligence and the RCMP as well, there are fears that sleeper cells might choose this particular period of time to revenge attacks," Klein said.

She added that "Hezbollah has been implicated in the past, for example, for the bombing in Argentina of the Jewish community centre" in Buenos Aires in 1994, when 85 people were killed and 240 wounded.

Rudner said one reason to think Canada is a targeted country is that it's one of the countries that Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden has described as "evil," along with the United States, Spain and Britain.

Of these four countries, Canada is the only one that has yet to be hit by a terror attack.

"One could say that from that point of view, that we are on a list. For those who believe that the war being waged by Islamic terrorists is a war against democracy, one could say that all democracies are on the list," Rudner said.

"What this says to me is that we all have a responsibility to act as if we are on a list, whether there is a list or not."

Klein said that last month there was a rally in Montreal where people were photographed waving Hezbollah flags.

"We have to realize that the support may be wider with this group, which is outlawed in Canada, than maybe we thought before," she said.

Both Klein and Rudner agreed that the only thing the Jewish community can do is be alert, take necessary precautions and work with police.

Klein said B'nai Brith has called the police after receiving threats in the form of e-mails, letters and phone calls. One of the threats was from someone who said that "a good Jew is a dead Jew."

B'nai Brith says Hezbollah sleeper cells may be a threat; one family received a decapitated pig

"We have advised Jewish community organizations to be particularly vigilant, to ensure their security procedures are in place and to be in contact with their local police representatives to make sure special attention is paid," Rudner said.

"When you see something that strikes you as being peculiar – for example, maybe a car or a truck parked in front of a synagogue at a time or a place that really seems unusual, call the synagogue and ask them if they know anything about it," Rudner advised.

"It's better to make a phone call and be told it's nothing than not to make a phone call and wonder if you should have done something."

"Be alert," Klein said, adding that B'nai Brith has produced a pamphlet titled "Twelve Warning Signs," which outlines things to watch out for, such as people photographing, sketching or surveying buildings; an increase in false fire and security alarms; and e-mails or calls requesting details about a building, personnel or schedules.

"We've talked to synagogues and other Jewish organizations about extra checks at the premises and people should just keep their eyes open," she said

For those who wish to report anything suspicious, call B'nai Brith's community hotline at 1-800-892-2624 or the RCMP hotline at 1-800-420-5805.

Israel at War

Haifa mayor stays strong despite relentless rocket attacks

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

As the residents of Haifa continue to suffer more casualties and destruction from rocket attacks launched by Hezbollah, Haifa mayor Yona Yahav is determined to stay strong to set an example for his community.

"The whole municipality is working in a very efficient way to serve the people and to provide all the services required," Yahav said from Haifa.

"We are working 24 hours a day and we are very prepared for this job because we have worked for the whole year in order to prepare ourselves, not for a shell of rockets, but for earthquakes.

"We are confident, and this confidence is being conveyed onto the people. This is helping the way people are behaving. We are a very strong community," said Yahav, who has been Haifa's mayor since 2003.

But despite the resolve of the 270,000-person community, there is no denying the negative impact that the war is having on every aspect of the city's well-being.

"Haifa is under attack, under fire. We have had up until now 60 rockets which caused destruction and we have had until now, 10 casualties," he said in an interview with The CJN last week after a man had been killed by the shrapnel of a rocket that landed next to his car.

"The economy is in a hole, most of the businesses are closed. And people are instructed to stay behind walls because the rockets that are being shot at us contain thousands of [ball bearings], which are being scattered around in a radius of kilometres," Yahav said.

"This morning I visited a funeral of one of my people, one of the inhabitants of this city. He drove innocently in his car along the road and a rocket exploded [near] his car," said the mayor, who just days earlier spoke with the Israeli consul general, Ya'acov Brosh, during a conference call at an emergency meeting arranged by the Toronto-based Haifa Foundation.

During the meeting, Yahav said that with the help of Canadians, he hopes he'll be able to provide his community during and after the Lebanese-Israeli war, with a summer day camp program for children in the shelters, aid for psychological treatments, and a capital loan foundation for small businesses, which have virtually shut down since the fighting began July 12.

"This city is usually full of life. During the summer, it is a very attractive place. You have very nice beaches, lots of cultural activities, festivals and carnivals and these kinds of activities are being robbed from the city and from at least half a million people," said Yahav, in reference to the fact that the once-bustling city resembles more of a ghost town, which is causing Haifa's economy to suffer.

But tourism, which is Haifa's number 1 economic resource, is not the only part of the economy that is suffering.

Many Haifa residents, Yahav said, can't or won't go to work.

"If he has a shelter in his workplace, he is permitted to leave home and go to work. If in his workplace there is no shelter, he stays either in Haifa, at home, or he may have left Haifa to go down south and stay in a hotel, or with family."

He said that of the 270,000 Haifa residents, roughly 20 per cent have left Haifa to avoid the danger of the rockets that continue to claim lives and injure others.

The physical destruction, however, could be worse.

"The destruction is relatively low for big buildings. But we have suffered the highest number of casualties."

As part of the plan to rebuild Haifa, Yahav is appealing to the international community to play an active role in restoring Haifa's reputation as a safe tourist destination.

"Immediately after the war, [Jewish organizations] should send delegations to Haifa because we have to reconstruct the tourism industry and economy," he said, adding that the more people participate, the quicker they should recover.

Yahav also hopes that if Haifa does receive aid from the international community, he'll be able to put it toward making improvements to rescue organizations such as Magen David Adom.

"I'd like to see our forces get more aid to make them more efficient in carrying out their job," he said.

More importantly, he hopes people from around the world will continue to voice their opposition to Hezbollah.

"The international community can exert efforts to dismantle Hezbollah because as long as Hezbollah stays armed, within the near future, we will suffer again the bombings."

Yahav said that he is thankful for the support his city has received from the Canadian Jewish community.

"The backing of the community shows that we are one people."

Israel at War

Cotler and CJC blast Arbour's comments on Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, Canada's former justice minister, has challenged suggestions by a senior Canadian United Nations official, Louise Arbour, that Israel may have broken international law and committed war crimes during its current military offensive against Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Meanwhile, Ed Morgan, president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, declared that Israel is adhering to guidelines set down by international law, while David Matas, a Winnipeg-based human rights lawyer, described Arbour's comments as "wrong."

Arbour, the United Nations' high commissioner for human rights and a former Canadian Supreme Court justice, touched off the controversy on July 19 when she expressed grave concern about the intense fighting, which has so far killed some 400 Lebanese and more than 50 Israelis.

In an apparent reprimand of Hezbollah's bombardment of northern Israeli towns and cities, Arbour said, "Indiscriminate shelling of cities constitutes a foreseeable and unacceptable targeting of civilians."

But in an oblique reference to Israel's retaliatory air raids and artillery and tank barrages, Arbour observed: "Similarly, the bombardment of sites with alleged military significance, but resulting invariably in the killing of innocent civilians, is unjustifiable."

She added: "International law demands accountability. The scale of the killings in the region... could engage the personal criminal responsibility of those involved, particularly those in a position of command and control."

By contrast, Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper said that Israel's military response had been "measured."

Cotler, the MP for the Montreal riding of Mount Royal and a McGill University law professor currently on leave, characterized Arbour's remarks on Lebanon as "superficial," "simplistic," "uninformed" and "misleading."

In an essay submitted to the CJN, he wrote: "First, it is a postulate of constitutional law that a government's first duty – be it Canada or Israel – is the protection of its citizens. Second, and not unrelated, international law mandates the right, if not duty, of self-defence against aggression... and the reasonable use of military force for that protective purpose."

Cotler, a past president of Canadian Jewish Congress, said the "root cause" of the hostilities in Lebanon, as well as the Gaza Strip, is the unwillingness of Hezbollah and Hamas, and its supporters, to "recognize Israel within any boundaries."

Taking issue with Arbour's interpretation of international law, Cotler made two points: Israel has a right to attack military targets in cities "so long as every effort is made to reduce civilian casualties," and Israel can legitimately hit sites such as apartment buildings and bridges if they are part of "the infrastructure from which war is waged."

Cotler added that if Israel is prohibited from defending itself, "the whole of Israel becomes a 'sitting duck' for Hezbollah and Hamas' international criminality."

Blasting Hezbollah and Hamas, Cotler said that they are "legally and morally responsible for civilian casualties in Lebanon resulting from Israeli bombardments of areas containing missiles, rockets or the terrorists themselves."

Concluding his piece, Cotler observed, "In the end, Hamas and Hezbollah launched an unprovoked act of war against Israel, and Israel had no choice but to protect its citizens."

Morgan, who is also a law professor at the University of Toronto, said Israel's tactics in Lebanon and Gaza appear "to be closely modelled" on those developed by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) during its 1999 air war in the former Yugoslavia.

"Just as the Israeli aerial bombardment of targets in Lebanon is designed to defeat a terror organization and dislodge it from the civilian population of Lebanon, so the NATO bombing campaign was designed to defeat the Serbian forces and dislodge them from the civilian population of Kosovo."

Morgan said NATO's 1999 campaign, which was authorized by the United Nations and targeted power stations, bridges and the like, unintentionally caused the deaths of almost 500 civilians.

"The parallels are so close that Israel's military planners are following the guidelines set down by international law for legitimate anti-terrorism warfare.

"The United Nations' chief war crimes prosecutor, a position held by Louise Arbour herself during the Kosovo campaign, has determined that these military tactics do not constitute war crimes."

Morgan agreed that leaders should be responsible for acts over which they have command and control.

"The leadership of Hamas and Hezbollah should, therefore, be held legally accountable for the deaths and damage inflicted by the illegal conduct of their respective forces."

Matas, the senior honorary counsel of B'nai Brith Canada, charged that "false symmetry" permeates Arbour's statements. As he put it, "Hezbollah, which is attacking, and Israel, which is defending, are treated alike."

Matas said that Arbour offered "not a word about possible alternatives open to Israel to defend itself" and made "no reference to the use by Hezbollah of civilians as shields."

As a result, he said, "Arbour has made a gratuitous suggestion that Israel is violating international law, without legal or factual foundation and, at least in form, put Hezbollah and Israel on an equal footing."

Accusing Arbour of getting her international law "wrong," Matas said she is "insensitive to context – the unwarranted, unprovoked terrorist attacks by Hezbollah and Hamas against Israel, and the need for Israel to defend itself."

Matas said that while her comments are couched in the language of international human rights law, she appeals to "anti-Zionist states who tyrannize the UN human rights institutions."

"These states care little about human rights and a whole lot about delegitimizing Israel through criticism of imaginary human rights violations," he said.

"Though it is probably unrealistic to have expected her to defend Israeli behaviour, she could have said nothing. By pandering to the anti-Zionist lobby, she has acquitted herself improperly."

By suggesting that Israel may be guilty of major human rights violations, Arbour feeds Hezbollah's and Hamas' propaganda machines, reinforces their commitment to terrorism and envenoms the Arab-Israeli conflict, he said.

"I regret that she has fallen prey to the corruption of human rights promoted by anti-Zionist states. I regret even more that the UN, in this case the office of the United Nations high commissioner for human rights, continues to self-destruct when asked to deal with Israel."

Dan Gillerman, Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, was quoted as dismissing Arbour's comments as "totally irrelevant."

In an op-ed piece in the National Post, Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz described her remarks as "bizarre" and her knowledge of international law "as questionable as her understanding of morality."

Praise for Stephen Harper...

We give Prime Minister Stephen Harper a great deal of credit. Time and again, he has demonstrated the strength of will and the sheer personal courage of his convictions in resisting the near hysterical haranguing by the predictable herd of opponents that he return to a more "balanced" Canadian foreign policy toward Israel's dispute with its enemies.

In a recent op-ed piece in the Globe and Mail, Paul Heinbecker, the former Canadian ambassador to the United Nations, bemoaned the fact that Harper actually supports Israel in its life and death struggle against Hamas, Hezbollah and their supporters. He urged the prime minister to "put Canadian interests above diaspora politics" so as not to favour "the cause of one group over another." The reference, of course, by Heinbecker to "diaspora politics," – i.e., pandering to the Jewish community of Canada – was the drawing away of his veil of bias.

But when the cause of one group is doctrinally – and one can add even ghoulishly – committed to the annihilation of the other, is a position that favours the right of the latter group to defend its life not the morally appropriate stance to take? Harper believes that it is.

And so do most Canadians. They understand instinctively, in a deep and elemental way, that despite animated, exorcised opinions such as Heinbercker's to the contrary, that Harper is correct when he stands on principle in supporting Israel against Hamas, Hezbollah and their sponsors. According to an Ipsos Reid-CanWest Global survey published on July 24, nearly two-thirds of Canadians – some 64 per cent – believe Israel's military response to Hezbollah's unprovoked attacks on July 12 has been either "completely" or "somewhat"justified."

We praise the prime minister for standing so resolutely on guard for Israel's right to live a free and democratic existence in the Middle East, one of the principles in which, to his everlasting credit, he steadfastly believes.

... and scorn for Kofi Annan

But we recoil in scorn for the way in which UN Secretary General Kofi Annan rushed to judge and condemn Israel, without waiting for all of the evidence, for having "deliberately" attacked the UNIFIL outpost in south Lebanon killing the four UN observers, including one Canadian. In the tense and suffering atmosphere of the ongoing war, his comments served only to incite more hostility and hatred toward the Jewish state. That, clearly, is not part of Annan's mandate, but yet it is sadly consistent with the United Nations' treatment of the Jewish state.

25 years ago in The CJN

The truce on the Israel-Lebanon border between Israeli and PLO forces remained shaky, as PLO fighters opened fire on a bus going to a kibbutz on the Israeli side of the international boundary. Adding to the tension in the area, Syria announced that it did not consider itself bound by the ceasefire.

Moral confusion

I was deeply saddened and disturbed by the recent comments of Conservative British parliamentarian, Sir Peter Tapsell, comparing Israeli strikes at Hezbollah targets in Lebanon to a war crime "gravely reminiscent of the Nazi atrocity on the Jewish quarter of Warsaw." It would seem that for Sir Peter, there is little difference between a country seeking to rid itself of an existential threat by bombing targets housing munitions and inadvertently killing civilians in the process, and the deliberate ghettoization, gassing and burning of innocents solely because they were Jews.

Confusion abounds in Her Majesty's Parliament it would seem. So too amongst like-minded individuals self-flagellating about Israel's "disproportionate response." An orgy of Orwellian agitprop is once again metamorphosing victim into aggressor and painting the Jewish state with the foul stigma of moral culpability.

Israel did not instigate this conflict. Israel responded to an act of war perpetrated against its sovereignty by a foreign terrorist group. To be sure, there are many innocent Lebanese who have suffered as a result of the Israeli campaign in Lebanon. But the relentless bombardment of images of destruction and human suffering must not be allowed to distract us, even for a fleeting moment, of where the blame for this dire and tragic situation lies: not with Israel, but with Hezbollah and their Iranian and Syrian puppet-masters.

In fact, Israel has behaved with suicidal forbearance, carefully circumscribing targets and taking pains to alert and avoid harming civilians while certain that such temperance would be used to the advantage of its enemies. And to what end? Hezbollah has continued to operate and deliberately hide its cache of munitions in civilian areas, hoping to maximize civilian casualties and parade pictures of maimed and bloodied women and children before the eyes of a war-sick world. Would that Sir Peter had found a few choice words to capture such depravity, cowardice and cynicism rather than demand that Israel buy the approval and goodwill of other nations at the cost of the lives of its own citizens.

I asked a friend last week to join me in a rally in support of Israel. "The way we're bombing Beirut's infrastructure! No way. I think we should lay low," was the reply. Beware the opaque miasma of moral confusion that gives us false reason to question the justness and necessity of our actions.

Air Canada's kosher meals

I recently travelled with my wife and three children from Halifax to London, England, with Air Canada. I ordered kosher meals when I booked the flight some two months in advance of the departure date. The kosher meals were confirmed on my electronic reservation and appeared on my boarding pass when issued at the airport.

All proceeded without incident except that the requested kosher meals were not on board the plane. The flight attendants could do little except to note the incident and to promise that it would not reoccur on the return flight.

For the return flight to Canada from London, we had requested five meals but only four were on board. The four meals, however, had been prepared for Passover and were by this time some three months old.

This is not the first time that I have encountered problems with kosher meals on Air Canada. I present three possibilities: first is that all is well with Air Canada's service and that I have simply had a spate of bad luck; second is that these episodes are representative of a general sloppy approach to customer service and anyone who requests a special service is treated in a like manner; and third is the notion that there may be a disturbing pattern that cannot be explained satisfactorily through either bad luck or bad management.

Before arriving at any conclusion, assembling some data would be in order. Accordingly, I would ask readers to share with me any similar episodes that they may have had with Air Canada.

OJA Ontario Jewish history grant

Some information was not included in the article "Grant awarded to document Ont. Jewish history," (CJN, July 13).

It should be noted that the Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA) is a department of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The article states that the OJA has not received a grant for 30 years. Actually, we have received at least 20 grants during the last 30 years. However, the OJA has not received a grant like this, which has allowed us to visit and produce histories and oral histories for these small Jewish Ontario communities, for 30 years. My predecessor, Stephen Speisman, launched a similar initiative 30 years ago. That project was funded by a generous grant from Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council.

Readers respond to Israel at war

I am a former Liberal party supporter and pro-democracy community activist. Recently, I joined the Conservative Party of Canada.

I offer immense praise to Prime Minister Stephen Harper for his decisive and unequivocal language in defending Israel's right to simply defend itself. I haven't heard common sense and justice from a Canadian prime minister in years. Not just the Middle East but also Canada and the world, too, will be safer in these threatening times thanks to the leadership of our prime minister.

It is gratifying and refreshing to have Prime Minister Stephen Harper express his unwavering support of Israel during the current conflict with Hezbollah and Hamas. He described the devastating attacks on Gaza and Lebanon as measured. What a far cry from the governments of former prime ministers Jean Chrétien and Paul Martin who, when speaking to Jewish audiences, contended they fully supported Israel and its right to exist and to defend itself. More times than not, this was followed by a slanted resolution by the United Nations against Israel, which was usually supported by Canada, or at best, Canada abstained. Finally, we have a government that recognizes the moral correctness of Israel's position and the terrorist evil that it is attempting to eradicate in Lebanon and in the West Bank and Gaza.

Bert Raphael

Prime Minister Stephen Harper has strongly defended Israel's right to respond to attacks and kidnappings by Hamas and Hezbollah. The Harper government's firm support differs greatly from previous Canadian policy toward Israel, when Liberal governments tended to, at best, remain "neutral" in their position regarding the Middle East.

The current conflict was, as we know, initiated by Hamas and Hezbollah. This is no surprise.

Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah, at the end of November 2002, in a broadcast on Lebanese television, said, "I encourage Palestinians to take suicide bombings worldwide. Don't be shy about it." He also promised a global terror campaign by Hezbollah itself.

A month earlier, then-prime minister Jean Chrétien had encountered Nasrallah at the Francophonie summit held in Beirut. Indeed, Chrétien's speech at the summit was delivered while Nasrallah was sitting in the front row. Chrétien made light of Nasrallah's presence, saying, "I didn't know. I didn't meet him. He was invited by the Lebanese government."

The Canadian Jewish Congress at the time passed a motion saying it was "appalled" by Chrétien's comments.

It would be hard to picture Harper in the same room with a Hezbollah leader. What a difference a change in the party that governs Canada can make!

I think the time has come to draw lines in the sand.

I have been a pacifist all my life. I might, for myself, even choose death rather than renounce my pacifist values, but today, terrorists are aiming their guns at my children and grandchildren. We are being confronted by fanatics whose agenda is death: kill or be killed… and they gladly accept death and martyrdom for themselves.

New York, London, Riyadh, Madrid, Jakarta, Bali, Kabul, Baghdad, Mumbai… We are experiencing today the legacy of two men: the leader of the Iranian Islamic revolution Ayatollah Khomeini and former president of the Palestinian Authority Yasser Arafat. And the sporadic hypocrisy of some European nations.

It is useful at times like these to recall the lessons of history, lest we doom ourselves to repeating the same mistakes. It comes down to this: we, the non-Islamic world, are in denial.

If the Muslim extremists are right and jihad, martyrdom, revenge and destruction or conversion of the whole world to Islam are a legitimate part of Islamic agenda, then we, the rest of the world, must declare unequivocal, unrestrained war on Islam.

If they are wrong, then the worldwide Muslim community has an obligation – both to itself and to us – to eradicate its own extremists. If they don't, can't or won't, then we have no choice but to do it ourselves – unfortunately, at a very high cost to innocents.

I will weep for all the innocents on all sides, but their suffering is a consequence of Islam's inability to look after the rot within. The number of innocents is growing and will continue to grow. The longer we wait, the higher will be the ultimate toll. I abhor war. But if I must, I accept it with resignation. It takes two to make peace.

I firmly believe the Islamic extremists are wrong, but that is just one man's opinion: it is not for me to answers that question. Either way, the choices are clear.

Now the peace movements of Canada, the United States, Great Britain and France are walking proudly side by side with Lebanese marchers and the marchers are never asked this question: which flag do you pledge allegiance to? The flag of Lebanon has at its centre a tree, which represents life. The one of the Hezbollah has a clenched fist with a semi-automatic rifle. I thought that peace groups were against all arms. Why then are they walking alongside those who swear allegiance to the clenched fist brandishing a semi-automatic?

Why is the peace movement not asking that the government in Lebanon attack Hezbollah to purge itself of the terrorist problem? Instead, Israel is being used to clean up Hezbollah.

Jews are being used as the unofficial police force of the Mideast. A thankless job that no one wants to do – let the Jews do it, let them clean up, and instead of saying thank you, criticize them, humiliate them and be against them… Why? Because it is easier to play the game of the ostrich than to be courageous and see life as it is.

The dismantling of the Iranian proxy, Hezbollah, would be a major blow against global terrorism, the rogue states Syria and Iran, and possibly even Iran's nuclear plans. But if Hezbollah emerges intact as a fighting force, Israel and the global war on terrorism will suffer significantly. Saudi Arabia and other moderate Arab states issued a rare condemnation of Hezbollah, as they fear the ramifications of its strength. Much of the Middle East has been engulfed by Islamic radicalism. Israel must remain strong as democracy's bulwark against the Islamic tide.

I just got off the phone with the latest of my concerned friends and relatives who have called me because they are concerned for my safety. I, along with an entire country, am sad, frustrated and longing for peace.

I am sitting in my Tel Aviv apartment with the news blaring, listening to a reporter interviewing victims of the missile attack on the train station in Haifa this morning. My boyfriend just informed me that his cousin, one of the eight people working in the Haifa train station, was killed. He was murdered because he worked in a city that is close enough for the Hezbollah to attack. I was about to take a train to Haifa today to visit my cousin, but now I won't go.

Much of the international news media that I have been following online is calling for Israel to stop its attack. In Israel, the politicians from almost all the parties are strong in claiming that they will not be bullied into submission. This latest battle started with the kidnapping of Israeli soldiers by Hezbollah. Hezbollah refused to return the soldiers, so Israel attacked their bases in Lebanon. Israel is being very clear that it is not attacking Lebanon, but the Hezbollah terrorist organization cells there. Citizens on both sides are suffering and wondering when will there be peace.

Growing up in Montreal, I always heard about the battles that went on with Israel and its Arab neighbours. I have been here for several months studying and doing research for my McGill University master's degree. It has been amazing, calm and fun – that is until now. Now I am being informed by the news media that I should check my apartment shelter and make sure that I have water there. This whole situation seems unreal. I, along with the entire country, am wondering how long will this go on and when there will finally be peace.

The Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims is deeply saddened and disturbed to see the Middle East engulfed in flames of madness once again. We are struck by the callous disregard among those who are fanning the flames for the humanitarian cost of their actions.

What is most shameful is that those who could put a stop to this madness are unwilling to do anything while innocent lives are being lost. Efforts for ceasefire are being dismissed as too early in the game or as conditional on the actions of the "other" who is at fault.

What the regional players in this sad drama need to understand is that their actions are likely to achieve results that are totally opposite to their stated objectives. Future generations will have to pay the price for the short-sightedness of the current decision-makers. An ungovernable Lebanon is the best gift anyone can present to terrorist organizations of any stripe. Hezbollah and other extremist groups would want nothing more than an anarchistic land filled with homeless citizens who are consumed by hatred for those who have killed their loved ones. Hamas is strengthened by the mistreatment and dire conditions experienced by Palestinian civilians.

If the conflicting parties are sincere about protecting their populations and eliminating violence, they must accept the geo-political reality that both Israel and Palestine must have viable states and they must recognize that no matter how much brute force they use, in the end, they will still have to talk. The parties also need to abstain from the fiery rhetoric that on a daily basis dehumanizes the "other," exacerbates the climate of fear and invites retaliation.

We urge the United Nations to send an international force with appropriate powers to restore and maintain a ceasefire on the Lebanese and Gaza borders.

Bigotry in the guise of piety

Before current allegations of sexual harassment involving him appeared in the Israeli media, the news that Israeli President Moshe Katsav refuses to address Reform rabbis as "rabbi" hit the headlines.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

In response, the head of the North American Reform movement, Rabbi Eric Yoffie, decided that enough was enough. When the delegates to the recently held Zionist Congress were invited to the president's residence, Rabbi Yoffie boycotted the event.

Katsav complained that Rabbi Yoffie went to the media and blasted him at a Jewish Agency meeting, even though it was Katsav who first said on TV that he doesn't acknowledge Reform rabbis as being rabbis.

It has since been reported that the president will address them as "Reform Rabbi," whereas Conservative rabbis will be addressed in the proper manner. This is a baffling distinction, for Israeli Orthodoxy usually treats both with the same discourtesy.

By shortchanging Reform rabbis, Katsav is offending 1½ million Jews in the Diaspora. As it's inconceivable that he believes that Israel neither wants nor needs the loyalty and support of the Reform movement, one has to conclude that bigotry in the guise of piety got the better of him.

There has been speculation that Israel Meir Lau, Israel's former Ashkenazi chief rabbi, may succeed Katsav. Therefore, questions are now being asked about how he, an exponent of Israeli Orthodoxy, would relate to non-Orthodox sectors of the Jewish world. Will bigotry in the guise of piety get the better of him, too?

Katsav is setting a bad precedent. His decision endangers Israel-Diaspora relations and, at the same time, diminishes his stature. For whatever his personal views may be, he was elected to serve all of his country's citizens and to represent Israel to the world in general, and the Jewish world in particular. Snubbing Reform rabbis is an affront to an influential sector of the Diaspora and a growing minority in Israel.

There was a time when Reform Jews would take such treatment lying down. Their commitment to Israel was greater than their sense of self-worth. But that's no longer the case. Though their commitment has not diminished, their sense of self-worth has grown. Rabbi Yoffie's symbolic boycott reflects this more assertive approach.

Whereas in years past Reform Jews were prone to style themselves as victims of Orthodox political machinations in Israel (and in smaller communities around the world), this is no longer true. Reform has come of age. It expects that its presence and growth in the Jewish world, especially in the United States, will also be respected in Israel.

Katsav and his successors better take note if they want to be true to their mission and serious about working for the good of the Jewish people.

My Ethiopian journey

From May 7 to 11, I travelled with my father to Ethiopia and Israel on a UIA Federations Canada mission called Keeping the Promise. The purpose was to see how Ethiopians – and especially Falash Mora hoping to travel to Israel – live, as well as to gain more understanding of the role of the Jewish Agency and Israeli Embassy inside Ethiopia, and envision new ways that Diaspora Jews can help Ethiopian immigrants to Israel during their long absorption process.

Eric Goldberg in Halifax

Like the historic operations of Moses and Solomon, Operation Promise, an initiative of the Jewish federations of North America, promotes the return of Ethiopian Jews to Israel and their absorption into modern Israeli society.

The contrast between Israel and Ethiopia became immediately apparent upon our arrival in the capital, Addis Ababa. Compared to the modern Tel Aviv skyline, the primitive bamboo scaffolding seen throughout Addis evoked a past millennium.

Our small group of 15 people was made up mainly of Jewish community leaders and professionals. I was one of two students on the trip. Micha Feldman, our group leader, had been in charge of the Jewish Agency's operations in Ethiopia in 1991 and organized the evacuation of some 14,000 Ethiopian Jews during Operation Solomon. His knowledge of Amharic, the Ethiopian language, as well as his his empathy toward the local people and his fascinating stories about Israeli diplomacy and heroism enriched our experience.

Our group was astonished at the conditions in Ethiopia, a country where male life expectancy is 47. Right outside our hotel was a shantytown where large families lived in small dung huts and children ran eagerly to their dilapidated school. The Grade 4 class there sang us English songs and proudly spoke of becoming doctors and teachers, much like Canadian kids would. We could only hope that one day their dreams will come true, despite their forlorn conditions.

The highlight of our short journey involved the Falash Mora, and specifically the 80 olim who would go with us to Israel.

Travelling to Gondar, the mountainous region where Ethiopian Jews traditionally resided, we witnessed first hand the work of the Jewish Agency and the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC). In the middle of a desolate village, a Star of David was on the doorway of a compound where hundreds of families are interviewed daily as part of the process that will eventually put some of them on a plane to Israel.

Thousands of others who have sold everything to move to Gondar with the hope of going to Israel can only sit and wait. In this isolated place, we were amazed to find grown men putting on tfillin for the first time and tallits being woven in small huts. When we left this enclave, we were treated to an off-tune but invigorating version of Hatikvah. And as we proceeded on to an area with a synagogue, feeding area and medical centre, hundreds of kids began to follow us, and for a few minutes, we felt as though we were leading them on a road of hope.

The day we left for Israel was my 19th birthday. As we met "our" olim at the Israeli Embassy, I was surprised with a birthday cake. We watched the children eat the cake, which we later learned was worth three months wages for the average Ethiopian. Tears rolled down all of our cheeks when we discovered that the children had never tasted anything so sweet, and that they considered the day of their departure to Israel to be like a second birthday.

Later that night, we rejoined the olim as they were waiting to go to the airport. Dressed in JDC- donated clothing, many were overcome with exhaustion, emotion, and fear. Most had waited eight years, some even more, for the chance to go to Israel. One boy, who asked me for batteries for his new camera, was an orphan on his way to meet his grandparents, who had left Ethiopia prior to his birth. I couldn't imagine how I would feel having to uproot myself from my home at age 15 and travel to a strange land that I knew very little about.

Our promise is not only to bring these people to Israel, but also to hold their hands as they are slowly absorbed into their new society.

To witness our olim tightly grasp the Israeli flag when they disembarked from the plane in Israel personified for me the Jewish value of "Kol yisrael areyvim zeh lazeh" ("All Jews must care for one another"). Operation Promise challenges us to do more, specifically within Israel. We should not allow these new Israelis to lose any of their love for our land. As we strive to ensure that their grip on the Israeli flag stays tight, we realize that our own grip becomes tighter

The joy of travel

This summer, I did something that I have not done for quite a few years – I travelled. The purpose of my trip was to attend my sister's wedding in Jerusalem. Now, since long-distance travel is not something I do often, unless you consider a 1½-hour bus ride a long distance, I tried to look at the entire process from a somewhat fresh viewpoint

Gershon Richter in Winnipeg

Everyone knows that before leaving, you have to make lists of items you can't live without, find all those items, and then put them in a suitcase. For most people, this is isn't difficult. A normal person would pack some clothes and toiletries. But not very surprisingly, my family situation was not entirely normal

Even though we would only need three suitcases for the three of us travelling, we also had a small mountain of things that my sister wanted us to bring her from Canada. Again not surprisingly, a small mountain of things packed into regulation size suitcases weighing no more than 50 pounds each becomes a small mountain of regulation size suitcases

After carting the luggage from the taxi into the airport and checking it all in, we discovered that the flight we had arrived two hours early for would be leaving an hour late. Although no official explanation was given, I assume that when the baggage handlers saw the amount of luggage we had brought, they needed an extra hour to throw around the suitcases until something inside them rattled. This is a good thing, because it is my understanding that any luggage that can't be broken is "accidentally lost."

The delay from Winnipeg followed us to Toronto. After disembarking in one terminal, we had to get to the British Airways counter, which happens to be in another terminal, at the farthest possible distance from where we entered it. After a frantic run, we reached the ticket counter, only to be told that boarding for our flight had closed just a few minutes before.

A nice British Airways employee took pity on us and radioed for permission to let us on the plane. Thankfully, after 20 slow minutes, we were allowed get on and even seated in a higher class than our original tickets were for. A long and comparatively uneventful flight to London followed.

London's major airport, Heathrow, looks more like a massive mall than an airport. Having some time to waste, my little brother, who is obsessed with shoes and sunglasses, borrowed my camera and proceeded to take pictures of all the shoes and all the glasses in the entire airport – or at least it seemed that way when we tried to review the pictures. We finally proceeded to the correct gate, where most of the people were recognizably and sometimes comically stereotypically Jewish. Not too long afterward, boarding began.

After everyone boarded, carry-ons were carried on, and the seatbelt light was lit, the flight attendant announced that as a result of weather problems over Germany, take-off would be delayed 50 minutes. For those 50 minutes, we would all get to sit in the plane as we taxied at the speed of a bicycle toward the runway where we would, eventually, take off.

While waiting, people naturally reclined their seats. One man, who had apparently never flown before (or perhaps never in coach), complained to the flight attendant quite vocally that when the person in front of him reclined, he had no room. He didn't seem to notice that he was in a plane full of people in an identical situation. The flight attendant happily moved the person who was reclining up a class to ensure that nobody reclined in that seat. Minutes later, a man who had "upgraded himself" was moved back and into the now empty seat. He reclined

The rest of the trip was pretty much a blur. I seem to have a low threshold for tired boredom, and I barely recall what happened, except to say that the food and the television were both predictably "airplane." Exhausted from sitting in one spot, we arrived in Israel. Further adventures will have to be recounted another time

Israel battles Islamic radicalism on two fronts

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The two-front war Israel is currently waging in southern Lebanon and the Gaza Strip, areas the Israeli army unilaterally evacuated in 2000 and 2005, respectively, is unlike any it has ever fought.

In previous wars –1948, 1956, 1967, 1973 and 1982 – Israel faced threats from either Arab nationalist regimes or armed secular Palestinian militias. But in this conflict, triggered by the the naked aggression of Hamas and Hezbollah, Israel confronts a highly motivated, well-equipped and exceedingly dangerous enemy: Islamic radicalism, backed by Iran and its ally, Syria.

As Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has said, Israel faces an "axis of terror" emanating from Gaza, Lebanon, Tehran and Damascus. Viewed from this perspective, the focus of the Arab-Israeli dispute has shifted radically and may never be the same again. This new enemy, whose openly stated goal is Israel's annihilation, is admired throughout the Muslim world, which seems convinced that Israel is a transitory phenomenon, a latter-day Crusader state.

Drawn together in an alliance of convenience, Iran – a staunchly Islamic state – and Syria an ardently secular one – are engaged in what can only be described as a proxy war against Israel. The crisis – which has exposed Israel's home front to the harshest realities of warfare since the 1991 Gulf War - suits them both. It distracts attention away from Iran's budding nuclear program, the subject of an increasingly rancorous, still unresolved United Nations debate. Syria, on the other hand, can breathe a sigh of relief that its complicity in last year's assassination of Lebanon's prime minister, Rafik Hariri, will be shunted aside.

What is also worth noting is the reaction of the Arab world. The Arab media has ritualistically excoriated Israel as the villain of the piece, notwithstanding the fact that Israel is defending itself. But important Sunni Arab states such as Egypt and Saudi Arabia, which fear Iran's growing influence in the region, have accused Hezbollah of adventurism.

The destabilizing role that Iran and Syria have played in this crisis is clear beyond a doubt.

Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has repeatedly shown himself to be a vicious opponent of Israel's existence, as well as an outright Holocaust denier, has backed Hezbollah to the hilt, as has his less extreme predecessor, Mohammed Khatami, who recently likened it to "a shining sun that illuminates and warms the hearts of all Muslims."

Iran, which turned on Israel in the wake of the 1979 Islamic revolution, has supplied Hezbollah with financial and logistical support, but more important, with the short-range and long-range rockets that have rained down on Israeli cities in the Galilee since the outbreak of the war on the northern front on July 12. All told, Iran is estimated to have sent Hezbollah upward of 12,000 rockets, one of which severely damaged an Israeli naval vessel and killed four of its sailors.

Iran's influence is also keenly felt in Gaza and the West Bank. At a time when western governments, including the United States and Canada, have boycotted Hamas for its refusal to recognize Israel, accept previous Palestinian agreements with Israel and cease terrorism, Iran has promised to funnel $50 million (US) worth of aid to Hamas. And by all accounts, Iran, through proxies such as Hamas and Hezbollah, has intensified its efforts to undermine a possible renewal of the diplomatic process between Israel and the Palestinians.

Syria, like Iran, has praised Hezbollah's kidnapping of two Israeli soldiers. The Syrians, under the leadership of Bashir Assad, have extended logistical assistance to Hezbollah. Iranian shipments of rockets, from the Katyusha-122 to the Fajr-3, are flown directly to Damascus and dispatched overland to Hezbollah. In addition, Syria has given Hezbollah long-range rockets. The projectile that killed eight Israeli railway workers in Haifa, a prime Hezbollah target since the commencement of hostilities, was sent by Syria, which has fought several wars with Israel.

Many Lebanese, particularly Christians, are weary of Syrian meddling in Lebanon's affairs and believe that Syria is partially responsible for Israel's retaliatory raids in Lebanon, yet they hold their tongues in fear of Syria's retribution. But in a rare departure from form, Nayla Moawad, the Lebanese minister for social affairs, has publicly blamed Syria for triggering the crisis in collusion with Tehran.

Whatever the case, Syria has remained relatively silent as Israel has imposed an air and sea blockade on Lebanon, bombed Hezbollah targets and hit Lebanon's infrastructure in a so far unsuccessful attempt to wean the Lebanese government and population away from Hezbollah. Syria, however, has warned Jerusalem that it will join the war should Israel launch a full-scale ground offensive. Last week, Israel's cabinet decided to forego a full-fledged invasion. For its part, Iran has threatened to intervene should Israel attack Syria.

Israeli Defence Minister Amir Peretz has said that Israel has no intention of occupying Lebanon, having learned the hard and bitter lessons of the 1982 invasion and the 22-year occupation that ended in May 2000 with Israel's hasty unilateral pullout from southern Lebanon. But last week, as Israel fought fierce and costly battles with Hezbollah in the strategic hilltop town of Bint Jbail after storming the village of Marun al Ras, Peretz and Olmert announced that Israel intends to set up a narrow security zone there until the arrival of international peacekeepers, whenever that may be.

The current United Nations force in southern Lebanon, UNIFIL, which was established following Israel's first invasion of Lebanon (Operation Litani) in 1978, has been largely ineffective in terms of preventing terrorism, and may yet be disbanded and supplanted by a beefed-up international force.

Hassan Nasrallah

With its withdrawal from Lebanon six years ago, Israel had every reason to think that its border with Lebanon would be more or less quiet. After all, the United Nations certified Israel's pullout. But Hezbollah – which emerged from the ashes of the 1982 war and then fought the Israeli army in Israel's self-declared security buffer – proceeded to claim that the withdrawal was incomplete. Hezbollah insisted that Shebaa Farms, a small area captured from Syria by Israel in the Six Day War, was really Lebanese land. Syria and Lebanon agreed with Hezbollah's position.

And so, less than five months after Israel left southern Lebanon, Hezbollah carried out the first of what would be numerous attacks on Israeli forces in Shebaa Farms. Hezbollah seized three Israeli soldiers, whose bodies were returned in a swap four years later.

Last November, Hezbollah tried to kidnap more Israeli troops, and while this abduction failed, Hezbollah never stopped shelling Israel's outposts in Shebaa Farms. Prior to last month's flareup in Lebanon, Hezbollah managed to kill a dozen Israeli soldiers and six Israeli civilians, yet Israel's response was comparatively muted.

But the incident on July 12, during which Hezbollah crossed the border, killed and kidnapped Israeli soldiers and shelled Israel, was, as Olmert declared, "an act of war" that would bring on "a very painful response."

Israel's current offensive in Lebanon, Operation Change of Direction, is far bigger militarily and more politically ambitious in scope than either Operation Grapes of Wrath (April 1996) or Operation Accountability (July 1993). As one of its leaders has admitted, Hezbollah did not expect such a ferocious reaction, having assumed that Israel's response would be limited. But having been bloodied by Hezbollah's brazen raid, Israel is determined to change the status quo by restoring its military deterrence, pushing Hezbollah out of southern Lebanon once and for all, weakening its military wing, forcing it to disarm under UN Security Council resolution 1559 and persuading the ethnically divided Lebanese army to patrol the northern border. Whether Israel can achieve all these objectives is debatable, since the Lebanese government lacks the will and the strength to crack down on Hezbollah.

Meanwhile, in Gaza, Israel's goal is two-fold: to downgrade Hamas' power and to suppress the firing of Qassam rockets into Israel, particularly Ashkelon and Sderot. To date, Israel has not accomplished these goals in Lebanon or Gaza. Hezbollah has already fired 1,700 rockets into Israel, at a rate of about 100 per day, wreaking death and destruction, and unfortunately, Israel lacks the means to stop the onslaught. Hassan Nasrallah, Hezbollah's leader, has threatened to extend the range of the barrage to Tel Aviv, and in the meantime, the Qassams launched from Gaza keep flying.

The United Nations has called for an immediate ceasefire, but Israel, strongly supported by the U.S., wants more time, at least two weeks, to try to smash Hezbollah's capabilities.

The Bush administration has been very supportive because Israeli and U.S. interests coincide. Washington and Jerusalem are both committed to the post-Sept. 11, 2001, war against global terrorism, and the United States has a score to settle with Hezbollah, which, in 1983, killed 240 of its marines and blew up its embassy in Beirut.

Nonetheless, after Israel's bombing of a building in Qana, which claimed the lives of some 55 Lebanese civilians, Washington is under intense pressure to halt the fighting and give diplomacy a chance.

Hezbollah/Hamas aren't just Israel's problems: former consul general

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

It's the responsibility of the international community "to contain international organizations like Hezbollah and Hamas," said Israel's former consul general to New York, Alon Pinkas.

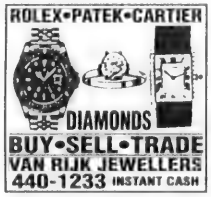
"If the world wants the Mideast to be friends with Israel not from a moral standpoint but from an economic and political standpoint – the world has to contain international organizations like Hezbollah and Hamas. It's not just in Israel, it's your problem, too," he said.

Pinkas, consul general from 2000 to 2004, was speaking at a session of the UJA Leadership Retreat and Emergency Campaign held in Barrie, Ont., on July 25.

He said Israel was sucked into the current conflict by Hezbollah. In order to establish a lasting peace, "Israel has tried negotiations, mediations. We have occupied. We have tried being the bullies, we have tried being the underdogs, and nothing worked."

Israel didn't take Hezbollah threats to kidnap Israeli soldiers seriously enough, he noted

Pinkus was part of the negotiating team for UN Security Council Resolution 1288, under which Israel left Lebanon in May 2000.



UN Security Council Resolution 1559 of 2004 called for the disarmament and dismantling of Hezbollah as a militia, for Syria to cut ties with Hezbollah, and for Hezbollah to stay away from the Israeli border – all motions that were never implemented.

"If we do not separate from the Palestinians because we are tied up in Lebanon, nothing will make Hezbollah happier. Nothing will make Iran, their manipulator, mentor and sugar daddy happier. Nothing. It's that simple," he said.

"They want us involved in Lebanon so that in 2015 the Palestinian and Israeli populations will be so entangled, that the Palestinians will say, 'You know what we want to see happen? One man, one vote – one bi-national state.' And then what are we going to do? If we disenfranchise them, we're not democratic. If we enfranchise them, we're no longer a Jewish state."

Pinkas added that "if there is one thing that unites these two competing strains [Hezbollah and Hamas] of the Islamic world, it's Israel."

He said that Israel's existence serves as a constant reminder to many countries of Middle East of their inadequacies, deficiencies and failures and of the fact that Israel's GDP is the highest in the region.

Pinkas described Hezbollah as being "undeterrable."

"We [assumed] that Hezbollah wouldn't launch missiles into Haifa because what we could do to them far outweighs what they could do to us. That was wrong. They couldn't care less about what we could do to them because we bomb civilian targets, infrastructure, and there'll be inevitable civilian casualties," he said.

Pinkas said Hezbollah feels as if it is competing on an equal footing with Israel's army, the strongest in the region.

"As we speak, an excess of 2,400 rockets have been fired into Israel and a million Israelis are living in and out of bomb shelters," he said.

Speaking of Iran, Pinkas said Israel does not have the capability to destroy Iran's nuclear program, as it is decentralized and underground, but that Israel "may be able to set it behind technologically."

He added that "the world may come to an end [through nuclear destruction] before it comes to an end from global warming."

Other highlights of the UJA retreat included a presentation by Ethiopian-Israeli Moshe Vobo about Sparks and Science, a science education program for Ethiopian olim high school students, and the speaker Hershell Ezrin, of the Canadian Council of Israel and Jewish Advocacy.

The UJA Emergency Campaign aims to raise $20 million to support Israel. At the time of writing, $8 million was raised.

Canadian-born IDF pilot 'was a mensch'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Thousands of people in Israel attended the funeral for Canadian-born Thom Farkas, the 23-year-old Israeli Air Force pilot who was killed last week in a helicopter crash.

His aircraft went down north of Safed, about 15 kilometres south of the Lebanese border, on July 24, when Farkas and his co-pilot joined another helicopter to provide backup for ground forces. They were still over Israeli territory when they were hit by what may have been friendly fire. The Israel Defence Forces was investigating.

His uncle, Rick Kojfman, a Toronto resident who travelled to Israel when he heard the news, said in a phone interview from Israel that with the entire town of Caesarea – Farkas' hometown – coming to the funeral to pay tribute, the family needed a military escort to get in and out of the cemetery.

Farkas was born in Toronto and moved to Israel with his family when he was seven.

Every summer, however, he returned to Canada to stay at Kojfman's Muskoka cottage. "He was due to come again this year, but the air force cancelled all leaves. He loved Canada. It was the place of his birth and he remained attached."

Kojfman said he can't put in words the extent of the family's loss. "To lose someone on the threshold of life is beyond imagination. I cannot describe it, and I wouldn't want anyone else to experience it in order to understand.

"Not only his family, the entire town is devastated. He was a favourite son. Hundreds of people come to his shivah every day."

He described Thom as special, smart, talented and handsome. "He was a 23-year-old boy. He wasn't one of those guys that lived for flying. The last thing he wanted was to be in a war. He wasn't looking for a battle. He was more into playing his guitar, and spending time with his family and friends. Those are the things he valued.

"He had an extraordinary passion for life. He joined the army because it is mandatory. He had plans to finish college and travel after the army," said Kojfman.

Thom's great aunt, Bilha Szerman, said from her Toronto home that he was her treasure. "I can't even express what is in my heart. It is breaking to pieces. I wish I could talk [more] but the tragedy has [overcome] me."

Szerman, who fought along with her husband in the Israeli War of Independence, said Thom was a fighter, but "not the kind of fighter you think. He was a fighter for life

"He was good-hearted, he was a good son, a good nephew, a good person. He was a mensch."

Farkas also leaves his parents Anat and Doron, a captain for El Al Airlines, and two sisters, ages 17 and 11.

'Israel's response is just,' Halifax rally told

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — More than 225 people waved small Israeli flags and heard impassioned speeches as they gathered in Halifax late last month to show solidarity with Israel as the conflict with Hezbollah and Palestinians in Gaza escalated.

The July 20 "Israel Unity Town Hall Meeting" at Shaar Shalom Synagogue, promoted by the Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC), heard politicians and members of the Jewish and Christian communities stress their support for Israel's defence of its borders and its will to free its soldiers kidnapped by Hezbollah and Palestinian forces a few days earlier.

Kings-Hants MP and Liberal party leadership candidate Scott Brison gave a very pro-Israel speech.

"I'm here as a friend of the Jewish people, not as a politician," he said. "Hezbollah started this conflict. They can end it by returning the soldiers and disarming. I support Israel in defending itself for this unprovoked attack."

Brison said he has spent time in both the Jewish communities of New York, where he lived and worked for a year or so, and in Israel, which he has visited.

"I am impressed with the resiliency of the Israelis. If more Canadians could spend time there, they'd see how wonderful Israelis and Israel are."

He stressed that only stable governments in the Palestinian territories and Lebanon will eliminate terrorism. "We [Canadians] are a free people. We respect and defend basic rights. We share beliefs of freedom, democracy and basic human rights. I stand by Israel and pray for peace in the Middle East."

Eric Malloy, the Nova Scotia representative for Bridges For Peace, a Jerusalem-based Christian organization dedicated to supporting people in Israel, said, "I'm honoured to stand alongside my Jewish friends here and in Israel. The world has branded Hezbollah and Hamas as terrorists. Israel's response is just. We stand side by side with the Israelis while praying for Palestinians and Lebanese to find peace."

AJC board member Jim Spatz read a message from Canada's minister for foreign affairs, Peter MacKay. "Hezbollah must take the first step toward peace. Canada demands an end to the attacks on Israel while urging Israel to exercise the utmost restrain and avoid citizen casualties and destruction of infrastruoture."

The crowd, which included more than 120 youths on hand from Camp Kadimah, located about 100 kilometres from Halifax, sang Israeli patriotic songs and heard a communal prayer of hope.

AJC president Mark Rosen informed people in the packed auditorium that "this conflict would not have occurred if Hamas had turned to state-building with the return of Gaza, instead of using their home as a base for terror, and if Hezbollah had been disarmed, as required under UN Security Council resolution 1559."

He noted there is no rejoicing in the destruction of Lebanon's infrastructure or in its citizens' hardships.

"Hezbollah and Hamas want to maximize civilian casualties on both sides by use of weaponry to create terror and maximum injury and then hiding from retaliation among the civilian population," he said.

Hezbollah 'will never, ever' reach its goal

The rally, organized by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Canadian Jewish Congress and the Canada-Israel Committee, featured an address by Ya'acov Brosh, Israel's consul general in Toronto. He outlined his government's objectives in the current conflict with Hezbollah: to secure the release of the kidnapped soldiers and to remove the missile threat that currently has "over one million Israelis [living] as hostages... in their own society. This cannot be acceptable to any rational human being."

Although Israel has been attacked many times during its 58-year history, Brosh said, the enemy is different this time, "declaring clearly that its utmost objective is to totally obliterate the State of Israel... [and] to establish an Islamic republic in what is now Israel. We shall make sure that they will never, ever come even close to this goal," he said, to loud applause.

Brosh reminded the crowd that in the period before the kidnapping of the soldiers by Hezbollah and Hamas last month, in the less than 10 months following Israel's pullout from Gaza, Hamas has fired more than 800 missiles at Israeli cities and villages.

As well, during the past six years, the Lebanese government "failed to adhere to international demands... to deploy its own army along the international border with Israel. Instead the government of Lebanon has enabled Hezbollah to... amass an enormous cache of sophisticated weaponry for the purpose of attacking Israel."

What Hamas and Hezbollah will never understand, Brosh said, is that "when a democratic society feels that it faces a threat that will try to kill innocent civilians, this society will stand as one person, and cut the arm which will try to hit it."

The evening's keynote speaker, retired Canadian Maj.-Gen. Lewis Mackenzie, an experienced peacekeeper who has served in the Middle East, echoed Brosh's sentiments.

"This is Israel versus terrorism," Mackenzie said, "because, unfortunately, the government of Lebanon is not in a position to control a significant element within their own country. It [Hezbollah] controls a lot of territory and about 10 per cent of their people."

In order to help Israel, rally organizers suggest participating in radio call-in programs, monitoring the media for biased reporting, and calling the prime minister to thank him for his stand on the conflict. To contact Harper's office, call 613-992-4211.

Deaths of two Israeli soldiers touch Toronto hearts

Young soldiers left lasting impression

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

The death of two Israeli soldiers killed recently while protecting the country from Hezbollah has profoundly affected the lives of members of Toronto's Jewish community.

On July 19, Staff Sergeant Yonatan Hadasi z"l, 21, from Kibbutz Merhavia, was one of two Special Forces soldiers killed in action in Lebanon while preventing Hezbollah guerillas from crossing the border into Moshav Avivim.

Both soldiers had strong ties to Toronto.

A career soldier, Benjy, who had married his sweetheart of six years just three weeks before his death, was in Toronto last year to take part in the annual UJA Federation Walk with Israel.

Yonatan was a popular participant on the February 2006 CIE (Canada-Israel Experience) Taglit birthright israel Mifgash program.

Mifgash, which means encounter, connects birthright israel participants with eight Israeli soldiers for five days. Often the highlight of the birthright program, Mifgash creates a strong bond between the Canadians and Israelis who, quite often, come to realize they have much more in common than they had imagined.

"According to Yonatan's parents, Mifgash with the Canadian kids was an extremely powerful and meaningful experience in his life," says Lorne Klemensberg, director, Israel Programs, CIE in Israel, who recently travelled to Kibbutz Merhavia in the Jezreel Valley to pay respects to the slain soldier's family.

"His mother and father told me that Yonatan found real meaning in connecting with Jews his own age from across Canada and Mifgash gave him a real perspective on what he was doing in the army. It was all the more moving when Yonatan's mother told us that he planned to travel to Canada to reunite with his new Canadian friends after he finished his service."

Torontonian Steve Glowinsky was one of three leaders of that 2006 birthright israel trip that introduced Yonatan to his new Canadian friends.

"That something like this could happen was always in the back of my mind; but you're still never quite prepared for those fears to become a reality," says the 24-year-old veteran of four birthright israel programs. "On this particular trip, the Mifgash program was by far the most successful I've ever been part of, thanks in no small way to Yonatan. He was such an outgoing, joyful, energetic guy with a tremendous sense of humour. The kids on our trip connected with him instantly. The fact that they won't be able to build a relationship with him in the future, is a real tragedy. We'd all be lucky to have Yonatan as a friend."

Sara Zagdanski, co-chair of the Walk With Israel for the past two years, housed Major Benjy Hillman when he appeared at last year's event. She immediately bonded with the charming and charismatic 27-year-old.

"We had the privilege and honour to host Benjy in our home for 10 days last year when he was here for the Walk," says Zagdanski. "This was his first trip to Canada. We spent so much time together and he quickly became a treasured part of our family; a big brother and friend to our kids, and like another son to us. I spoke to him a couple of weeks ago, only to find out two days later that he was killed. I am devastated by the loss.

"Benjy was a special neshema, a sweet and humble person with a quiet strength and confidence that was so reassuring," adds Zagdanski. "It's impossible to believe he is gone. He commanded his soldiers with such conviction and respect, devoted to them all, to his country and to his faith. He felt a deep responsibility to them and would not leave them at such a critical time, even if it meant delaying his honeymoon. He lived by the belief that the highest level of kedushah (holiness) is to die for Am Yisrael. While his death is a source of anguish and pain, his modesty and his humanity will remain an inspiration. The time we spent with Benjy was a blessing and we know now, as we knew then, that our lives were touched by a true hero of Israel. Let's pray for an everlasting peace for Israel so that Benjy's death, and those of all the soldiers, will not have been in vain."

Leaders briefed on new campaign

UJA Federation leaders received a preview last week of the organization's new Israeli Emergency Campaign 2007 at UJA's leadership retreat hosted by Janis & Kenny Finkelstein at their cottage. The retreat, chaired by Bev Lyons and Mark Waldman, featured, among other speakers, Alon Pinkas, former Consul General of Israel in New York (pictured at right) who spoke openly and honestly about the current crisis now facing Israel.

"The bottom line is that deterrents do not work, it is a western concept and Hezbollah couldn't care less about what price the Lebanese civilians pay. Israel now has to create different options and alternatives that may not be that comfortable," he said. "Israel is here to stay and it should be the world's job to contain terrorist organizations and in the end it will be our job to rethink the Palestinian issue, and be creative about it. We need to think outside the box."

Young Judaea efforts go on despite outbreak of war

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

As part of an annual Canadian Young Judea Biluim Israel trip, 141 Jewish teenagers from across Canada headed to Israel in early July with great optimism and hope. None of them could have anticipated the situation that was about to erupt virtually days after their arrival. With courage and conviction all 141 participants not only decided to remain in Israel when others were leaving, but used their time to interact with Israeli teens giving them a diversion during the crisis.

The decision to remain in Israel was not taken lightly, but after careful consideration the leadership of Canadian Young Judaea, Canada Israel Experience and the participant's parents all came to the same conclusion; it was safe for the teens to remain in Israel and carry on with their program.

"The support from all the organizations and the strong parental support has been unbelievable," says Canadian Young Judea national director Risa Epstein. "I am just so proud of our kids and their parents. It's been just amazing."

A portion of the teens' preparation for their Israel trip was to raise $12,000 for underprivileged Ethiopian immigrant teenagers living in Kiryat Moshe. Unexpectedly the Biluim Israel participants had an even greater impact on the Kiryat Moshe teens than they had originally anticipated. Beyond donating money to the program, they spent time with their Israeli counterparts, playing sports, eating and taking their minds off of the difficult situation facing the country.

"After being at Kiryat Moshe for a day it made me realize the importance of helping others," David Tock, a trip participant and Toronto resident said. "It helped me see how easy it is to make a difference."

"It is important that Canadian Young Judaea is more than just a tour," said Josefa Michaelson, another trip participant. "We were able to make a difference half way around the world."

The trip which returns to Canada on August 8th has been adapted to remove excursions to the north because of the current crisis and the obvious risks. The trip has focused on assuring the safety and comfort of participants.

"It has been so meaningful for these teens to be in Israel at this time, said "Lorne Klemensberg, Director, Israel Programs, Canada Israel Experience. "And to know that the Jewish community back home is so supportive, and all the leadership is behind us has been unbeleivable. This level of backing is unprecedented."

UJA Federation launches Israel Emergency Campaign

$6 million raised in less than an hour

By DANIEL HOROWITZ & SHEILA KORNHAUSER
UJA Federation

As more than one million Israelis are forced to live in bomb shelters for most of the day because of Hezbollah rockets, UJA Federation has begun Israel Emergency Campaign 2007.

The goal is to raise an additional $20 million over and above the annual campaign total for the critical needs of Israeli residents who are on the firing line.

Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 - chaired by Ariella Rohringer and Fred Waks – became this year's campaign replacing the one that had been planned before Hezbollah kidnapped two Israeli soldiers and the war began.

Last week at an emergency meeting held before the Stand With Israel community rally, UJA Federation's leading donors pledged $6 million to kick start the Israel Emergency Campaign. The rally attracted 8,000 Jewish and non-Jewish Israel supporters and many dignitaries including Vaughan Mayor Michael DiBiase and Councillor David Shiner.

"It was an unbelievable experience sitting in a room with our top philanthropic families, and listening to their passion not only for Israel but for the Jewish cause," says UJA Federation chair, David Engel. "Their understanding of the issues and the dangers and their commitment to Am Israel make me proud to be a part of this community."

Campaign contributions will fund both short term and long term needs of devastated Israeli residents mostly in the north but in some southern communities as well.

Short term needs include moving children to safer areas of the country, temporary shelter for stricken Israeli residents, trauma counselling, food and medical supplies.

Among the longer term requirements are jobs for the newly unemployed, rebuilding businesses and physical reconstruction of devastated towns.

"As we all know, life can change on a dime, and so it has again for Israel," says Rohringer. "Literally overnight, the entire northern region became a war zone, under constant terrorist rocket attack. Over one million Israeli citizens, many living in northern communities with whom we have a special relationship, are on the firing line each and every day. Not since 1948 have the people of Israel suffered this type of attack on such a widespread scale. Israel deserves our steadfast support."

"Our community leaders were unanimous in their feeling that a campaign of this magnitude is not only possible, but mandatory as well," says Waks. "Israel merits all our energy in its time of crisis. The world as we know it is on the shoulders of Israel and it's incumbent that the Jews of the Diaspora turn all their energy towards Israel, for everything we hold dear is in the hands of the IDF."

"It seems in every generation, Jewish leaders need to step up to the plate and be counted when it counts the most," says UJA Federation president Ted Sokolsky. "Unfortunately, this is a generation that has been tested so often in the last 15 years when it comes to standing tall for Israel. I have every confidence, that once again, this will be a generation that answers the call, that stands up and proudly proclaims their support of our homeland and of the right of free people to live in peace everywhere in the world. This is a community that never steps back from its responsibilities; that chooses to lead rather than follow; that chooses to stand as one with Israel at every turn in its history."

Rebecca Malka, 51, a native of Montreal, has been living in Israel since 1997 with her husband Sami, 53. She currently lives in the northern city of Nahariya, located just 25 km north of Haifa and only 10 kms from the Lebanese border, which has been victimized by Katyusha rocket attacks. A mother of two, and grandmother of three, Rebecca has been keeping a daily journal of life in the beleaguered city which she shares with her family on an ongoing basis. This is what life was like for Rebecca and her family on Thursday, July 13, the first full day of the Hezbollah terror attacks.

Thursday, July 13, 7:10 a.m. –

It's clear that nobody is going to nursery school or summer camp today! It's 7:10 a.m. and we just heard a deafening explosion so strong that stores shake and car alarms are triggered. Fear. Pure Fear! The sirens are wailing away. You can differentiate between the ambulances, police and fire brigade sirens as each has its own distinct wail. A Katyusha has hit the main intersection of Nahariya. This is normally where kids play on swings and slides. It's lined with shady trees and home to the Holocaust Memorial, ironically, less than a hundred meters from the Nahariya Police Station. We are instructed to run to bomb shelters and take cover. At 11:00 a.m. we are told to return to the bunkers again. We go home instead. Later that evening, at 7:25 pm, five minutes before curfew, we hear loud, earthshaking, deafening booms, much worse than this morning. We see a great ball of fire spewing thick black smoke near our store. We know this was a serious hit. There is panic and screaming. The phone rings. My husband Sami answers. My daughter Ettie is hysterical. Her building has been hit. She wants us to drive there immediately. We have to take a different road since the explosion has blown up an electrical generator causing a power outage. Her husband Tzachi shows us the shrapnel which has shattered his bedroom shutters, screen and window, sending broken glass throughout the room, and embedding in the wall. And, remember, these are cement walls! The baby is crying, Chai, my three-and-a-half year old grandson is petrified and Ettie is shaking uncontrollably.

Ettie is now in the mamad (bunker room) with the kids on the floor. For the next two hours we try to get in touch with the police – to no avail. We try security, City Hall, no answer. Ettie and Tzachi decide to get a hotel room in Tel Aviv far from the terror

The next day a Katyusha hits the Haifa train depot garage. This is the shape of things to come. The same episodes over and over with different names and locations. Helicopters. Fighter jets. Boom Bam! You begin to let the sirens tell you which part of the city has been hit most recently by Katyushas. The whole north is now in danger. Everything is closed. It's becoming a ghost town. I have a pain in my left ear from the first deafening explosion at 7:10 a.m. this morning and my heart is still racing....

Canada's position being noted in world capitals

Rae urged the government to "make the case for UN peacekeepers on the border between Lebanon and Israel, accompanied by a firm timetable for a ceasefire and disengagement." He called Hezbollah and Hamas, aided by Iran and Syria, the biggest obstacles to peace.

Ken Dryden called on the government "to aid and support the efforts of the United Nations to bring stability to the region." He urged the government to work with the G8 countries and other partners to help stabilize the region and provide humanitarian relief. He supported Israel's right to defend itself but added Israel was expected to "make every effort to spare civilian lives and infrastructure."

Peace would only come when Israel's right to exist was recognized by all her neighbours and when Iran and Syria ended their support for Hamas and Hezbollah's violence, he added.

In his statements to The CJN, Harper said, "I don't think the Liberal Party has a coherent position on this."

He said Canada should not treat a democratic state like Israel the same as terrorist organizations such as Hezbollah and Hamas. (Hamas instigated the current crisis when it seized soldier Gilad Shalit on the Israeli side of the border with Gaza.)

It is unreasonable to engage in dialogue with Hamas and Hezbollah as if they were democratic states. "Hamas and Hezbollah resort to violence not as a tactic, but as a matter of principle," Harper said.

Asked if he stood by his comments that Israel's response to the Hezbollah attack was "measured," the prime minister said that statement was made early in the crisis, which has turned into "a full-blown conflict." Speaking before the attack on Qana, in which at least 54 civilians were killed, he said Israel has the right to respond to Hezbollah attacks and defend itself.

Harper said he had spoken with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on three occasions since the crisis began. Twice Olmert called to apologize and express regret over the killing of Canadians in southern Lebanon. Harper believes Olmert wants a peaceful resolution of the conflict with the Palestinians, with Israel living side by side with a peaceful Palestinian state. However, he added, "that's not the goal of Hamas and Hezbollah."

Opinion polls released over the weekend suggest the Conservative Party has lost political support in Quebec, British Columbia and Atlantic Canada, likely as a result of Harper's position on the Middle East. His personal approval rating stood at 60 per cent, however, substantially higher than the party's 39 per cent level.

Harper said the government's position on the Middle East was "principled and in the best interests of this country. We're not concerned with opinion polls. We take what we feel is the right position."

Israeli ambassador Alan Baker suggested the government's position on the conflict was "consistent with Canada's function as a serious country fighting terrorism in Afghanistan and standing with a state fighting terrorism.

"Canada's position is consistent with the position of the international community, which has been repeatedly calling for the dismantling and disarming of Hezbollah in south Lebanon. [It is] completely consistent with Canada's values of supporting the right of a sovereign state to act in self-defence against a terrorist organization that is part of the world Islamic jihadist attempt to destroy the state of Israel."

Graham's position, Baker continued, "is a continuation of the non-committal and un-useful position that was held by the previous Canadian government, which neither helped advance peace or prevented terrorism."

Canada's position is being noted in world capitals, the ambassador stated, adding the government is remaining firm despite criticism from former Canadian diplomats who argue "Canada take a balanced approach, which basically means sit on the bench and allow terrorists to bomb Israel."

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee, the Jewish community's lobbying arm on Israel, said, "We are enormously appreciative of the support that the government has extended to Israel."

Canada has played an important role in international diplomatic fora, he said, noting that "Harper and Canada were critical and central to the crafting of the resolution" at the recent G8 meetings in Russia.

The invitation of Foreign Minister Peter McKay to diplomatic discussions in Rome is a significant development, he added.

Harper's response to Hezbollah's unprovoked aggression displayed "clarity" and contributed to the international debate about the crisis, Fogel continued.

Harper "is a very unequivocal kind of guy. He takes a position and he articulates it clearly and moves forward. You may or may not like it, but you know where he stands. The Liberals tend to foster, by design, a certain degree of what they call constructive ambiguity, a reluctance to be pinned down on a specific position."

That gives them flexibility and credibility with stakeholders, but Harper believes "there is a right and a wrong and he wants Canada on the right," Fogel said.

Fogel suggested Harper's position may help the Conservative Party peel away Jewish votes in an upcoming election.

Among the broader population, Fogel said Harper's stand reflects on his leadership abilities. "He is seen as a leader, not flip-flopping, vacillating or sitting in the corner."

David Bercuson, director of the Centre for Military and Strategic Studies at the University of Calgary, said Canada's position as articulated by Harper marks a qualitative shift from the Liberal perspective, which held that Canada's influence would be enhanced by calibrating positions of "quasi-neutrality or balance," even on the great strategic issues of the day.

"This government looks at the world from a very different perspective. It sees Canada involved in this developing global conflict between jihad and the western industrialized liberal societies... so the enemy killing our soldiers in Afghanistan is the same rocketing Israel with Katyushas."

Bercuson suggested a political calculation was part of the equation when Harper set out Canada's policy, but was likely not the determinative factor.

Canadian Jews in Toronto and Montreal, he said, historically "treat the Conservatives badly." Had the Liberals formed the government, they likely would have taken Graham's approach. Canadian Jews for whom Israel is important "ought to think twice" when they next vote, he added.

Aurel Braun, professor of political science at the University of Toronto, said Harper has clearly put Canada behind a fellow democracy facing international terrorism. "It is a stand on principle," he said, and "the best kind of political consideration is behind it. You're looking out for the best interests of the country."

Braun said Graham is misrepresenting the traditional Liberal approach to foreign policy, which under Pearson did not seek to remain strictly neutral between parties for fear of losing his ability to mediate.

Braun said Graham seems to be seeking "some mythical middle ground between terrorism and the fight against terrorism.

"The Jewish community does not need to be tied to one party or another," he continued. "Citizens of Canada, Jews included, may move away [from the Liberals] towards those willing to act on principle."

Canadian Friends of Haifa University

At this time of crisis in the Middle East, Canadian Friends of Haifa University stands with the community in solidarity with the State of Israel and its citizens.

Our thoughts and prayers are also with our friends and colleagues at the University of Haifa, who have been particularly hard-hit by the constant bombardment.

Even though the University of Haifa had to close its doors, and many of its students have been drafted to the army, the University continues to fulfill its social mission in the broader community. The Interdisciplinary Psychological Treatment Centre at the University of Haifa, headed by Dr. Rivka Yahav, wife of Mayor Yona Yahav, has opened a 24-hour 'Hot Line' staffed by a volunteer team of psychologists, social workers and art therapy specialists from the University community. All local residents of Haifa, as well as members of Israeli society at large in need of counselling or assistance, may call in.

We pray that the hostilities will end soon and that an atmosphere of peaceful co-existence, tolerance and mutual respect will prevail in the region.

Reach out and touch Israel

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ

Loneliness is a curse. No one wants to be without a companion who worries about our welfare. We all have an existential need, to quote the old AT&T ad, to "reach out and touch someone."

I saw many examples of this lesson on a recent trip to Israel, where I was part of a delegation sent by the Montreal Jewish community. In visits to hospitals, shelters and shivah houses, I saw over and over again eloquent testimony to the power of the hug and the handshake.

One image burned into my mind is that of a father hugging his two daughters. Right after our group drove into Haifa, the air raid siren went off. We ran out of the car and took cover behind a tree. A couple, along with their two young daughters, were already there. The two girls were crying and shaking with fear. I watched as their father gently took them in his arms and hugged them tightly. In the comfort of a loving embrace, the girls slowly calmed down. Remarkably, even in this moment of crisis, a simple hug had made all the difference.

Elsewhere, we saw how handshakes and good wishes can have an impact. According to the rabbinic tradition, a visit can improve a sick person's health. At the Rambam hospital in Haifa, we visited Moshe, a 90-year-old immigrant from Ukraine. Moshe was injured after a wall in his house collapsed on him during a Katyusha attack. Moshe has no family left in Israel and was quite delighted to have visitors from halfway across the world. As we left his room, he had a twinkle in his eye, transformed by a simple visit.

Comforting mourners, another rabbinic commandment that requires the personal touch, is a dual responsibility. First, we come to offer our support to the mourners. In addition, we come to honour the dead. In one of the more difficult moments during the trip, we visited the shivah for Yaniv Bar-On, a soldier killed on the first day of the conflict, and met with Yaniv's parents, Carleen and Erol Bar-On. (Carleen is a former Montrealer who made aliyah many years ago.)

We came to offer our condolences and to show our respect for Yaniv. We read a copy of Erol's moving eulogy, one that he wrote through tears, about a son who was sensitive and sweet, a true patriot with a passion for life. Yaniv was a mensch and a good person, a military hero who gave his life for the State of Israel.

Yaniv was part of Unit 7, a unit started by Holocaust survivors. The survivors who founded the unit, did so to ensure a better future for the Jewish people. Through their sacrifice, they transformed Jewish history forever. They have left us an Israel that is truly a living miracle.

Unfortunately, this miracle still requires sacrifices. This time, it was Yaniv who had to make the ultimate sacrifice. That is why we came to his shivah, to show respect for a hero who gave his life for the State of Israel.

While we had come to comfort others, we were also inspired by what we saw.

We met with an American immigrant living in Tiberias, who told us how the people of the city were greeting the Katyusha attacks with a mixture of determination and stubbornness. Indeed, this attitude was on display wherever we went. At a grocery store in Tiberias, the owner proudly exhibited a sign that said, "We are not afraid." When we chatted with the owner, an avuncular elderly man, he reminded us that Israel had endured all of this before and would continue to thrive and grow.

In the centre of Tiberias, we saw the mayor standing on a street corner handing out Israeli flags, which were immediately taken by all passersby before they continued on, proudly clutching their flags. We came to Tiberias to comfort; we left inspired.

Saturday night in Jerusalem, I stopped in a store. The saleslady told me her brother had just got an "Order 8," which means he has to report immediately. She was worried about him, and asked me if I too was worried by the situation, and perhaps planning to go home early. I told her on the contrary, I had come because of the attacks, to show my support for Israel. This response stunned her momentarily, and she then repeated a few times, "I am so touched."

I realized then what Israel needs most. Yes, Israel needs our financial help and political advocacy. But most importantly, Israelis need us to "reach out and touch someone." Nothing can replace the personal connection. We need to call, to write letters, and yes, we need to visit Israel, to let Israelis know how much we really care.

The predictable condemners

By ALAN M. DERSHOWITZ

Guest Voice

The Hezbollah and Hamas provocations against Israel once again demonstrate how terrorists exploit human rights and the media in their attacks on democracies.

By hiding behind their own civilians, the Islamic radicals issue a challenge to democracies: either violate your own morality by coming after us and inevitably killing some innocent civilians, or maintain your morality and leave us with a free hand to target your innocent civilians.

This challenge presents democracies such as Israel with a lose-lose option, and the terrorists with a win-win option.

There is one variable that could change this dynamic and present democracies with a viable option that could make terrorism less attractive as a tactic: the international community, the anti-Israel segment of the media and the so-called "human rights" organizations could stop falling for this terrorist gambit and acknowledge that they are being used to promote the terrorist agenda.

Whenever a democracy is presented with the lose-lose option and chooses to defend its citizens by going after the terrorists who are hiding among civilians, this trio of predictable condemners can be counted on by the terrorists to accuse the democracy of "overreaction," "disproportionality" and "violations of human rights."

In doing this, they play right into the hands of the terrorists, causing more terrorism and more civilian casualties on both sides. If instead this trio could, for once, be counted on to blame the terrorists for the civilian deaths on both sides, this tactic would no longer be a win-win situation for the terrorists.

It should be obvious by now that Hezbollah and Hamas actually want the Israeli military to kill as many Lebanese and Palestinian civilians as possible. That is why they store their rockets underneath the beds of civilians; why they launch their missiles from crowded civilian neighbourhoods and hide among civilians. They are seeking to induce Israel to defend its civilians by going after them among their own civilian "shields." They know that every civilian they induce Israel to kill hurts Israel in the media and the international and human rights communities.

They regard these human shields as shahids – martyrs – even if they did not volunteer for this lethal job. Under the law, criminals who use human shields are responsible for the deaths of the shields, even if the bullet that kills them came from the gun of a policeman.

Israel has every self-interest in minimizing civilian casualties, whereas the terrorists have every self-interest in maximizing them – on both sides. Israel should not be condemned for doing what every democracy would and should do: taking every reasonable military step to stop the terrorists from killing their innocent civilians.

Now that some of those who are launching rockets at Israeli cities have announced that they have new surprises in store for Israel that may include chemical and biological weapons, the stakes have gotten even higher.

What would Israeli critics regard as "proportioned" to a chemical or biological attack? What would they say if Israel tried to pre-empt such an attack and, in the process, killed some civilians? Must a democracy absorb a first strike from a weapon of mass destruction before it fights back? Would any other democracy be expected to do that?

The world must come to recognize the cynical way in which terrorists exploit civilian casualties, They launch anti-personnel rockets designed to maximize enemy civilian casualties, then they cry "human rights" when their own civilians – behind whom they are deliberately hiding – are killed by the democracies who are trying to prevent further acts of terrorism.

The very idea that terrorists who use women and children as suicide bombers against other women and children, and shed crocodile tears over the deaths of civilians they deliberately put in harm's way, gives new meaning to the word "hypocrisy." We all know that hypocrisy is a tactic of the terrorists, but it is shocking that others fall for it and become complicit with the terrorists.

Let the blame fall where it belongs: on the terrorists who deliberately seek to kill enemy civilians and give their democratic enemies little choice but to kill some civilians behind whom the terrorists are hiding.

Those who condemn Israel for killing civilians being used as human shields and swords for the terrorists actually cause more civilian deaths and make it harder for Israel to withdraw from the West Bank.

How the world reacts to Israel's current military efforts to protect its citizens will have a considerable impact on future Israeli steps toward peace. Prior to the recent kidnappings and rocket attacks, the Israeli government had announced its intention to engage in further withdrawals from large portions of the West Bank.

But how can Israel be expected to move forward with any plan for withdrawal if all it can expect in return is more terrorism what the terrorists regard as "land for rocket launchings" – and more condemnation when it seeks to protect its civilians?

A prayer for the soldiers of Israel

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Through A Sephardi Window

This again is a time of crisis, a time when we find ourselves searching the media for any update or morsel of news.

Whether tuning in electronically or turning the printed pages, one is immediately inundated with all forms of analysis and editorials. These will invariably range from the frank to the frustrating, the well-informed and the blatantly anti-Israel.

In this space, rather than placing my own thoughts as a (needless) addition to all of the other endless ones, I ask you instead to read the following. Only I do implore you not just to read these words, but to pray them.

You see, to "hope for the best," is not a sufficient solution. In fact, it is not really a solution at all. While each of us has our own particular means and ways to respond and support, and we should certainly vigorously continue to pursue every single one of these venues, all of us can offer our prayers to God.

Prayer, especially at a time of crisis is essential. Said with a pure heart and in unison as a people, as brothers and sisters, it has a tremendous and dynamic energy; its effect is guaranteed. Already, in all synagogues and yeshivot worldwide, the regular services are concluding with a special recital of tehillim. Some have been incorporating the Avinu Malkeinu of the High Holy Day season as well.

We can all turn to God as one on this.

The following is a translation of the traditional prayer for the welfare of the Israeli soldier as set forth by the office of the Chief Rabbinate of Israel. Although it appears in the prayer books, with the suggestion that it be said with the Ark open while taking out the Torah, it can really be said anywhere and any time:

"He, who bestowed his blessing on our forefathers Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, may He too now bestow His blessing upon the Israeli Defence Forces who stand guard over our land and the mountains of God. From Lebanon and onto the Sinai, from the Mediterranean and onto the plains, indeed anyplace where they may be found, be it on land, sky or sea. Please God, hand over the enemy that has risen upon us and smite them.

"May the Holy One, blessed be He, guard and save our soldiers from all harm and pain, from any form of accident or sickness. May He send His blessing of success to all of their efforts. May He subjugate their enemies beneath them and crown them with the crown of salvation and victory. And fulfil and realize through them the verse, 'For it is the Lord your God who shall go out along with you, to wage for you the battles against your enemies, to spare you.' And let us say amen."

Al Gore warms to a serious subject

An Inconvenient Truth: The Planetary Emergency of Global Warming and What We Can Do About It* by Al Gore, published by Rodale (paperback).

Books
Bernard Baskin

Here's the ominous forecast of almost all of the world's scientists who have studied the matter: if human beings continue to exploit fossil fuel resources without reducing carbon emissions or capturing and sequestering them before they warm the atmosphere, the eventual effects on climate and life may be comparable to those at the time of mass extinctions.

Yes, life will survive, but it will do so on a transformed planet. For all foreseeable human generations, it will be a far more desolate world than the one in which civilization developed and flourished during the past several thousand years.

Former U.S. vice-president Al Gore's impressive, scrupulously researched book (which compliments the similarly titled and engrossing documentary film) is replete with essential graphs, maps, statistics and stunning colour photographs and illustrations. When sunlight enters the atmosphere, it warms the Earth and is then sent back into space as heat radiation. Greenhouse gases trap this heat in the atmosphere and thereby warm the Earth's surface. Carbon dioxide – produced mainly by burning fossil fuels, such as oil and coal – is the most important greenhouse gas made by human beings. Methane – "natural gas" that escapes into the atmosphere from coal mines, oil wells, rice paddies, landfills and animal feedlots – is also an important greenhouse gas.

Actually, no one knows how resilient our biosphere is or how much damage it can absorb before it stops functioning – or at least functioning well enough to keep the human species alive. There is not one life-support system on which the biosphere depends for its existence – healthy air, water, soil, temperature, and the like – that isn't severely threatened. The world economy has grown by more than six times in the last 50 years and is continuing to use up the world's resources at a dizzying pace, creating unabating pollution and waste, and increasing the enormous inequalities within and between nations.

There are now more than half a billion cars on this planet. Can it accommodate this number? Not only do they create a greenhouse effect, but they're also a source of local air pollution, congestion and noise. Some people have suggested we should change the name of our planet to Polluto.

The rapid melting of the polar ice cap and parts of Greenland has increased more then 50 per cent in the past 25 years. If half of Greenland and half of Antarctica melted or broke up and slipped into the sea, sea levels worldwide would increase by between 18 to 20 feet. Many parts of the globe would be submerged under water and the maps of the world would have to be redrawn.

In addition to rising sea levels, global warming creates severe changes in temperature, as well as floods, drought and hurricanes.

The 1997 Kyoto Protocol to cut global greenhouse emissions has been ratified by 132 nations. Among developed nations, only the United States and Australia have refused to sign. The United States produces about 25 per cent of the gases associated with global warming (Canada produces about 2.3 per cent), and its refusal to meet goals set by Kyoto to reduce those emissions makes it difficult for other countries, including Canada, to stick to their goals.

Unfortunately, our spaceship Earth didn't come with an instruction guide. And major obstacles must be overcome: inertia, greed and resistance to change by worldwide and interrelated industrial, economic and political establishments that are all beholden to fossil fuels. What can the concerned individual do? Gore offers a variety of suggestions: conserve energy at home; switch to sources of energy provided by wind, sun and the heat of the Earth; reduce emissions from cars and other forms of transportation; and take political action.

An Inconvenient Truth is a coherent and forceful account of an urgent and complex problem by an alarmed former vice president of the United States. The problems it highlights must be confronted and overcome before universal disaster befalls us.

Tehillim/Psalms – Part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

From the depths I called You, HaShem
O Lord, hear my voice.
May your ears be attentive to the sound of my pleas. – Psalm 130

Whenever Jews have found themselves at a turning point in their lives, there is one Jewish book they have reached for to express their grief, thanks and joy: Tehillim, the Book of Psalms.

In the 150 chapters of Tehillim you can find references to all the emotions of the human condition. But right now, as Israelis cope with death and injury, Jews around the world are reciting psalms on their behalf. If you are familiar with Tehillim– and especially if you are not – you will find new insights waiting for you on the Internet.

There are many online versions available in both Hebrew and English. The Mechon Mamre site not only provides Hebrew and English but also has a link to an audio so that you can listen to each chapter being recited. [http://tinyurl.com/ggbec] If you have trouble displaying Hebrew fonts on your computer, you can read and print out the entire Hebrew text through a series of graphics. [www.midrash.org/tefilloth/tehil lim/] And the version at Tehillim Hotline lets you search for any word in Tehillim. [http://tinyurl.com/ovumq]

Should you decide to print out any part of Tehillim, please respect the sanctity of the material.

Although the beauty of Tehillim can be appreciated at face value, you can understand so much more with a commentary such as Rashi's which Chabad.org provides in its entirety in English. [http://tinyurl.com/hyj7p] (The link to the commentary may be a bit hard to find. Click on any chapter of Tehillim and near the top right of the page, you will see a link to Rashi's commentary.)

Many people turn to Tehillim when they face a serious challenge, and the range of poetry is so wide that different chapters are recommended for various occasions. Tehillim Online provides a list: [http://tinyurl.com/hrmt6]

- While travelling: "under his wings shall you find refuge; his truth shall be your shield…" (Psalm 91:4)
- Recovery from illness: "Have mercy upon me, O Lord; for I am weak; O Lord, heal me; for my bones shudder." (Psalm 6:3)
- Thanksgiving for a miracle: "He saved me from my strong enemy, and from those who hated me; for they were too strong for me." (Psalm 18:18)

There are many other recommendations including psalms for finding a shidduch and for healthy children.

What is the source of Tehillim's power? Rabbi Y.D. Webster explains that what is critical is believing that everything that one has ultimately comes from God "and not from one's own power. Shirah [song] is the ultimate expression of a recognition that has so permeated the heart that it is aroused to give outward expression." [http://tinyurl.com/lm5b4] Rabbi Amy Scheinerman adds that "while the rest of the Tanach speaks of the experience of a nation in its covenant with God, the Psalms speak from the depths of individual souls searching for the Divine in their individual lives." [http://tinyurl.com/ocaov]

But how do you thank God while you are experiencing serious illness? Rabbi Nancy Flam turns to Psalm 150: "Praise God's mighty deeds; praise God according to God's abundant greatness." Rabbi Flam explains that she affirms and praises "God as the One who makes miracles every day, according to the laws of the physical universe and the human spirit… Praise of God is not about me or my condition; it is about the reality of God." [http://tinyurl.com/mzpgk]

As Psalms are being recited privately, in women's groups and as part of synagogue prayer, you may want to download the material provided at the Artscroll website. You'll find a free excerpt from Artscroll's interlinear Tehillim in which each line in Hebrew is followed by an English translation. You can download five chapters (20, 83,121,130 and 142) that are traditionally recited at times of crisis. [http://tinyurl.com/pmtbe] As the material points out, the recitation of the Tehillim is usually concluded with this brief plea which has all too much resonance at the moment. "Our brothers, the entire House of Israel, who are found in distress and captivity, who are situated whether at sea or whether on land – may the Omnipresent One – have mercy on them and remove them from distress to relief, from darkness to light, from subjugation to redemption, now, speedily, and in a time that comes soon – and let us say: Amen."

Anti-Semitism and terrorism intimately linked, says speaker

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

Canada and the rest of the world are facing "an anti-Semitism-terrorism nexus" that is "without frontiers" and threatens humanity, said Shimon Samuels, director of international relations for the Simon Wiesenthal Center.

The 2001 UN World Conference against Racism in Durban, South Africa, was the origin of this new anti-Semitism, Samuels told the crowd at a June 29 town hall meeting presented by The CJN and the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center (SWC).

"This was a conference that brought together people in order to discuss racism. Racism was never discussed," he said.

At the final session of a preparatory committee for Durban, held in December 2001 in Geneva, Samuels learned of a 10-year plan proposed by some members of the committee that mimicked the program used to isolate apartheid South Africa in the 1960s, '70s and '80s.

This time, the object was "to apply all the same measures to the last bastion of apartheid, the State of Israel," he said.

The first step in the eight-point plan was an educational program portraying Israel throughout the world as an apartheid state. Next, a legal campaign would seek to have Israeli reservists vacationing outside Israel arrested and charged with crimes against humanity.

The third step would be lobbying for the repeal of Israel's Law of Return for Jews, to be followed by a fourth step, a law of return for Palestinian refugees.

"Number 5 was re-launching the Arab boycott, which had disappeared, and number 6 is what we are living today: the embargos," Samuels explained.

Promoting a "rupture of diplomatic relations" with Israel would be the next step. Finally, penalties would be imposed on countries and NGOs that refused to co-operate with these diplomatic efforts.

"The vectors were clearly marked out, even in 2001: to use the Internet, the universities, the NGOs, the churches and the trade unions," he said. "And this is now coming to fruition."

Although he was reluctant to describe any country in today's Europe as having an "officially anti-Semitic policy," Samuels stressed there is a feeling of vulnerability among the continent's Jews.

To force the French government to be proactive against anti-Semitism, the SWC issued a travel advisory stating, "Anyone who visits France who by God or by practice is identifiably Jewish should take extreme precautions."

Needless to say, "the government went ballistic," said Samuels. Ultimately, once France took firm measures to fight anti-Semitism, the SWC rescinded its travel advisory.

"But the problem was and still is filtration," said Samuels. "[French] teachers [who are] mandated by law to teach the Holocaust are intimidated by North African majorities in their classes and will not do so."

Anti-Semitic attacks continue to proliferate in France and elsewhere, said Samuels. He spoke of an 81-year-old Jewish woman who had recently left the intensive care unit of a major Paris hospital and got into a taxi to go home.

"She noticed that the [driver was a] woman wearing a headscarf, driving very fast. She protested to the [driver], 'I'm a Holocaust survivor. Please, I have a bad heart, slow down.' The [driver] smiled at her and said, 'I'm taking you to my son who will kill you, dirty Jew.'

"At a red light, she managed to get the door open and, [as she was] screaming, a young man pulled her out," Samuels said. "We verified that the story was true. That's part of our job, to see that these are not made up. These are true."

Shimon Samuels

Paraphrasing the late Simon Wiesenthal, he added: "What starts with the Jews is a barometric measure of society. It never ends with the Jews."

Speaking after Samuels at the town hall meeting, Leo Adler, national affairs director of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center, said Canada is now at risk.

"Canada is under siege. Terrorism has hit us. We didn't recognize it when it struck in 1985 with Air India," Adler said, referring to the bombing of a plane off the coast of Ireland.

"Over 300 Canadians died as a result of Canadian terrorists planting a bomb. We have to recognize that Canadians are capable of terrorism. Canada is not immune."

In his talk, Samuels, who was born in England after World War II, noted that the 30-mile width of the English Channel is what saved his family from the Holocaust.

"Today, thousands of miles of Atlantic waters are worthless. What happens in Canada is an integral part of the same struggle [in Europe]. We're part of an anti-Semitism-terrorism nexus. We have to face it together. It is without frontiers."

This nexus is powerful, Samuels said, because it uses the Internet for hatemongering.

"Simon Wiesenthal said that the Holocaust was the meeting point of ideology and technology, and it is the technology that today provides the common ground," he said.

Samuels added that the SWC tries to work with other groups to fight hatred. "The Internet is an area of common ground because it's not just Jews who are scapegoated: Muslims, Christians, women, homosexuals – you'll find them all [targeted] on the Internet.

"So what starts with the Jews doesn't end with the Jews, but endows us with a responsibility: to act as an early warning system to sensitize the ears of our neighbours to the sounds of impending danger."

He said the danger now taking shape in the form of Iran is not just a threat to Israel and to Jews. Among Persian Gulf states, "there is grave concern that a country that has earthquakes annually at seven on the Richter scale, where their nuclear installations are supervised by Russian management – those who brought us Chernobyl… that any [earthquake] under nuclear installations could destroy marine life in the Gulf for centuries," Samuels said.

"There is not a happiness in the Arab world with Iran. I think that this, again, gives us an area of common ground."

גידי קורן וחברים

" היה בוקר עמוס במרפאה המקומית. בשעה 8:30 נכנס למרפאה איש יקן בשנות השמונים לחייו ואמר שהוא ממהר מאוד כי יש לו פגישה חשובה בשעה 9:00 בבוקר, וביקש שיציאו את התפרים מבוהן ידו. ראיתי שהזקן מסתכל כל הזמן בשעונו והחלטתי לטפל בו. הוצאתי את תפריו וחבשתי לו מחדש את הפצע. תוך כדי טיפול שאלתי אותו לאן הוא ממהר, והוא אמר: "אני חייב לבקר את אשתי במחלקה סיעודית ולאכול איתה ארוחת בוקר". שאלתי את האיש מה מחלת אשתו והוא ענה שהיא מאושפזת כבר שנים עם מחלת אלצהיימר. בתום הטיפול שאלתי אותו אם אשתו תדאג אם הוא יאחר קצת, והוא ענה שכבר חמש שנים היא אינה יודעת מה קורה ואינה מזהה איש, גם לא אותו. התפלאתי מאוד ושאלתי אותו: ואתה הולך כל בוקר למרות שאינה יודעת מי אתה? האיש חייך, הניח ידו על ידי ואמר:

Canada will face same threats as Israel, speaker says

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

This country's lax immigration system is inviting terrorist organizations to flourish here, and with 50 such groups already on our soil, "what Israel is living is assuredly coming to Canada," David Harris told the Ze'ev Jabotinsky memorial last week.

Nearly 400 people gathered at the Sephardic Kehilah Centre in Thornhill to honour the 66th yahrzeit of Jabotinsky – a right-wing Zionist leader, politician, soldier and poet – and to hear Harris, the director of the Terrorist Intelligence Program INSIGNIS Strategic Research Inc., and the senior fellow for national security at the Canadian Coalition for Democracies, deliver a lecture titled "Confronting Terrorism at our Doorstep."

While foreign and homegrown terrorism are two imminent major threats, Canada has "been inviting disaster for years," Harris said.

"Take just one aspect of this foreign element. We maintain immigration and refugee numbers... without any regard for our economic well-being," he said, adding that he recognizes that immigrants have built and strengthened Canada and will continue to do so.

"But at a time when extremist Islam is inborn within Canada and the liberal pluralist world, we continue to bring in 230,000 immigrants a year, the highest per capita rate in the world."

While this trend benefits parts of Canada's economy and culture, "it opens dangerous possibilities for the rest of us," he said.

"I can't see how Canada can credibly screen this many newcomers – one million people every four years – and 60 per cent are landing in this very city. We only have at most a few thousand security officers doing the screening, and what, for example, do assurances about screening mean when somebody comes from say, Iran, creator of Islamic extremism's bloodthirsty, unwontedly Jew- and West-hating monster Hezbollah?"

He noted that recently, Iranian-born Canadian photographer Zahra Kazemi was beaten to death by an Iranian official who was never charged.

"I think the only consequence to the assailant was a place on the Iranian delegation to the United Nations," he said.

"So how meaningful is it when western security immigration services conclude that a perspective Iranian immigrant or refugee is of no concern because that person's country of origin reports no criminal record back home?"

Harris said this is one of the factors that has turned Canada into the terrorist haven it is today.

"This reveals... why, CSIS says, we have about 50 terrorist organizations on our soil and why we, therefore, are the second-most terrorist-entering country in the world after the United States."

Harris said political correctness has complicated the situation in Canada.

"Unfortunately today, what is sometimes called political correctness has been used to confirm a kind of untouchability on those who [promote] doctrines no less egregious than those associated with white supremacism."

That's why Harris sees the Canadian public as the third major terrorist threat. Canadians pride themselves on openness and pluralism, yet he said they're naive about the dangers associated with being too tolerant and trusting.

"For proof, test your own performance. How often have you... dared [ask] yourself, what sort of bar exists to prevent radical Islamists from being employed in our military, police, defence, and foreign affairs?"

He said that at the rate Canada is going, extremists will soon be at the controls of our nuclear power plants, airliners and emergency services.

"As Israel, our sister democracy, entered its most recent fight for its life, there have been unembarrassed gatherings in this country by Hezbollah sympathizers," Harris said.

"We see explicit displays of support for Canada's Hezbollah enemy before the Israeli consulate here in Toronto, and all of this despite the fact that under the Criminal Code of Canada, Parliament has banned Hezbollah and Hamas [as terrorist organizations]."

Harris concluded his lecture by saying that even non-Jews, such as himself, should be concerned by Canada's "troubling" security situation.

"[As] a war is imposed upon us by Islamic fascism and Islamic terrorism, we are all Israelis now. We are all Jews now," he said.

Before Harris took to the podium, Rose Lax, chair of Betar-Tagar and Likud Canada, presented four awards for campus activism to students Josh Rosenblum, David Levine and Jason Portnoy, and to former teacher Shirley Anne Haber, who heads the Speakers Action Group.

Israel's consul general in Toronto, Ya'acov Brosh, also debriefed the crowd about the situation in Israel, and he outlined Israel's objectives in its current conflict with Hezbollah.

"The first [objective] is to release the kidnapped soldiers and the second one is the removal of the threat of missiles attacking Israeli citizens," Brosh said.

"Israel doesn't seek war and certainly, not this war. Israel has proven in the past again and again that we take risks for peace. It is now our objective and in our best interest to see our neighbours thriving and strong," he added.

"However, the government of Israel has its primary objective, as every government has, of protecting its citizens to ensure their safety," he said, adding his gratitude to the Canadian government for supporting Israel at this critical time.

Shul hosts panel on Darfur

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — With the world focused on Israel's war with Hamas and Hezbollah, other crises have slipped from the headlines.

None are more serious than the government-supported genocide against black African Muslims in the western Sudanese province of Darfur, where up to 400,000 people have died and another 2.5 million have been forced to flee to refugee camps in neighbouring Chad.

On July 23, Winnipeg's Congregation Etz Chayim hosted a panel on Darfur, the third time in the last two years that it has hosted such a program. The latest event was organized by soon-to-be rabbinical student Matthew Gindin, who took part in a similar awareness-raising program in Boston this past spring organized in part by his teacher, former Winnipegger Or Rose.

"It is imperative that the international community pursue a number of activities to let those responsible know that we are watching, caring, and are acting," said Gindin, the moderator for the evening.

Panel members included Etz Chayim's Rabbi Henry Balser; Christian Butera, a survivor of the 1994 genocide in Rwanda; Akim Kambamba, a refugee from southern Sudan; and Michael Muyen, identified as one of the "lost boys of Sudan".

Muyen, one of 600 orphaned Sudanese boys from south Sudan who were brought to Canada in 1998, provided a brief overview of the fighting that convulsed Sudan almost continuously from independence in 1955 until a peace deal was signed a few years ago. That conflict was between the Arab/Muslim dominated government in the capital Khartoum in the north and black African Christians and animists in the south.

Muyen described how, after his parents were murdered, he escaped to the bush with other orphaned boys and eventually made his way to a refugee camp in neighbouring Ethiopia. In 1991, after four years in Ethiopia, the refugees were forced to flee again when Ethiopia's military dictator was overthrown and victorious rebels wanted to send the refugees back to Sudan. He found refuge in Kenya before coming to Canada.

"Sixty years ago, people vowed that they would never allow genocide to happen again," Muyen said. "But genocide is still taking place."

Kambamba, who came to Canada 20 years ago after escaping from a Sudanese prison, noted that while there are several thousand African Union forces assigned to protect the Darfur refugees, they are poorly equipped and too few in number to adequately patrol Darfur, which is about the size of France.

"We are still waiting for the United Nations to take action," he said.

In response to a question from the audience, Kambamba noted that China, India and Russia all have interests in Sudan and oppose outside intervention.

Butera, who was 11 in 1994 when an estimated one million ethnic Tutsis were murdered by Hutu extremists, noted that there has been "a greater public response to what is happening in Darfur."

Rabbi Balser observed that Jewish law commands Jews to take action and not stand idly by when a neighbour is in trouble. "We have the power of our voices," he said. "Governments take action when they hear our voices."

Gindin urged the audience to write to MPs, newspapers and the government of Sudan, as well as to join groups working for Darfur and to donate money to help refugees.

Winnipeg's only kosher butcher loses its hechsher

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Vaad Ha'ir of Winnipeg's move last month to pull its certification from Winnipeg's only kosher butcher has left the city without a supply of fresh kosher meat.

Both Omnitsky Kosher Foods and the Vaad are talking optimistically about resolving the situation, but in the meantime, observant members of the community have been scrambling to find alternative sources of fresh meat, largely from suppliers in Montreal and Toronto.

It's the second recent blow to kosher consumers, coming on the heels of an announcement that the Bathurst Street Market, Winnipeg's only all-kosher grocery store and deli restaurant, would close at the end of July due to poor sales.

As well, even if a deal is reached to allow Omnitsky to resume selling kosher meat, supplies would have to come from outside the province, as the Vaad says there will be no more kosher shchitah performed locally. No reason for that decision was given, but the two shochets who slaughter all of Winnipeg's kosher meat are in their 80s, and one is in poor health.

The showdown between the Vaad and Omnitsky had been building for a few years. The butcher shop has been in business in north Winnipeg since 1922. Sasha (Sam) Gehkt, who immigrated here from Russia several years ago, bought the business in 2000.

It has always been the practice at the store to kasher meat on request, but not as a matter of course. All the meat in the shop had been slaughtered by Vaad shochets, and the shop would complete the kashering process by salting and de-veining the meat. But for the past few years, the Vaad had been urging the Omnistsky, without success, to kasher all of its fresh meat.

Vaad president Don Aronovitch said the Vaad most recently sent Omnitsky a letter to that effect in May, but received no response from Gehkt.

"It wasn't until we took action and removed our certification on July 14 that Mr. Gekht responded," Aronovitch says.

When contacted by The CJN, Gekht said he wouldn't comment while talks are underway to resolve the dispute, and as of press time last week, no deal had been reached.

The Winnipeg Vaad has been trying for the past 10 years to raise the standard of its WK hechsher to a level that would make it acceptable again nationally and internationally.

The WK's problems go back to the mid-1980s. It had been the tradition that the Vaad Harabbanim, the rabbinical arm of the Vaad Ha'ir that supervises kashrut, was made up of three Orthodox rabbis. In the mid-1980s, a split developed in the community over the creation of a Winnipeg eruv, with two teaching rabbis in favour of creating the boundary and two congregational rabbis opposed. When the eruv was created over their objections, the congregational rabbis declared their colleagues to be in violation of Shabbat and hence not to be followed in matters of Jewish law. When one of the teaching rabbis was elected to the Vaad Harabbanim, the congregational rabbis declared that the WK was no longer a valid hechsher.

The WK's problems were compounded in later years when the Vaad could no longer muster three Orthodox rabbis to monitor kashrut. One Orthodox rabbi remained as Winnipeg's only kosher supervisor, but he led a congregation that voted to adopt mixed seating, leaving his Orthodox credentials in question for some people.

In 1996, the predecessor of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg commissioned Justice Roy Matas to prepare a report on the problems of kashrut in the community and recommend steps to remedy the situation.

When Aronovitch, a community leader, assumed the Vaad's presidency in 2000, he set out to raise the standard of kashrut in Winnipeg to one that would be universally recognized.

Under his leadership, the Vaad created a new heschsher, MBK, which was meant to gradually replace the WK and which enjoyed the support of all Orthodox rabbis in the city. However, one of the community's key licensees balked at the new kashrut conditions, and the MBK only became the hechsher at one hotel and a limited number of shuls.

Aronovitch and the Vaad then decided to work on strengthening WK. Last February, the Vaad hired a new rabbi, Mitchell Cohen from Ottawa, as a consultant to oversee kashrut in the city. Rabbi Cohen started the position full time on Aug. 1 and has moved to the city.

"We are working aggressively to discharge what we feel is a huge responsibility to ensure that the Winnipeg Jewish consumer has a source of fresh kosher meat," Aronovitch said of the current situation. "We anticipate this issue being resolved within a few weeks and we are confident that there will not be a material impact on the Jewish community, its synagogues or its other institutions.

Aronovitch added that "we can assure that politics and monetary reasons played no role whatsoever" in the dispute with Omnitsky.

"Another concern voiced was that this action was the result of 'Orthodox pressures.' Nothing could be further from the truth," he said. "The Vaad Ha'ir's historic transition of its kashrut standard from traditional to COR-equivalent has the 100 per cent support of all synagogue leadership and their rabbis. The drive to effect the conversion for the past 10 years has been 100 per cent a federation initiative – definitely not that of the Orthodox community."

Focus on Lebanese death toll obscures Israelis' experience

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Since July 12, when Hezbollah attacked Israel, killing eight soldiers and kidnapping two, media coverage of the ensuing conflict has been as intense as the fighting itself. Although the non-stop barrage of reports in the Canadian electronic and print media make instant analysis difficult, a few key trends have emerged.

When Israel launched its first strikes on Hezbollah, the media almost uniformly viewed Israel's actions as justifiable self-defence. But once Israel bombed the Beirut airport and other Lebanese infrastructure in a bid to stop weapons from reaching Hezbollah, some media reports reflected the growing international criticism of Israel's military response. This became even more apparent as Lebanese civilian casualties rose and UN Secretary General Koffi Annan alleged that Israel was using "excessive force."

However, editorial support for Israel continued in the leading English-language Canadian dailies, including the Globe and Mail and Toronto Star, as well as the National Post and other CanWest papers. Several editorials did urge Israel to choose its targets carefully and to minimize innocent civilian casualties, but all major papers (with the exception of Francophone ones, especially La Presse), were sympathetic to Israel and highly critical of Hezbollah and its backers, Syria and Iran.

During the first week of fighting, Canadian media reported on the barrage of Hezbollah rockets falling on Israeli cities as far south as Haifa. But as the conflict continued, the focus shifted to the destruction of Hezbollah assets in Lebanon and the resulting humanitarian crisis, especially the attempts of thousands of Lebanese Canadians to flee the fighting. Reporters interviewed scores of Lebanese Canadians, many of whom criticized Israel's military response and the alleged failure of the Canadian government to provide for their fast and efficient evacuation.

While media outlets maintained officially that "balanced" coverage was being achieved, in conversation, many journalists admitted that even though Israelis were suffering under Hezbollah's constant rocket attacks, the destruction and deaths have been greater in Lebanon, and this is where the media have been focusing more of their attention. This is not to minimize, however, the reporting from Israel that journalists such as Laurie Graham and Adrienne Arsenault have done for CBC television, or the reports that Martin Himel has prepared for Global and Murray Oliver's work for CTV.

On CBC's The National (July 25), anchor Peter Mansbridge said: "If there's been a common thread through our coverage these past two weeks, it's been people trying to flee the violence." Clearly, this coverage focused more on the people of Lebanon than on the inhabitants of northern Israel, even though hundreds of thousands of Israelis have been forced to flee south or hold out in shelters.

Much of the television footage was predictable: scenes of death, injury, dislocation and devastation, all of which are staple items for the camera.

Analysis – why this conflict is happening – was left to print editorials and op-eds, along with the occasional television interview. But especially on TV, Israel's reality was too often not reflected in news coverage.

For instance, in Mansbridge's July 25 interview with Fawaz Gerges, a professor at Sarah Lawrence College and the author of Journey of the Jihadist: Inside Muslim Militancy, Gerges admitted that "many Lebanese were critical of what Hezbollah did," but he immediately added: "They argued that the timing was wrong. They argued that Lebanon could not really confront mighty and powerful Israel."

Gerges' implication is that Lebanon has a just grievance against Israel, omitting the fact that Israel withdrew from Lebanon six years ago to an internationally recognized border, thus eliminating any grievance. In fact, it is Hezbollah – along with its backers, Iran and Syria – that is initiating and perpetuating the hostilities, seeking to destroy Israel.

Gerges also tried to distance Hezbollah from Iran. While acknowledging that Iran and Syria supply and support Hezbollah, he insisted that Hezbollah's leader, Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah, operates independently. But while Nasrallah may make some tactical decisions, he is in lockstep with Iran's leader Grand Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, to whom Nasrallah, by his own admission, is committed as his source of authority.

Gerges was both right and wrong when he reiterated Nasrallah's claim: "This is not our war, this is not Lebanon's war, this is umma's war, the Muslim community's worldwide war."

He was wrong to ignore the growing rift between Sunni and Shiite Muslims, but right in the sense that Nasrallah, like his Iranian backers, is indeed bent on worldwide domination, starting with the destruction of Israel and the slaughter of Jews. And that's the real story the media should pursue.

Class Environmental Assessment Study

Earl Bales Park Area Stormwater Management Plan

Notice of Study Completion

The City of Toronto has completed its Class Environmental Assessment (EA) study to identify a preferred method(s) for managing stormwater runoff in the Earl Bales Park drainage area. Opportunities for increasing stormwater source controls are limited because most of the catchment area already meets the City's enhanced targets, while conveyance controls were limited by the clay soils. The components of the preferred alternative include the construction of a large stormwater pond in the valley of Earl Bales Park to meet provincial water quality objectives for urban stormwater runoff, various ravine restoration measures, water substitution for golf course irrigation and snowmaking, and preservation of local terrestrial habitats.

The project was undertaken in accordance with the requirements for Schedule 'B' projects under the Municipal Class Environmental Assessment (June 2000). A Study Report has been prepared which describes the problem, the assessment of alternatives and the preferred alternative as well as the public consultation process and its results. This Notice places the report on public record for a 30-day review period. Subject to comments received as a result of this Notice, the City of Toronto intends to proceed with this project. The Study Report is available for review at the following locations:

If concerns arise regarding this project, which cannot be resolved in discussions with the City of Toronto, a person or party may request that the Minister of the Environment make an order for the project to comply with Part II of the Environmental Assessment Act (referred to as a Part II Order) which addresses individual environmental assessments. The Minister must receive requests for a Part II Order by August 28, 2006.

Please send requests to: The Honourable Laurel C. Broten, Minister of the Environment, 12th Floor, 135 St. Clair Avenue West, Toronto, Ontario, M4V 1P5, Tel: 416-314-6790, or Fax: 416-314-7337. A copy of the request for a Part II Order must also be sent to the City of Toronto at the address listed above. If there is no request for a Part II Order received by August 28, 2006, the City will proceed with the implementation of the preferred solution as presented in the Study Report.

Israel to suspend activity over Lebanon for 48 hours

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Israel agreed to a 48-hour suspension of aerial activity over southern Lebanon after it bombed the Lebanese village of Qana on Sunday and a number of children died, a U.S. official said.

The attack marred U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's weeklong mission to halt the fighting between Israel and Hezbollah.

The agreement to suspend the over-flights was announced by U.S. State Department spokesperson Adam Ereli. But he said Israel has reserved the right to hit targets if it learns that attacks are being prepared against them.

"The United States welcomes this decision and hopes that it will help relieve the suffering of the children and families of southern Lebanon," Ereli told reporters travelling with Rice.

The Israeli Prime Minister's Office confirmed the report.

Despite the ceasefire, there were reports that the Israeli Air Force carried out strikes Monday in southern Lebanon. The army said the strikes near the village of Taibe were meant to protect ground forces operating in the area and were not targeting anyone or anything specific.

Israel also said it would allow a 24-hour period where all residents of southern Lebanon who wanted to flee northward would be able to do so, in co-ordination with the United Nations.

A U.S. State Department official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Rice had been working on such an agreement for some time before the attack on Qana, Lebanon, last weekend.

Condoleezza Rice

Ereli said Israel will co-ordinate with the United Nations to allow a 24-hour period of safe passage for all residents of south Lebanon who want to leave the region.

"We expect that Israel will implement these decisions so as to significantly speed and improve the flow of humanitarian aid," he added.

Olmert expresses regret over deaths in Qana

By YAAKOV KATZ
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — In the deadliest attack since Israel started its offensive against Hezbollah on July 12, 57 civilians most of them children – were killed on Sunday in a building in the southern Lebanese village of Qana, apparently as a result of an Israeli Air Force missile strike.

While the entire Israeli political echelon expressed regret for the results of the strike, IAF Chief of Staff Brig.-Gen. Amir Eshel said Sunday night that the three-storey building had been struck by the missiles a little after midnight and that it only collapsed seven hours later, at nearly 7 a.m.

Eshel refrained from specifying what had caused the structure to collapse seven hours after it was hit, but senior IAF officers said Sunday night that the explosion could have been caused by an unexploded missile or by a Hezbollah-planted explosive device.

"It could be that there was something in the building that caused the explosion," Eshel said.

He said that nearly 150 Katyusha rockets had been fired from the Lebanese village over the past 20 days. Hezbollah had hidden rocket launchers in civilian buildings in the village, Eshel said. Video footage he presented at a press conference in Tel Aviv Sunday night showed rocket launchers being driven into the village following attacks on northern Israel.

The dead were old people, women and children from four families, whom residents said had gathered to spend the night on the ground floor, where they felt they were safe from Israeli attacks. The bodies of at least 27 children were found in the rubble, said Abu Shadi Jradi, a civil defence official at the scene.

In 1996, Israel was forced to suspend Operation Grapes of Wrath against Hezbollah after Israel Defence Forces artillery shells killed more than 100 civilians seeking refuge in a UN building in the village.

A high-ranking IAF officer said the IDF had warned Qana residents to evacuate the village in anticipation of air strikes on Katyusha launchers. The officer said the air force had been targeting the village for the past three days and that on Saturday night it struck 10 targets there. He said the building hit Sunday was chosen as a target after intelligence indicated that Hezbollah guerrillas were hiding inside, where Katyusha rockets and launchers were also hidden.

"We warned the residents that we would be attacking there," the high-ranking officer said. "We work under the assumption that the villages are empty and that whoever is there is affiliated with Hezbollah."

The IAF did attack targets in the village at 7 a.m. Sunday, Eshel said, but these buildings were 500 metres away from the building where the civilians were killed.

"I, along with Israel and the IDF, express deep regret at the death of civilians in Kfar Qana," said Olmert. "There is nothing further from our intent than when we hit civilians everyone understands that. When we do harm civilians, the whole world recognizes that it is an exceptional case that does not characterize us."

Olmert said the area was a focal point for the firing of Katyusha rockets at Kiryat Shmona and Afula. He said that from the outset of the current violence, "hundreds of rockets have been fired from the Qana area."

Defence Minister Amir Peretz also profoundly regretted the fatal strike, saying, "This is a tragic incident that is the result of a war against Hezbollah, which is operating from civilian areas and knows full well that by so doing it is endangering lives." The defence minister ordered the IDF to conduct a thorough investigation into the incident.

IDF Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Dan Halutz also expressed sorrow over the loss of innocent life. "We were operating in a place from where Katyushas are being fired and we distributed notices to residents. Unfortunately, people who assembled in the area, whom we were unaware of, were harmed," said Halutz.

Nevertheless, Halutz said, the IDF would continue to fight to protect northern Israel and to bring calm to the region. "The terrorist organizations are taking cover among populated areas," he said. "We will continue to fight, causing the minimum harm to civilians."

Seattle Jews in shock after shooting spree

By JOEL MAGALNICK
JTA

SEATTLE — The Harborview Trauma Center near downtown Seattle served as a de facto Shabbat gathering place last Friday evening as Jews from around the city met to console each other after an afternoon shooting at the Jewish Federation of Greater Seattle that left one person dead and five injured.

Meanwhile, representatives from the area's Jewish organizations scrambled to make sense of the shooting and determine next steps for keeping synagogues and service agencies operational and secure.

The Seattle area's two Conservative congregations cancelled services Friday night, but most other synagogues were determined to hold Shabbat services – though with added police presence.

"You can't let hatred stop holiness," Rabbi Jonathan Singer of the Reform Temple Beth Am told his congregation Friday night, according to the Seattle Times.

Jews from around the city expressed disbelief and sorrow.

"It was shocking," said David Sabban, a former federation employee. "I remember when we would do our safety discussions there was always this scenario, if this guy came in with a gun and started shooting people, what would you do? It just happened so suddenly, in an instant."

Streets around the Seattle federation's office were closed for hours as police and Seattle's SWAT team searched for a possible accomplice to the gunman, identified as Naveed Afzal Haq, 30, originally of Pasco, Wash., a small city about a four-hour drive from Seattle. Haq's last known address was in Everett, another small city 20 miles north of Seattle, though he disappeared from his residence there about two weeks ago, the Seattle Times reported Friday.

On Saturday, King County District Court Judge Barbara Linde set Haq's bail at $50 million (US).

The shooting began at approximately 4 p.m. Friday, when Haq reportedly took a teenaged girl hostage and forced his way through the first-floor security door, and immediately walked upstairs to the federation reception desk, where he began his rampage.

Security increased in Toronto

The first floor houses the JTNews, the federation-owned Jewish community newspaper and the Washington State Holocaust Education Resource Center. Those offices have separate entrances, but can be accessed through the federation's front lobby with a security code.

Witnesses in the building said Haq identified himself as an American Muslim upset about America's presence in Iraq and the current Israel-Lebanon conflict.

Citing a statement of probable cause, Associated Press reported that Haq told a 911 dispatcher, "These are Jews and I'm tired of getting pushed around and our people getting pushed around by the situation in the Middle East."

"He said he wanted the United States to leave Iraq, that his people were being mistreated and that the United States was harming his people," Seattle police chief R. Gil Kerlikowske told reporters Saturday. "And he pointedly blamed the Jewish people for all of these problems. He stated he didn't care if he lived."

Pam Waechter, 58, the director of the federation's community campaign, died at the scene. Waechter had worked in various capacities at the Seattle federation for nearly a decade, and at Seattle's Jewish Family Service social service agency for seven years before that.

Waechter was "really sort of a model for everybody else," Sabban said. "Pam was one of the sweetest people I ever worked with... She was great at her job and just a really wonderful person."

The surviving victims, all women, are Christina Rexroad, 28, a bookkeeper; Layla Bush, 23, receptionist and office manager; Cheryl Stumbo, 43, the federation's director of marketing, all of whom were upgraded to serious condition as of 5 p.m. Saturday. Carol Goldman, 35, a co-ordinator for the federation's community campaign, and Dayna Klein, 37, the director of planned giving, were reported as being listed in satisfactory condition. Klein, who was shot in the arm, is credited with convincing Haq to speak to 911 operators, who persuaded the gunman to put down his weapon and surrender, the Seattle Post-Intelligencer reported.

Another employee sustained minor injuries from jumping from her second-floor office into a dumpster in the alley behind the federation building. She was treated at a Starbuck's a block away, where federation employees who escaped the shooting through a back door gathered and spoke to police. The blood of one shooting victim sat in a pool outside the shop's front door as police rolled out yellow tape to secure the area.

At a vigil in a park overlooking Puget Sound on Saturday afternoon, some 50 community members, some of them current or former employees of the federation, gathered to pray and speak about the incident. Rabbi Rachel Nussbaum of the Kavana spiritual community put Friday's shootings into the context of the Nine Days, the current period that culminated this week with the Tisha b'Av fast day that commemorates the destruction of the Second Temple, as the most tragic in Jewish history.

Several attendees at the vigil expressed hope the shooting could be an opportunity to build better relations with the local Muslim community, an idea set forth Friday by at least one local Muslim leader.

What happens next for the federation and the Jewish community at large remains to be determined. Though it isn't unusual for the federation's gates to be closed on a Saturday, the sidewalk in front was filled with flowers and cards from well-wishers. The building has been sealed for the time being, though there was no police presence outside the federation on Saturday afternoon.

On Sunday, leaders of nearly every Jewish organization in the region gathered to regroup, set strategies for safety, and figure out where to go next.

Meanwhile, in the Toronto area, community leaders announced that a more visible security presence at Jewish institutions will be put in place immediately in response to the Seattle attack. Security has been stepped up at several buildings.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said they're implementing a pre-existing security plan, which includes ongoing contact with police and national security officials. A security advisory has already been sent to shuls, agencies, schools and camps.

"We grieve for our colleagues in Seattle and we extend the deepest condolences to Pamela [Waechter]'s family," said federation board chair, David Engel. "Here in Toronto, we are confident that our police forces are doing all they can to protect our institutions and our offices will be open... to conduct business as usual."

Ontario chair Joel Richler said CJC has "been prepared for this since the hostilities in the Middle East began and we will be increasingly vigilant."

Congress also extended its condolences to the victims of the Seattle attack. "We are heartsick about what has happened. We stand in solidarity with our friends and colleagues in Seattle, together with their families and loved ones, at this difficult time," said CJC president Ed Morgan. "As fellow Jews, and as citizens of a democratic nation, we abhor and condemn this type of hate-filled violence."

Rice cancels plans to visit Lebanon

While Sunday's Israel Air Force missile attack on Kfar Qana has made Rice's diplomatic efforts to gain a sustainable ceasefire more difficult, it will not change the parameters of that agreement, both Israeli and U.S. officials said Sunday.

Rice heard of the attack during a meeting in Jerusalem with Defence Minister Amir Peretz. She discussed the incident later with Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, in their second meeting in two days.

After the meeting with Peretz, Rice reiterated that although she wanted to see a ceasefire in place as soon as possible, "the parties have to agree to a ceasefire, and there have to be certain conditions in place." She made clear that the day's events did not change her position that an immediate, unconditional ceasefire is not the answer.

"We have to realize that we cannot have a circumstance in which there is a return to the status quo ante, in which there is a zone in southern Lebanon where a terrorist can… create the kind of devastating circumstances that we see today," she said. "And we would not be very responsible if we were not attending to those circumstances as well as working as urgently and as quickly as we can to get the fighting stopped."

Government officials said that while the Qana incident would not likely affect the continuation of the current military operations – something that both Olmert and Peretz made clear Sunday – it would undoubtedly be a turning point in the world's perception of the conflict.

Rice is working on putting together an overall agreement for Lebanon that would include a multinational force that would take up positions in southern Lebanon and help the Lebanese government implement UN Security Council Resolution 1559, which calls for the disarmament of Hezbollah and for moving the Lebanese army to south Lebanon.

The United Nations Security Council, meanwhile, held an emergency session Sunday, with UN Secretary General Kofi Annan repeating his call for an immediate ceasefire and expressing "deep dismay" that previous calls for a ceasefire had not been heeded.

The composition of the multinational force was discussed at the Olmert-Rice meeting, and was one of the issues that two high-level Washington envoys – Elliott Abrams and David Welch – worked on in Israel for several days.

Sources in Olmert's office said the territorial dispute over Har Dov (Sheba Farms) did not come up in the discussions with Rice, although the issue did figure prominently in talks she held with Olmert last week. At the time, the United States "counselled" Israel to negotiate a possible withdrawal from the area as part of a long-term arrangement for Lebanon.

The issue was also reportedly raised in Rice's meeting with Peretz Sunday morning, before the Qana news broke. Peretz told the cabinet Sunday that he was fundamentally opposed to linking this issue with a ceasefire, because then Hezbollah would be able to claim this as a victory. He said the current operation had nothing to do with this issue.

The chief of military intelligence, Maj.-Gen. Amos Yadlin, said while Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Saniora wanted to include Har Dov in an overall agreement as a way of showing that Lebanon gained something from the current conflict, Hezbollah was paradoxically opposed, because if this issue were resolved then the organization's reason for existence – fighting Israel's "occupation of Lebanon" – would cease to exist.

Rice cancelled a planned visit to Lebanon on Sunday, saying, "In the wake of the tragedy that the people and the government of Lebanon are dealing with today, I decided to postpone my discussions in Beirut."

Diplomatic officials said among the reasons behind the cancellation were security concerns and the feeling that with emotions running high in Lebanon, it was not the right time for Rice to be driving through the streets of Beirut.

Rice, during her press conference, deflected a question that blamed Israel for scuttling her diplomatic efforts, saying she was fully aware when she came that "I am working on this issue in the midst of ongoing military operations. I am quite aware that there are many dangers associated with military operations. I might note that there are, of course, rocket attacks continuing against Israel, as well."

Asked whether she was disappointed that Israel did not listen to her repeated pleas for caution, Rice said, "I think we all recognize that this kind of warfare is extremely difficult, because, in fact, it is warfare within territory in which civilians are residing. It is extremely difficult. And it unfortunately, it has awful consequences sometimes, and these are awful consequences."

Rice met with Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni twice, and was scheduled to meet Peretz again on Monday. Her morning talks with Livni focused on how to alleviate the humanitarian crisis in Lebanon.

'Only a nation that can defend its freedom truly deserves it'

At the outset, I offer condolences, on my behalf and on behalf of the government, the Knesset and the entire nation, to the families of the victims – both civilian and IDF [Israel Defence Forces]. I also send best wishes for recovery to the wounded, and a huge embrace for the families of those kidnapped and the boys themselves.

Over the past few weeks, our enemies have challenged the sovereignty of the State of Israel and the safety of its residents – first in the southern sector, then on the northern border and deeper into the home front. Israel did not seek these confrontations. On the contrary, we have done a lot to prevent them. We returned to the borders of the State of Israel, recognized by the entire international community. There were those who misconstrued our desire for peace – for us and our neighbours – as a sign of frailty. Our enemies misinterpreted our willingness to exercise restraint as a sign of weakness.

They were wrong!

The State of Israel has no territorial conflict, neither on our southern border nor on our northern one. In these two areas, we are sitting on the recognized international border – both vis-à-vis the Palestinian Authority in the Gaza Strip, and in Lebanon. We have no intention of interfering in their internal affairs. On the contrary, stability and tranquillity in Lebanon, free of the rule of foreign powers, and in the Palestinian Authority, are in Israel's interest.

We yearn for the day when peace will prevail between us, for the mutual benefit of our peoples from both sides of our common border.

The campaign we are engaged in these days is against the terror organizations operating from Lebanon and Gaza. These organizations are nothing but "sub-contractors" operating under the inspiration, permission, instigation and financing of the terror-sponsoring and peace-rejecting regimes, on the axis of evil which stretches from Tehran to Damascus.

Lebanon has suffered heavily in the past when it allowed foreign powers to gamble on its fate.

Iran and Syria still continue to meddle from afar in the affairs of Lebanon and the Palestinian Authority, through Hezbollah and Hamas.

Even if last Wednesday's criminal attack [on July 12] against an IDF patrol was carried out without the consent of the Lebanese government and without the assistance of its military, this does not absolve it of full responsibility for the attack which emanated from its sovereign territory, just as the fact that the chairman of the Palestinian Authority opposes terrorism against Israel does not relieve him and the Palestinian Authority of their responsibility for the attack carried out from their territory against our soldiers in Kerem Shalom. They are both fully responsible for the safety of our soldiers who were taken hostage.

Radical, terrorist and violent elements are sabotaging the life of the entire region and placing its stability at risk. The region in which we live is threatened by these murderous terror groups.

It is a regional – as well as a global – interest to take control and terminate their activity.

We can all see how the majority of the international community supports our battle against the terror organizations and our efforts to remove this threat of the Middle East.

We intend to do this. We will continue to operate in full force until we achieve this. On the Palestinian front, we will conduct a tireless battle until terror ceases, [kidnapped Israeli soldier] Gilad Shalit is returned home safely and the shooting of Qassam missiles stops. And in Lebanon, we will insist on compliance with the terms stipulated long ago by the international community, as unequivocally expressed only yesterday in the resolution of the eight leading countries of the world: the return of the hostages, Ehud (Udi) Goldwasser and Eldad Regev; a complete ceasefire; deployment of the Lebanese army in all of Southern Lebanon; expulsion of Hezbollah from the area, and fulfilment of United Nations Resolution 1559…

On both fronts, we are exercising self-defence in the most basic and essential sense.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert

We are at a national moment of truth. Will we consent to living under the threat of this axis of evil or will we mobilize our inner strength and show determination and equanimity?

Our answer is clear to every Israeli, and it echoes today throughout the entire region. We will search every compound, target every terrorist who assists in attacking the citizens of Israel and destroy every terrorist infrastructure everywhere. We will persist until Hezbollah and Hamas comply with those basic and decent things required of them by every civilized person. Israel will not agree to live in the shadow of missiles or rockets against its residents.

Citizens of Israel, there are moments in the life of a nation when it is compelled to look directly into the face of reality and say: no more! And I say to everyone: no more!

Israel will not be held hostage – not by terror gangs or by a terrorist authority or by any sovereign state.

In the life of a nation, there are moments of transcendence, of purification, when political and sectarian disputes which separate us are replaced by a sense of mutual responsibility… and primarily our eternal love for our people and our land. This is such a moment!

All of us – Jews, Muslims, Christians, Druze and Circassians – now stand as one person, as one nation, subject together to the same hatred and malice, and fighting against it in consensus and partnership. When missiles are launched at our residents and cities, our answer will be war with all the strength, determination, valour, sacrifice and dedication which characterize this nation.

There is nothing we want more than peace and good neighbourly relations – in the east, north and south. We seek peace, we pursue peace and we yearn for peace. At the same time, there is nothing we reject more than an attempt to harm us and make us give up our right to live here, in our land, in security and peace.

On behalf of the people of Israel, on behalf of all the residents of the country, I came here today to announce to the world: we seek neither war nor direct confrontation, but we will not be deterred from them when the need arises. Only a nation that can defend its freedom truly deserves it. We are entitled to our freedom, and when necessary, we know how to fight for it and defend it.

The strength of the State of Israel relies on the strength and capability of the IDF. This strength is the main guarantee to preserving and defending our lives on this land…

I want to extend from here my heartfelt gratitude – and that of the government and the people of Israel – to the IDF soldiers and commanders, the security services, the Israel police, the rescue forces, the firefighters and the other security forces…

The strength of a nation is measured not only by its military capabilities. The strength of a nation is measured by its welfare and morality, its strong and solid economy, its modern and developing market, its export of technologies and products for the most advanced world markets and its ground-breaking academic research. In all these, each and every one of us has good reason to be proud.

But above all, the strength of a nation is measured in times of trial, when the home front becomes the front, when the citizens of the country show admirable fortitude, patience and stamina, and allow it to operate against its enemies.

I had the privilege of witnessing these inner strengths in the years when I was mayor of Jerusalem. For years, our capital was subject to the most murderous terror attacks. The resilience, patience and restraint of the residents of Jerusalem and all the citizens of Israel are exemplary.

I recall a conversation with Rudy Giuliani, who was mayor of New York during the terror attacks of September 2001. I called to offer encouragement to him and the residents of New York following the collapse of the Twin Towers, and he replied: "Ehud, if the New Yorkers can withstand it like the Jerusalemites do, then we will defeat terrorism…"

Even in these days, hundreds of thousands of Israelis stand at the front line of fire, like soldiers in the battlefield, fighting for our life and honour.

It is clear to us that the circumstances imposed upon the residents compel us to address their special needs in all aspects. The government will lend immediate assistance, everywhere.

The government of Israel, under my leadership, derives strength from the stamina of the Israeli public. We are a brave and determined nation. I am proud today – perhaps more than ever before – to be an Israeli citizen.

Thanks to you, our enemies come up against a united nation, which fights together, shoulder to shoulder. We do not surrender and we do not panic. We believe in the justice of our cause, because there is no battle more just or moral than ours – a battle for the right to a peaceful and normal life, like any other human being, any other nation and any other state.

We fight for the right of children like Omer Pisachov, may his memory be blessed, a seven-year-old from Nahariya, who wanted to visit his grandmother Yehudit Itzkovich, may her memory be blessed, and enjoy the Sabbath dinner she prepared.

We fight for the right of citizens like Monica Lerer, may her memory be blessed, a 50-year-old from Nahariya, to drink coffee on the terrace in the country to which she immigrated from Argentina.

We fight for the right of girls like Ella Abukasis, may her memory be blessed, a 13-year-old from Sderot, to play the flute and read books, as Ella enjoyed doing.

We fight for everything that everyone in the enlightened world takes for granted and never imagined that they would have to fight for – the right to a normal life.

It is a difficult battle! It may become even more difficult. It is a painful test, and we may have to bear more suffering. Such a battle is never easy. It is strewn with pain and suffering, sacrifice, and casualties.

But, we have no intention of giving up our desire to live a normal life. We will not apologize for this desire, and we do not need anyone's approval to defend ourselves.

Citizens of Israel, this is a difficult time of trial for all of us. The State of Israel has withstood much more complex trials – and triumphed.

We have always known how to mobilize our inner strength, equanimity, wisdom and patience, in order to overcome our enemies.

Finally, I wish to speak on a more personal note to the families of Shalit, Goldwasser and Regev, the families of the soldiers who are held hostage by Hamas and Hezbollah.

You, and mainly your children – our children are always on my mind.

Last Wednesday, only five days ago, at 10 a.m., Aviva and Noam Shalit sat in my office. They, and I, want Gilad home more than anything. While we were discussing the situation, I – and Aviva and Noam – received the painful news that Ehud (Udi) Goldwasser and Eldad Regev had been kidnapped.

Unfortunately, pictures of three boys now stand in my room. Many times during the day, I look in their faces, into their eyes, and embrace them in my heart. I do not forget them for one minute. They were there on our behalf and for our sake. We will do everything and make every effort to bring them home. We will do this, but not in a pattern that will encourage more kidnappings.

There is almost no one who can understand the place you are in. Even when we do not talk directly, I feel and hear what you want to say to me, and I embrace you with love, understanding and agreement.

The place I am in compels me, ultimately, to make fateful decisions, for life, and sometimes even for death.

I have no strength other than that which you have bestowed upon me.

I have no courage other than that which God, my faith in the justice of our cause and my sense of supreme responsibility have instilled in me and have prepared me for these fateful moments.

I see before me the kidnapped boys, those standing in the front line and in the line of fire, those brave and determined ones who are fighting today and who could – God forbid – be the target of tomorrow's kidnapping.

We will defend all of them; on behalf of all of them we will fight, and with all of them before our eyes – the civilians in the line of fire, the kidnapped fighters and their families – we will continue, without hesitating, without capitulating and without fretting, until our goals are achieved.

We will triumph!

Israel, terrorism and the laws of war

By IRWIN COTLER

Opinion

Louise Arbour's comments on international law as it applies to Israel's military actions in Lebanon are as superficial as they are simplistic as a matter of law, and uninformed and misleading in their appreciation of and application to the facts.

First, it is a basic postulate of constitutional law that a government's first duty – be it in Canada or in Israel – is the protection of its citizens. Second, and not unrelated, international law mandates the right, if not the duty, of self-defence against aggression, and the reasonable use of military force for that protective purpose, whether in response to an armed attack from another state or a terrorist act.

In the case at hand, the triggers for the present hostilities include the abduction of Israeli soldiers and the intentional and unprovoked rocket and missile bombardment across international boundaries of Israeli cities, towns and villages by Hezbollah and Hamas. The root cause is the unwillingness of these terrorist entities and their supporters, like Iran, to recognize the legitimacy of Israel within any boundaries. By their own avowed declarations, they are sworn to the destruction of Israel and the killing of Jews wherever they may be – aided and abetted by their sponsors, Iran and Syria.

Accordingly, the declarations of Arbour, the United Nations' high commissioner for human rights and a former Canadian Supreme Court justice, to the effect that international law "prohibits the bombardment of sites with military significance but resulting invariably in the killing of innocent civilians" is wrong as a statement of international law, and dangerously wrong in the application of that alleged international law principle to the facts at hand.

First, it is legitimate under international law to attack military targets located in cities, as long as every effort is made to reduce civilian casualties. Second, targets located in cities including even apartment buildings, bridges and infrastructure – are legitimate military targets if they become the infrastructure from which war is waged, whether they are used to store and launch rockets and missiles, or to house and shield the terrorists themselves, or, as in the case of bridges, to transport both the terrorists and their weapons.

Indeed, Arbour's statement of the law is not only simplistic as a matter of law, but dangerously so in this instance. For if Israel is to be prohibited from exercising its right of self-defence to counter the indiscriminate bombardment of its citizens, the whole of Israel becomes a "sitting duck" for Hezbollah's and Hamas' international criminality. It would transform international law – and Israel's constitution or that of any democracy– into a suicide pact, with Hamas and Hezbollah able to commit war crimes with impunity.

Fortunately, the basic principles of international treaty and customary law respecting the reasonable use of force to repel aggression make it clear that the intentional co-mingling of combatants with civilians – or the embedding of combatants in civilian areas such that an attack on combatants would necessarily entail an excessively large number of casualties – is a flagrant violation of international humanitarian law. Hezbollah and Hamas are in violation of the laws of war when they launch missiles and rockets from villages and homes in order to immunize themselves from Israeli reprisals.

Accordingly, Hezbollah and Hamas are legally and morally responsible for any civilian casualty that results from any Israeli bombardment of areas containing missiles, rockets or the terrorists themselves, as long as the Israeli intention is for the purpose of protecting its civilians and Israel makes every effort to limit the civilian casualties in its response.

Admittedly, the right of self-defence in the response of Israel (or any other democracy) to such acts of aggression is not unlimited. The principle of "reasonableness" and "proportionality" in response still applies even when terrorist organizations like Hezbollah intentionally and indiscriminately target Israeli civilians and commit the war crime of using their own civilians as human shields. But then the test of "proportionality" for Israel (or any other democracy) – and the question of whether there has been excessive injury to civilians – must be assessed in the context of the intention and actions of both the aggressor and the responding state, including:

- The intentional and unprovoked acts of war across international boundaries by the terrorist organization to begin with;
- The use by the terrorist organizations of civilians as human shields to immunize themselves from an Israeli response;
- The avowed and publicly declared intention to destroy a state (Israel) and kill as many of its citizens as possible;
- The support for these terrorist organizations by states like Iran, which help recruit, train, supply, finance, harbour and instigate the terrorist movements, and which have their own genocidal ideology;
- The fact that terrorist organizations like Hamas and Hezbollah act as proxies or surrogates to the strategic objectives of Syria and Iran and which, in the case of Iran, include not only "wiping Israel off the map" but changing the map of the Middle-East itself;
- The intended and anticipated moral and strategic gains for Israel, which include better protecting from rocket and missile attacks more than two million Israelis – and with Tel Aviv in central Israel, protecting the country's entire population of seven million – must also be factored into any judgments about the "proportionality" of Israel's operations against Hezbollah.

It is painful and tragic to see hundreds of thousands of civilians fleeing the war zone; and the death of any innocent, Israeli, Palestinian or Lebanese, is a tragedy. But it must never be forgotten that there would have been no terrorist Hezbollah if UN Security Council Resolution 1559 had been complied with and enforced. There would have been no need for an Israeli response and no civilian casualties on any side if there had been no unprovoked act of aggression across international boundaries by both Hezbollah and Hamas to begin with. There would have been no Hezbollah capacity for an indiscriminate missile and rocket bombardment of the Israeli civilian population were it not for the Iranian and Syrian supply of some 15,000 of these deadly missiles and rockets to Hezbollah alone. There would have been nowhere near the number of Palestinian and Lebanese civilian casualties if Hamas and Hezbollah were not embedding themselves in the civilian population and using the civilians as human shields. And, as a matter of fundamental principle, there should no moral equivalence between the terrorist intention to maximize civilian casualties and the Israeli intention to minimize civilian casualties.

This discourse about the laws of war may, in the light of individual tragedies and civilian deaths, appear to be insufficiently sensitive to the human tragedies involved. Indeed, the "laws of war" may appear to be a contradiction in terms. But the very notion of laws of war and the theory of just wars presuppose that wars will still be fought, but that they must be fought justly.

In the end, Hamas and Hezbollah launched an unprovoked act of war against Israel. Israel had no choice but to respond to protect its citizens. The question is whether that response is just, and the answer has to be one rendered with full appreciation of the principles of international law and the facts and circumstances of the present conflict.

Toronto businessman helps Falash Mora make aliyah

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia — As dozens of Falash Mora immigrants line up in front of giant airport X-ray machines that will scan their belongings, they file past a 60ish silver-haired man who is quietly taking in the scene.

Some of the young adult Falash Mora are wearing western-style suits. So are many of the boys, while the girls are dressed in their frilly best. The older Falash Mora are garbed in traditional white robes and headdresses; one man's gnarled hand grasps a wooden rod as a biblical patriarch might have done.

The white-haired man who is watching this modern- day exodus is unknown to the olim now, but when they arrive at Ben-Gurion Airport after a 4½-hour flight, they will learn that Walter Arbib is the man primarily responsible for chartering the plane that brought more than 100 of them to Israel.

Clearly moved by what he is witnessing, Arbib said simply, "If you don't see it, it's hard to understand it."

A benefactor to numerous charities, he said being in the airport with the olim and travelling to Israel on the same plane means more to him than simply writing a cheque. "Here, you see something alive… Here, it's tangible. You see them dressed like they're going to a wedding."

Arbib, president and co-owner of Toronto-based SkyLink Aviation, a charter airline and logistics company, sponsored the flight in conjunction with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Keren Hayesod's Italy office.

Earlier Arbib had partnered with Lelei Lelaulu, president of Counterpart International, to bring $400,000 in AIDS pharmaceuticals to the Mother Teresa Orphanage in Addis Ababa. The orphanage is home to 400 children, from newborns to kids aged 17, all of whom are afflicted with the HIV virus.

At Ben-Gurion Airport, many of the Falash Mora immediately drop to their knees on disembarking and kiss the ground. It is a sight that moves those greeting them, among them many young soldiers who break into welcoming song as the new olim enter the terminal.

Arbib, who has witnessed the scene, explained his reasons for financing the flight. "Being a Libyan Jew and being an immigrant myself, I felt it was the right thing to do. I was impressed by how strongly they [the Falash Mora] try to return to their Judaism."

Raised in Tripoli, Libya, Arbib recalled a happy childhood and youth that came to an abrupt end with Israel's victory in the 1967 Six Day War. Forced to flee an enraged mob that tried to burn down their home, the Arbib family left Libya for Italy, which had once colonized the north African country. As a refugee, Arbib recalls fondly the warm Italian welcome and the help afforded by Keren Hayesod, which made the transition to a new life easier.

In 1969, he moved to Israel and launched a travel agency. In 1987, he immigrated to Canada and started SkyLink in partnership with Surjit Babra. Over the years, Arbib has lent his aircraft to a number of charitable endeavours including delivering medicines to Afghanistan, Darfur, Indonesia and Iraq – even the Palestinian territories. He often works in conjunction with Counterpart, a U.S.-based organization that obtains pharmaceuticals at bargain prices.

In late spring, Arbib was approached by the Israeli consul general in Toronto, Cobie Brosh, who asked if he'd be interested in participating in a charitable endeavour to support the Mother Teresa Orphanage in Addis Ababa. Arbib agreed, and within two weeks, Counterpart had obtained antiretroviral drugs in Holland.

SkyLink shipped the meds on a regularly scheduled flight, and Arbib, along with his family, travelled to Ethiopia to make the official presentation.

While touring the orphanage, Arbib was so moved by the plight of a young Ethiopian that he spontaneously pledged $8,000 to provide surgery for a five-year-old at Hadassah Hospital in Israel.

Arbib's wife, Edie, said, "Children get the best care at Hadassah Hospital. If we can save his life, why not?"

Asked why he chose this particular charity, Arbib deflects the question and credits the Jewish communities in Toronto and Italy, saying attributing the donation to them will give it greater impact and create better understanding between peoples.

As for the Falash Mora, he sees them as "observant Jews" who are "stubborn in learning Hebrew." There are a large number of them who need help, he said.

Even in Israel, Ethiopian Jews benefit from Arbib's help. The Museum of Libyan Jews he opened in Or Yehuda has initiated after-school programs for local Ethiopian children. Some of the programs were funded by $17,500 in birthday gifts he received and which he asked to be channelled through UJA Federation for the programs.

UJA Federation has also agreed to raise $2.5 million over three years – half the Canadian total – towards Operation Promise, a $160-million North American federation effort to assist in the aliyah and integration of Falash Mora in Israel as well as aid Jews in the Former Soviet Union.

According to Saturday's Globe and Mail, last week Arbib and Babra transported more than 6,000 Lebanese Canadians from Cyprus to Canada. SkyLink had planes waiting in Cyprus before the evacuees from Lebanon had even arrived by boat, the article said.

Arbib told the Globe his company would keep flying evacuees until everyone who wants to flee the region is home.

Ethiopia-Israel ties go back millennia

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia — Among the wood carvings, lapis bead jewelry, colourful scarves and coffee-serving utensils you can purchase in a typical Ethiopian souvenir shop, you're likely to find some sort of visual depiction of King Solomon greeting the Queen of Sheba.

Ethiopians are intensely conscious of their ancient history and proud of their connection to the Holy Land. Its longtime leader, Emperor Hailie Selassie, was long known as the Lion of Judah.

As Ethiopia lore has it, the Queen of Sheba visited King Solomon and later gave birth to a son, Menelik. Menelik and his mother are believed to have returned to Ethiopia with 12,000 Israelites, bringing with them many typical Jewish practices.

Boys are circumcised on the eighth day, only kosher animals are consumed and many Ethiopians adopt Old Testament names such as Solomon, Leah, David and Rachel. A typical Ethiopian invocation is, 'May the God of Israel bless you," said Rick Hodes, a doctor with the Joint Distribution Committee who first came to Ethiopia in 1985.

Stars of David can be found as a decorative motif in Ethiopia, and they are common in pictorial depictions of the meeting of Solomon and Sheba. Raiders of the lost Ark might be interested to learn that Ethiopians believe the Ark of the Covenant resides in a church in Axum, in the north of the country, not far from the Jewish heartland of Gonder.

Israeli Ambassador Ya'acob Amitai notes that Ethiopians cite the unique bond between Israel and Ethiopia, and many believe they are chosen people.

Israeli Ambassador Ya'acob Amitai

In the past, the emigration of Ethiopian Jews was problematic, but today's government in Addis is not blocking Falash Mora from leaving. However, "this issue is perceived by them, to put it mildly, as not in a positive context," the ambassador stated.

As for the current state of relations between Israel and Ethiopia, Amitai said: "In the last few years, bilateral relations have improved." Several high-ranking officials have visited each other's countries and trade had increased, although the overall number of $60 million (US) is modest.

Both Israel and Ethiopia believe there is a special bond between the two countries and "special links between the two peoples," Amitai said.

"These are not empty diplomatic phrases," he emphasized.

It is not seen as reflecting positively on Ethiopian life, and the government is also concerned about the émigrés moving to Arab territories, he added.

On a positive note, the government in Addis sees the Ethiopian Diaspora in the United States and Israel as assets, serving also as a potential source of investment and for improving cultural ties.

The government of Ethiopia has pushed the idea that those Falash Mora who have sold their land and given up their property to move to compounds in Gonder and Addis in the hope of one day moving to Israel should be compensated if they do not move to Israel. "We did not reject the idea of compensation," Amitai said. "We spoke in terms of a one time, final compensation…"

JNF Canada attends 'Vision Negev' summit

By JENNY HAZAN
Israel Bureau

BE'ER SHEVA — Green is certainly not the most prominent colour of Be'er Sheva's landscape. That's why, amid the brown of the stone and sand, you might think you're seeing a mirage when you first set eyes on a new 900-acre stretch of green parkland along Nachal Be'er Sheva.

But the Montreal Oasis Park is no illusion, and it's there thanks to the Jewish National Fund of Canada (JNF).

The park, which will soon include walking and biking paths, hiking trails, benches, a promenade along Nachal Be'er Sheva (the Be'er Sheva River), and even man-made lakes, is one of three major projects that make up JNF Canada's contribution to JNF's larger "Vision Negev" program, which aims to encourage immigrants and Israelis to move to the Negev by making it a more hospitable place to live. The details of the plan were revealed and discussed at the JNF World Leadership Conference, which took place in Be'er Sheva July 10 to 14 and included JNF representatives from some 20 countries.

Sharon Marcovitz-Hart

JNF Canada's five-member delegation to the conference was led by president Sharon Marcovitz-Hart, and included executive vice-president Joe Rabinovitch of Montreal and JNF Canada Israeli emissary Rami Kleinman.

"Vision Negev" is a multimillion-dollar plan created by JNF in co-operation with the Israeli government to build five large parks in the Negev towns of Dimona, Ofakim, Yerucham, Sderot and Be'er Sheva.

Be'er Sheva's Montreal Oasis Park is the first to be nearing completion. "It really is an unbelievable undertaking," said Marcovitz-Hart.

"It's a beautiful, green oasis in the middle of the desert's brown scenery. Everyone is excited about it. The whole atmosphere of this conference has been one of pioneering excitement," she added.

"The only way to get people to move to the Negev is to make it appealing to them," she said. "These developments will go a long way to achieving that goal."

She noted that the goal is not new.

"Even in Ben Gurion's time, we realized that without the Negev, we would not have an Israel," said Marcovitz-Hart, adding that the Negev, which covers 60 per cent of the country, is only populated by eight to nine per cent of its people. The centre, on the other hand, accounts for about 18 per cent of Israel's size, but houses 75 per cent of the population. "In the next 15 to 20 years, Israel's centre might become the most densely populated place on the planet," she said. "It is extremely overpopulated right now."

The current focus of "Vision Negev" is the Nachal Be'er Sheva area, which JNF estimates will take another 10 years and a total of $250 million (US) to finish. Although the park's infrastructure, its grass and trees have been put in place, there's still a lot to do.

The current project is divided into 10 to 15 sub-projects. Now that the foundations have been laid, Canada's biggest job is done. But it's still responsible for two more sub-projects: an amphitheatre designed to seat 8,000 audience members, and a visitor's centre, to be created by transforming Be'er Sheva's old Turkish train station into "Beit Eshel," which will serve as the entry point to the whole park.

"This project will totally transform Nachal Be'er Sheva," Rabinovitch said. "The hope is that this will be an anchor to attract more people to the Negev in general, and to Nachal Be'er Sheva in particular."

Ensuring that the Negev has a Jewish population preserves the integrity of the State of Israel, Marcovitz-Hart said.

"We have to open up new areas for people to live," she said. "The Negev is Israel's future."

But the problem is that there is a huge socio-economic gap between the standards of living in cities in the centre of Israel and in Negev development towns.

In the early 1990s, the Israeli government learned that giving people large subsidies for houses was not enough to entice them to move to the Negev. In addition to housing, there are lots of other things that people need: infrastructure, jobs, industry, economic development, educational facilities, cultural institutions, recreation sites and green spaces.

"Green spaces are especially important in the Negev, where you don't have a lot of green," Marcovitz-Hart said. "These parks are like lungs for these people."

Family has heard nothing of Ehud's fate

Eldad Regev, he delivered the bad news to his parents in South Africa and his younger brother, Gadi, who was travelling in India.

One part of him had been hoping Ehud would not be among the soldiers taken prisoner. "From the stories we [heard], we knew it wasn't the most pleasant environment to be in," he said.

Like his son, Yair's father, Shlomo, first heard about the incident from media reports, and he, too, immediately thought the worst, knowing Ehud, an infantry reservist, had been posted in his Humvee in the area of the attack.

Shlomo, who works extensively in South Africa as a maritime shipping consultant – he's a former ship's captain – thought of how to tell his wife, Malka. With the advice of a rabbi and with a doctor present, he informed her about Ehud's capture.

Since that initial day, the family has heard virtually nothing more about Ehud's fate.

"We have not the slightest information," Shlomo said in a telephone interview from Nahariya. "Everyone is doing the utmost to get this information from Hezbollah, but till now, we have no information."

Though the family is briefed daily by the army – in addition Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni called almost every day for at least the first week and Prime Minister Ehud Olmert phoned twice – they are in the dark about possible back-channel efforts to rescue their son, along with Regev and Gilad Shalit, who was captured by Hamas infiltrators on the border with Gaza.

As the conflict with Hezbollah intensified and bombs rained down on Nahariya, Shlomo said the family remained confident the Israeli government "is doing the utmost to get our son back."

Despite initial concerns about his mother's ability to accept the news of Ehud's capture, "she is amazingly strong," Yair said. The family has gathered together to endure the crisis and many friends and family come by to lend them support.

The Goldwassers, who have visited Canada several times, have also received calls of support from friends in Toronto.

Meanwhile, as war raged in Lebanon and Katyusha rockets rained down on northern Israel, the Goldwassers have done just about all they can do to learn Ehud's fate.

They've met with secretary general of the council of the European Union Javier Solana, they've asked the International Committee of the Red Cross to intervene, they have given numerous media interviews in Israel and abroad, and last week they travelled to France to solicit that country's assistance in getting some information about Ehud.

All to no avail. Solana, Shlomo said, admitted he doesn't have channels to Hezbollah, and the Red Cross could only promise to do its best to get information about Ehud and to pass along to him a letter and a Bible.

"At the moment, I want only one thing – the slightest information he is alive," Shlomo said. "From then on, we can find what we can do. We don't have accurate information, but the teams involved in this know he was captured alive and may be wounded."

Yair believes Ehud is getting good treatment. After all, Hezbollah "needs him as a card" to bargain for a prisoner exchange, he said.

"He's an amazing person once you know him," Yair said. "He's involved in so many things and takes them to the next level."

A photography bug, he took his hobby and turned it into a source of income, doing wedding photography as well as serving as head photographer for the Technion's in-house magazine.

He's an avid cyclist who races mountain bikes and he learned how to sail yachts, Yair said.

Shlomo describes his son as "a very peaceful man. He is very far from being a man who is dealing with war and pain."

Nevertheless, he continued, he believes his son has the inner strength to deal with his captivity.

"If he's alive, he will cope with it," Shlomo said.

Former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon was taken to an intensive care unit last week at Sheba Hospital in Tel Hashomer to drain fluids from his body. His condition had deteriorated in previous days. He has been in a coma since suffering a massive stroke Jan. 4.

Pride parade postponed

Due to ongoing fighting on Israel's northern and southern borders, organizers of a global gay pride parade slated to take place Aug. 10 in Jerusalem have delayed the march indefinitely. "It's important for us to hold the march under safe and peaceful circumstances, and... due to the political circumstances in the region, that's not the case," said Hagai El-Ad, head of Jerusalem Open House, a gay and lesbian centre that's organizing the week-long WorldPride 2006. Police also said they might not be able to protect marchers from violent opposition from observant Jews, Muslims and Christians. The march, expected to attract 10,000 people, won't go on, but 40 related events will take place starting Aug. 6. A new march date will be set once fighting stops.

Geography prof released

Ghazi Falah, a dual Israeli-Canadian citizen and a former University of Toronto geography professor, was released from Israeli custody Sunday after being arrested for photographing military installations along Israel's border with Lebanon before hostilities broke out with Hezbollah. Israel said he was spying for Hezbollah, but never laid charges. He said he was in Israel to visit his sick mother in Nazareth and didn't realize he took photos of a military antenna while sightseeing July 8. Haifa District Court had ordered Israel to charge Falah, who works at the University of Akron in Ohio, or release him by July 30. Israel returned his camera with the pictures.

HP buys software firm

U.S. computer giant Hewlett-Packard said last week that it will buy Israeli software maker Mercury Interactive Corp. for $4.5 billion (US) in the largest ever acquisition deal in the history of Israel's high-tech sector. HP CEO Mark Hurd said the deal will enable HP to double its annual software sales to about $2 billion.

French olim arrive

Some 650 olim from France landed in Israel July 25. Some of them will be moving to northern Israel, the scene of daily rocket attacks from Hezbollah in Lebanon. The Jewish Agency and the Ami association are behind the trip by the olim, some of an estimated 3,500 expected to make aliyah from France this year.

Hospital to treat Lebanese

An Israeli hospital said it would treat Lebanese victims of the Israel-Hezbollah conflict. Sheba Medical Center in Tel Hashomer said private donors in Israel and abroad would pay for the care. The offer is being promoted on Arabic-language radio and in Cyprus, where many Lebanese have gone.

Israel to allow airlifts

Israel will allow aid airlifts to reach Lebanon in a bid to avert a humanitarian crisis. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert announced the decision July 25 in talks with U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who has voiced concern over humanitarian conditions in Lebanon as Israel presses its offensive against Hezbollah. Olmert's office said he agreed the looming crisis had to be averted. Israel will allow planes carrying humanitarian aid to land at Beirut airport, his office said, adding that Israel will also allow the creation of a land corridor from Israel to Lebanon to transfer humanitarian aid.

Olmert regrets UN deaths

Ehud Olmert voiced regret for an Israeli airstrike last week that killed four UN observers, including a Canadian soldier, in southern Lebanon. The prime minister phoned UN Secretary General Kofi Annan and Prime Minister Stephen Harper of Canada, conveying his regrets for the overnight attack on the UN position, saying it was an error. Annan accused Israel of deliberately targeting his men. UN personnel have stayed in southern Lebanon despite ongoing battles between Hezbollah and Israel. Harper said he didn't believe the attack was deliberate.

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN, PART II:

ADELE WISEMAN'S 'ROAD NOT TAKEN'

It has been 50 years since Winnipeg-born writer Adele Wiseman scored the highly impressive professional coup of winning the Governor General's literary award for her first novel, The Sacrifice.

But Wiseman, who was 28 in 1956 and widely considered to be at the start of a very promising career as a novelist, disappointed the expectations of editors, critics and a large international pool of readers who would have welcomed a second novel from her within a few years.

No such book was forthcoming. Instead, she focused her creative energies on a play, The Lovebound, a four-hour, unproduceable tragicomedy about the world's failure to rescue European Jewry from what would become the Holocaust. Readers had to wait another 18 years for another Wiseman novel – Crackpot – which received a far less exuberant critical reception when it appeared in 1974.

Wiseman's poor career choice is the equivalent of an award-winning sprinter deciding to swim the English Channel as an encore. Writing in Saturday Night magazine, critic Adele Freedman described the author's decision to attempt a play as "an act of daring that eventually proved a mistake… Against the advice of her supporters at Macmillan [of Canada] and Viking [Press], she asserted her determination and wilfulness like the heroine of a Greek tragedy testing the elements."

Sadly, the literary artist's star was never to regain its lustre. "The course of Wiseman's career can be read as the progressive loss of readership and literary recognition, with little economic gain over a lifetime," writes Ruth Panofsky in The Force of Vocation: The Literary Career of Adele Wiseman (University of Manitoba Press), a newly published and well-written study of Wiseman's career path and the forces that shaped it.

Rather than attempt a personal biography, Panofsky focuses on Wiseman's relations with editors, publishers, fellow writers and others within the professional sphere. Novelist Margaret Laurence, a lifelong friend with whom Wiseman maintained a decades-long correspondence, is portrayed as the strongest of the various supporters and mentors who stood by her through her unrelenting lean period that lasted until her death in 1992.

Wiseman didn't give a hoot about prevailing market conditions in the book trade or what a project might bring her financially. Convinced of her own vision and the importance of remaining true to her art, she initiated literary projects through an artistic need to grapple with major issues of morality, truth and humanity. She worked in whatever genre she felt was most suited to a given project and, despite the pleas of editors, had no interest in sticking with a more popular form that had already won her a readership. Her eye was always on higher things.

During her early years in Winnipeg, as well as during her literary apprenticeship in London (where she worked for the Stepney Jewish Girls Club) and her later years in New York, Montreal, Toronto and Banff, Wiseman always saw herself as a writer of integrity and vision who stuck by her own muse. "I'm afraid I'm incurably pig-headed about my own literary judgment," she once wrote defiantly after MacMillan rejected Crackpot for publication; she also bridled upon hearing her characters described as "grotesque."

Panofsky relates many more psychologically telling professional incidents. Several years after Crackpot's eventual publication by McClelland & Stewart, for example, Wiseman became livid at hearing that the novel was being remaindered at W.H. Smith bookstores for $1.99. During an angry exchange of letters with publisher Jack McClelland, he scolded her that she seemed to know nothing about the realities of book publishing and "had come to believe that the world owes you some very extraordinary considerations as an artist." Wiseman shot back that artists were indeed entitled to "extraordinary consideration." Truth seems to reside on both sides of their angry debate, which permanently damaged their relationship.

The Force of Vocation serves to remind us how good The Sacrifice is, and why it's earned a coveted spot in the canon of Canadian postwar lit. An English teacher at Ryerson University, Panofsky posits that the book's success was all the more remarkable because its author was a woman in a male-dominated publishing world. (Too bad we know so little about the book's lonely process of creation.) Panofsky also reminds us that many have come to regard Crackpot as an unsung Canadian classic. That was certainly my impression when I read it some years ago and marvelled at its solid construction and rare artistry.

As Canada's foremost Wiseman scholar, Panofsky conveys an encyclopedic knowledge of her subject: her scholarship is outstanding. She deserves credit for producing this timely study of a writer whose works (including Old Woman at Play, about her mother) are still deserving of a wide readership, especially within the Jewish community.

Handy guidebook to Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When the current crisis in Lebanon ends, tourists will begin flocking back to Israel, and when they do it will be in the full knowledge that there is plenty to see and do in this pint-sized historically and religiously important country.

Before you pack your bags, allot an hour or two to Israel (Random House), a guidebook put out by the reputable Fodor organization.

This popular volume, now in its sixth edition, should answer all your questions about Israel's history, favourite destinations, restaurants, cafes and hotels.

The maps are clear, and the coloured photographs of Jerusalem, Haifa, Jaffa and the Galilee will surely whet your appetite for the sights and sounds of Israel.

For example, the first few pages offer a succinct overview of Israel, with sections on Tel Aviv, Haifa and the northern coast, the lower Galilee, the upper Galilee and the Golan Heights and Eilat and the Negev.

Read them carefully and you can start planning your itinerary.

Once you know where you want to go and what you want to do, you can read about your chosen destinations in much greater depth.

The entries are well-written and authoritative, and whoever wrote them has been around Israel and knows the place from top to bottom. That will be comforting for a traveller visiting the country for the first time.

Several pages are given over to what is described as "quintessential Israel," or features that impart a sense of the nation.

So if you're really interested in familiarizing yourself with Israel's essence, you'll read about falafel, that delicious fast-food staple; the Sabra personality, which is both prickly and warm; and markets and bargaining, which introduce you to that wonderful pastime, shopping, and give you tips on how best to deal with vendors.

When you're in Israel, be sure to keep Israel close at hand. You won't be sorry.

Yiddish concert features Beyond the Pale

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The 25th summer Yiddish concert, features Eric Stein with his klezmer ensemble Beyond the Pale and the singers Michael Mandel, Adrienne Cooper and Avra Fainer, accompanied by pianist Marilyn Lerner.

The concert, titled Oy a Simkha, Oy a Freyd (Oh a Celebration, Oh a Joy), is dedicated to the memory of Aron Fainer, an activist, a Yiddishist, a community leader and teacher. He died on June 14. Avra Fainer is his granddaughter.

Aron Fainer was one of the founding members of the committee for Yiddish, which was formed in 1949, and remained active on the committee until his death.

He was the chair of the first summer Yiddish concert in 1981 and several others and served as the MC at outdoor summer Yiddish concerts as well.

Sponsored by the Committee for Yiddish of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the concert takes place Aug. 14 at 7:30 p.m., at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

Bess Shockett, chair of the concert committee, said this year's concert will concentrate on "up music."

Committee chair Sheldon Friedman told The CJN that the Yiddish language, its history and culture are the foundation of the Ashkenazi Jewish community of Toronto.

"We work to create a love and knowledge of Yiddish," he said, adding that the committee for Yiddish works directly and indirectly to ensure that the Ashkenazi story is told.

The committee for Yiddish sponsors a number of programs, including Yiddish classes for children and adults, among them courses at the University of Toronto and York University, and a Yiddish event at the Jewish Book Fair. The committee also works with other organizations to promote Yiddish programs.

Concert tickets are $10. For more information, call Lil Nobel, 416-635-2883, ext. 111. Tickets are also on sale at the synagogue

Classic Polish Holocaust film out on DVD

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Dozens of Holocaust films have been released in theatres and on DVD over the past 20 years. Therefore, it is with great pleasure that I learned about the DVD release of one of the first such films, Border Street.

Border Street (Ulica Granicza) was produced in Poland in 1948 by famed director Aleksander Ford. It was one of the first films to describe the events that took place during the Holocaust and has long been considered a classic.

Unfortunately, this film has been almost impossible to obtain. It did have a theatrical run in Toronto in the late 1940s or early '50s and then disappeared. A small video company in the United States released it a number of years ago, but very few people knew about it and fewer could get their hands on a copy.

Now Morningstar Entertainment in Canada has released the film on DVD.

Border Street tells about a group of Poles living in the same neighbourhood, and even in the same apartment building, and follows them from just before the Nazi occupation of Warsaw until the Ghetto uprising.

The film centres on four young people – Davidek and Jadzia are Jewish youngsters who see resistance as the only way to survive the Nazi extermination policy, while Bronek and Wladek fight the Nazis as a means of expressing their Polish patriotism.

Not only is Border Street a compelling drama, it is also of great historical interest. Having been produced so soon after the events, it is much closer to the facts than most films made since.

The film also uses the well-known Yiddish song Es Brent as a theme through parts of the narrative.

Another film released recently on DVD is Little Jerusalem (La Petite Jerusalem), one of the films premièred at the 2006 Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

Little Jerusalem is set in a section of Paris called Sarcelles, which has a large Jewish population. The film tells the story of Laura, an 18-year-old Jewish woman torn between her religious beliefs and the secular world around her. Laura questions her growing sexual awareness and this causes her to reassess her life and make a number of decisions that will affect her future profoundly. This film contains nudity and situations that might make it inappropriate for young people.

Both DVD's are available at better video stores or can be purchased on the Internet.

Poetry collection celebrates everyday life

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Jack Gelman is a man of many talents.

Gelman, 77, whose formal education ended in Grade 7, is a poet, a community worker, an entrepreneur and a comedian. Recently, he published his fourth book, 40 Years of Poetry.

Jack Gelman

His latest book, which spans four decades, reflects his eclectic life filled with challenges and joyous events. The 133 poems in 40 Years of Poetry are about everyday events with such subjects as family and friends, holidays and special days, love of country and city, sports and politics.

In his poems, Gelman speaks of hard work and his penchant for optimism while always looking for humour in every situation. (His humour is reflected in his licence plate, "J G POET.")

"My education at Ryerson Public School ended in Grade 7 and my education continued on the streets where I graduated with honours," he says.

Gelman, who began his business career as a commercial paper salesman in 1948, is the prototype for the saying, "If life gives you lemons, then make lemonade." Raised in poverty, lacking an education and with a disability – dyslexia – he overcame the obstacles in his path.

Despite that in the 1930s there was no diagnosis for dyslexia, or help available, he managed to educate himself and to achieve much in his life. And through it all, he retained his sense of humour.

For many years, Gelman revised the words to songs for occasions such as bar mitzvahs, birthdays and the birth of babies.

"Then I was hooked on writing and began writing of life-cycle events in my family and for friends," he says. He also wrote about famous people and places.

"It was my friends who suggested that I publish my poems."

Along with his new book, Gelman is the author of Jack Gelman's Collection of Yiddish Words, Yiddish: A Two Way Street and One Year at a Time.

He proudl notes that h was the firs non-profes sional to serv as president o the North Yor lodge of B'na Brith, fro which he re ceived the ma of the yea award in 198

He also re ceived th Tower o David Awar for his wor with the Stat of Isra Bonds.

Richler parodied other writers, new book contends

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

A new book makes a convincing case that the late Mordecai Richler borrowed liberally from the great writers, both ancient and modern, disguising their themes, characters and incidents with his own style of parody, thus avoiding accusations of plagiarism.

Ada Craniford, a great admirer of Richler's work, also argues in her self-published Mordecai Richler: A Life in Ten Novels that his 10 novels are far more autobiographical than he ever acknowledged, but that he has likewise parodied the facts of his life.

Although Richler was reviled by some for turning his back on Jewish tradition, Craniford detects much in his work that was inspired by the Hebrew Bible.

She contends that Richler's ability to so cleverly integrate bits of other novels, poems and stories is a mark of genius, and not misappropriation or simply a case of imitation being the sincerest form of flattery.

Craniford's maintains that from his first novel, The Acrobats, published in 1954, to the last, Barney's Version in 1997, Richler wrote parody. She uses University of Toronto literary theorist Linda Hutcheon's definition of parody as "a kind of writing, in which the words of an author or his thoughts are taken and by a slight change adapted to some new purpose."

She believes that Richler meant for these echoes of other writings to be noticed by astute readers and that being aware of them enhances, rather than detracts, from the reading of his novels, as well as the original works.

Craniford believes parody was Richler's way of paying homage to writers he admired and does not mean he lacked originality, because he has given all of the material, including the facts of his own life, a new and often ironic or caricatured twist.

"Richler's way of showing this admiration is always to alter what he has borrowed so that it reflects his own wit, his own circumstances, and his own way of looking at the world," she writes.

Mordecai Richler

Craniford now lives in Kingston after teaching English at the University of Toronto and Concordia University, as well as in Toronto-area high schools. She taught Richler's novels for 14 years.

A native of Austria, who came with her family to Montreal in 1938, Craniford notes that she is a contemporary of Richler, who died in five years ago, and that they knew many of the same people while growing up.

Craniford spent a good deal of time combing through the Richler archives at the University of Calgary, which she says reveal a great deal about the private man.

Barney's Version, Richler's last novel, borrows a great deal from Saul Bellow's Herzog in its portrayal of man trying to figure out how he messed up so many times, especially with women, according to Craniford, and contains "large chunks" from Richler's own life. It also owes much to Shakespeare's King Lear, whose protagonist struggled with old age, loss and regret.

Craniford's observation that Richler's penultimate novel Solomon Gursky Was Here is a fictionalized version of Peter C. Newman's The Bronfman Dynasty: The Rothschilds of the New World won't come as a surprise to anyone who has read both books. But she demonstrates that the intricate structure of the novel is patterned on A.J.A. Symons' more obscure 1934 The Quest for Corvo: An Experiment in Biography.

Neither is it a revelation that Richler's most popular novel, The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz, is clearly akin to Budd Schulberg's 1941 classic What Makes Sammy Run?, but it takes considerably more imagination on Craniford's part to deduce that strains of the biblical story of David also run though the book. Thus, Duddy (a diminutive of David) is a somewhat more complex character than the soulless, money-grubbing Glick, possessing some of the attributes of strength, resourcefulness and loyalty of the biblical hero, according to Craniford.

St. Urbain's Horseman, Richler's first weighty novel, contains currents from sources as diverse as the poetry of W.H. Auden, the biblical books of Genesis and Revelation, and the Greek Hercules mythology, Craniford argues.

She also contends that Richler's lesser-known, early novel A Choice of Enemies is clearly a take-off on T.S. Eliot's poem The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufock, and that even the central character is an anti-Semite, as Eliot is reputed to have been.

Craniford writes that because Richler disclosed so little about his writing methods and because his stories are both realistic and satiric, critics and reviewers have for the most part ignored his "playful reworking" of other writings, or dismissed it as "recycling" of material, both his own and that of others.

As for the autobiographical aspects of his writing, Craniford is convinced that Richler repeatedly models the ideal women on his second wife Florence, with whom he had a long and happy marriage and raised five children. On the other hand, the less-pleasing female characters do not share traits with his first wife, Cathy Boudreau with whom he was incompatibly and briefly wed -- so much as they evoke the feelings, such as guilt, that Richler had about his relationship with her, Craniford speculates.

"I wrote Mordecai Richler: A Life in Ten Novels as a tribute to Richler, and as a way of sharing my fascination with the way he combines a fictional version of his life with parodies of his literary sources. Richler's use of parody is an astonishing, generally under-rated, achievement," she writes.

The other Singer brother

The Family Carnovsky*, I.J. Singer. Translated by Joseph Singer. Schocken Books.

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Jewish novels published shortly before or during World War II are poignant today in ways that their writers and contemporary readers could not have imagined. I.J. Singer's last novel, The Family Carnovsky, operates as a kind of time capsule, a portrait of Jewish life in America and Europe before it was transformed by the events of the war.

Norman Ravvin

Like much of the fiction of both I.J. and I.B. Singer, The Family Carnovsky was serialized in the Forverts before it appeared in book form as Di Mishpoche Karnovski in 1943.

The novel proved to be the capstone of I.J. Singer's varied career, as he died in New York City early the following year. Aspects of the book will be familiar to readers of mid-century Yiddish fiction: the multi-generational saga, which for some might require a family tree as a guide; a tendency toward melodrama, driven by the demands of the original venue of newspaper serialization; and a detailed portrait of a prewar Jewish culture lost to us.

Three generations of Carnovskys provide a template against which Singer examines the challenges and dangers of the 20th-century rush toward secularism and enlightenment views as alternatives to orthodoxy.

Like his more famous brother, I.J. Singer was well placed to take on this theme. The Singers' home life had been infused with the religious fervour and scholarship of their father, alongside the more practical-minded example of their mother. The Carnovsky family's story begins amid small-town Polish Jewish pieties, before it moves to Berlin. There, David Carnovsky sets up his family in a "great apartment house on Oranienburger Strasse" and pursues his desire to be a German in the street and a Jew at home.

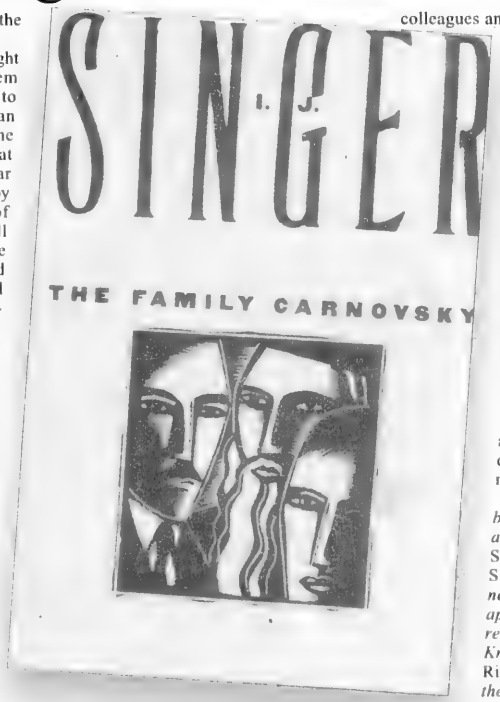
Berlin, in the decades between the wars, was the destination of large numbers of Jews fleeing social and economic collapse in the eastern lands, as well as intermittent pogroms. David Carnovsky is among these newcomers, yet his success as a trader and his enlightenment philosophy, modelled after Moses Mendelssohn, allow him to take his place in the Jewish elite, at remove from other eastern newcomers.

His son, after serving as a medic on the eastern front, becomes a celebrated Berlin physician and marries a German. Their child, called Joachim in the street and Jegor at home, becomes the focus of the novel's dark conclusion. Growing up amidst the worst anti-Jewish abuses of pre-World War II Berlin, Jegor comes to despise his Jewish ancestry, and fanatically reinvents himself as a heel-clicking, jawohl-shouting "pure German." When Jegor's family emigrates to New York City, he asserts himself as a hater of all things Jewish and American, pining to return to what Singer's characters refer to as "the other side."

The back half of The Family Carnovsky, set among the Jewish and German immigrant neighbourhoods of pre-World War II Manhattan, is strange and compelling. It offers a glimpse of the difficulties experienced by German-Jewish immigrants as they adapted to their new life. This often included the same disdain they had felt for eastern Jews when they knew them as refugees and newcomers to Berlin.

Singer portrays New York as a tough, polyglot urban arena for ethnic and national tensions. Jegor – now known as Joachim – makes his way to Yorkville, Manhattan's German Town. There he finds no shortage of Nazi sympathizers, who gather in beer halls and youth clubs, and travel to makeshift camps on the outskirts of the city where the swastika flies alongside the stars and stripes.

The Family Carnovsky might be thought of as a "problem novel." What, Singer wants to ask, can remain of European Jewish identity among the caverns of Manhattan? What are the prospects for prewar Jewish refugees brutalized by the Nazi transformation of Germany? In what way will intermarriage challenge modern Jewish life? And more covertly, what will become of Yiddish intellectuals and writers in America?



When Singer's last novel appeared in the Forverts, he had lived with his family in the United States for seven years. He had been, by all accounts, a skeptic since his youth, and this tendency was not alleviated by his having managed to escape the Nazi assault on his native Poland and the rest of Europe. He had abandoned his father's religious commitments as a youth, yet he was attracted for only a short time to the leftism and communism of Yiddish literary circles.

This placed him at remove from many of his would-be colleagues among Yiddish journalists and novelists. "I saw with grief," I.B. Singer wrote of his brother, "that he – as I, his younger brother – actually fit in nowhere."

Though he was dead by the beginning of his fifth decade, I.J. Singer experienced great success as a writer of novels and stories, and his work was extremely well-received through theatrical versions performed on the Yiddish stage. Still, his final novel reflects a man divided and, in many ways, in despair in the face of modern American life.

Norman Ravvin's books include novels and the story collection Sex, Skyscrapers and Standard Yiddish. His new introduction will appear in a forthcoming reissue of Henry Kreisel's 1948 novel The Rich Man. He is chair of the Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies at Concordia University.

Trains

based on a true story

The Kharkov train station seethed with activity. Porters heaving giant suitcases shoved their way through the churning crowds. Passengers scurried about, buying tickets, checking and rechecking their luggage. Newsboys touted the latest headlines.

Zev Tannenbaum looked at his watch. His train wasn't scheduled to leave for another half-hour. He bought a newspaper, and perused the stories. A heavy box slammed into his leg. "I'm so sorry sir," apologized the young porter, disappearing into the crowd.

"Watch where you're going!" Zev shouted after him.

This station is much too busy, mused Zev. He looked around, scanning the crowds. Am I the only one here not rushing about? Finally, Zev spotted a stationary figure amidst the sea of motion. It looked like a religious Jew a rabbi in fact. Zev manoeuvred himself through the crowd and tried to strike up a conversation.

"Good afternoon, Rabbi. Zev Tannenbaum."

"Where are you travelling?" inquired Zev.

"To Homel."

"Indeed? I too am going there. Perhaps we share the same railcar." Zev glanced at his ticket. "I am in Car 5. And you?"

"The rabbi smiled. "I don't have a ticket yet."

Zev looked at him, puzzled. "Then you should hurry up and purchase one immediately! The train is filling up."

"Oh?" exclaimed Zev. "So why did you come to the station?"

"I have to go to Homel."

"But how do you plan on getting there?"

"By train. How else?"

"But you don't have a ticket!"

"I have faith."

Zev shook his head in disbelief. "Faith in what?"

"In God of course." I am sure He will bring me to Homel."

"How can you be so sure?"

"I need to go there. And God will not let me down. He never has. He never will."

"So if you miss this train, you will wait until tomorrow for the next one? And then the next?"

"Oh no. That is inconceivable. I have to go to Homel today."

This conversation is going in circles, thought Zev. The rabbi's assertions baffled him, confused him, intrigued him. He seems so sure of himself. I'm going to wait and see, Zev decided. We'll see for ourselves how far his faith takes him.

The tracks began to tremble, and bellowing and steaming, the train roared into the station.

"All aboard!" called the conductor, and the passengers streamed toward the open doors.

"Porter, sir?" asked a boy. That looks like the boy who ran into me before! "All right, take my bags. Car 5."

"Last call for Homel!" Zev picked up his valise.

"All right Rabbi, the train's leaving. It's been nice speaking with you. Sorry your faith didn't work today," he concluded, stifling a smirk.

"Didn't work? The train has not left yet."

"You mean you STILL believe..."

"Excuse me sir."

Zev looked up. The conductor was addressing him. "Yes?"

"Are you going to Homel?"

"Yes."

"We're departing." Zev took a step toward the waiting train.

Zev felt a pang of compassion. Here this foolish rabbi is still standing, stuck alone, even his faith finally failing him. "Is this train full?" he asked the conductor.

"Rabbi, Rabbi, if I hadn't bought you a ticket at the last minute, you would still be standing there in the station. You see? Faith doesn't work!"

The rabbi looked up from his Gemarah. "What do you mean? An hour ago, I was standing in the train station with no money. Now, here I am on the train!"

An artist's life journey

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

How does someone become an artist?

Of course, you have to have a talent – for drawing or painting or sketching, or whatever you want to do. But there has to be something more.

Neil Waldman, who writes, teaches, paints landscapes, designs postage stamps, illustrates books and draws book jackets, tells how he became an artist in Out of the Shadows; an artist's journey (Boyd Mills Press, 2006).

Waldman grew up in New York, in a family where there were a lot of artists. When he was very little, his mother saw how much he liked to draw. She bought him art supplies and set up a little area of the kitchen for him to work in. After awhile, his sister and two brothers joined him.

Waldman discovered a book his grandmother had brought from Russia, which was full of paintings by Vincent van Gogh, a famous Dutch artist. He was enthralled with the book, and read it over and over again. When his grandfather, who also took him to the zoo and to various cultural places, brought him to the Metropolitan Museum of Art, he showed Waldman actual paintings by van Gogh.

The book isn't only about Waldman's painting experiences. He talks about how he and his siblings used art as a way of hiding from his parents' violent arguments. He spent time in the Catskills with relatives, went to seders at his grandparents' home where all his aunts, uncles and cousins squashed into every corner of the apartment.

One of his teachers told the students to keep a journal of things that were important to them. Waldman found the journal so important to him that he started to keep a secret one at home. In it he recorded his own private experiences and thoughts. Later, he said, he used the secret journal as a source for his art.

A touching theme in the book is Neil's relationship with his next-in-line brother, Bruce. The older boy used to draw pictures for his brother of a magic city under the street, where he promised to take him when he got old enough. Eventually, Bruce figured out that the city wasn't real, but that didn't affect how much he still loved Neil.

The book contains copies of artwork by Neil, Bruce and Bryna Waldman (David, the youngest, became a spiritual healer), and by some of their aunts and uncles.

You might be interested in Vincent van Gogh, too – there are many illustrations of his works in books, and many art galleries have original van Goghs. He was one of the painters called Post-Impressionists. You might want to look up some of the others, too.

Canadians miss out on sun's benefits, Toronto doctor warns

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

These are the lazy, hazy days of summer when the sun rises well before 6 a.m. and sets sometime after 9 p.m. You'd think it shouldn't be too difficult to get enough sunshine in your "diet" to keep you healthy.

Yet despite the long, bright days, a lot of Canadians suffer from a lack of exposure to sunlight, leading to two related conditions – vitamin D deficiency and vitamin D insufficiency. In particular, people who cover their skin – among them Orthodox Jewish women – experience one of the two vitamin D shortfalls, said researcher Frances Budden, a Toronto doctor of internal medicine and geriatrics who has a special interest in osteoporosis.

Vitamin D, which the human body produces when exposed to sunlight, is needed for the proper absorption of calcium, which in turn builds strong bones and teeth.

One researcher has found that as many of half of all Canadians are vitamin D insufficient, a condition that does not manifest itself in readily observable symptoms but happens when "you don't absorb calcium from your gut," Budden said.

When that occurs, "the body takes the calcium from the bones and weakens the bones over the long term."

Vitamin D deficiency, which is distinguished from insufficiency by a lower level of the vitamin in the blood, shows up in various symptoms, including aches and pains and feelings of weakness. In children, rickets can develop. In adults, osteomalacia, or soft bones, can result, she said.

While health practitioners have long known that vitamin D is important for bone health, researchers have discovered in recent years that a shortage of the vitamin has also been associated with other maladies, such as breast, colon and prostate cancer, as well as immune disorders such as rheumatoid arthritis, multiple sclerosis and type 1 diabetes.

A report in Science News Online, a Web magazine, notes that vitamin D is produced in the skin. "The human body can generate 10,000 to 12,000 international units (IU) of vitamin D from a half-hour of summer sun exposure," the article stated.

"In practice, most people in the United States get a daily intake from food and sun exposure well below [the] recommended intake, especially during winter. People living in the United States and Europe or farther from the equator have trouble getting enough sun to maintain adequate blood concentrations of the vitamin. When people heed dermatologists' warnings about preventing skin cancer by limiting sun exposure and using sunscreen, they also reduce their vitamin D production."

Budden noted that as little as 20 minutes of exposure to the sun at noon during the summer would spur the creation of enough vitamin D to meet health requirements.

Because vitamin D is not stored in the body and getting enough sunlight in the winter may be difficult, Budden recommends dietary supplements. Very little vitamin D is found naturally in foods, she said, but it's been added to milk and can be found in small amounts in margarine, egg yolks, canned salmon and sardines. Infant cereal is also fortified with the vitamin.

Osteoporosis Canada recommends children beginning at age four get 200 IUs of vitamin D and 800 mg of calcium daily. At age 50, adults should ingest 800 IUs of vitamin D and 1,500 mg of calcium, while pregnant or nursing women require 400 IUs of vitamin D and 1,000 mg of calcium daily.

Budden said researchers in Israel who studied women giving birth found that the blood of Orthodox women showed a greater vitamin D deficiency than the rest of the population. Budden said that you can extrapolate from that study that any people, male or female, who cover themselves are susceptible.

"Vitamin D deficiency is common in Canada, particular in the late winter and spring. Many people who cover themselves with protective clothing, have dark skin colour and spend time indoors are vitamin D deficient year round. The elderly, chronically ill, housebound or institutionalized individuals, are particularly at high risk of vitamin D deficiency," she said.

Budden noted that for "every single person who I see for osteoporosis or the precursor, thin bones, the first thing I recommend is adequate vitamin D and adequate calcium intake, and an exercise program."

Hollywood lives up to Torontonian's expectations, more or less

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Hollywood is notorious for devouring the hopes and dreams of newcomers with stars in their eyes.

For Torontonian Stacy Traub, however, Hollywood has not been as cruel, having more or less lived up to expectations.

Traub, 35, is a busy lady these days, being the creator and executive producer of a forthcoming ABC television series, Notes from the Underbelly.

Scheduled to premère in late September, in a time slot just ahead of the popular Grey's Anatomy, Notes from the Underbelly is currently being filmed.

Adapted from a novel by Risa Green and starring Jennifer Westfeldt, the lead in the film Kissing Jessica Stein, it turns on a couple expecting their first baby and how the pregnancy affects their lives and those of their friends and family.

Prior to her involvement in Notes from the Underground, Traub – a graduate of York Mills Collegiate and York University – was supervising producer of Kitchen Confidential, a Fox TV series.

Co-created by Darren Star of Sex and the City fame, Kitchen Confidential charted the fortunes of a head chef and his assistants in a frenetic restaurant. To her regret, it was cancelled after only 12 episodes, but that's hardly unusual in dog-eat-dog Hollywood.

Traub also developed two pilots for HBO and Warner Brothers, Wicked Little Town and I'll Cuddle When I'm Dead, but neither was picked up.

Wicked Little Town revolved around a female poker player in Las Vegas, while I'll Cuddle When I'm Dead was loosely based on Traub's relationship with her husband, John Himelstein.

She and Himelstein, the proprietor of a Vietnamese restaurant in Silver Lake, a hip area in Los Angeles, have an infant daughter, Hazel.

If nothing else, I'll Cuddle When I'm Dead was vividly true to life.

"It was about a couple who get married for a Green Card, which is what my husband and I did when I got my first writing job on Suddenly Susan. Luckily, it's worked out, my marriage that is."

Stacy Traub

Before developing I'll Cuddle When I'm Dead, Traub was a producer on NBC's Happy Family and worked on Spin City.

Traub, whose father, Ronald, is a dentist and whose mother, Sandy, is a homemaker, has resided in Hollywood for the past 13 years.

"It's too sunny all the time," she said. "I miss the clouds."

Despite such quibbles, Traub realizes that her life in Hollywood is basically a dream come true.

At York, she learned a valuable lesson. As she put it, "It takes a lot of work to make a film, and it's just as hard to make a crappy movie as it is to make a good one."

With a degree in hand, Traub moved to Los Angeles to study cinematography at the American Film Institute, and in retrospect, it was a formative experience.

"I realized that I'd rather tell stories than figure out how to read a light meter and lug heavy stuff around," she said. "I didn't want to be a cinematographer."

Having rejected cinematography as a career, Traub found herself in a succession of mundane, dead-end jobs, the lot of many aspiring writers, producers and directors.

"I was a script reader, a job I did for free. I would read scripts and do coverage, writing a summary of a script and giving my thoughts on it. Reading a lot of bad scripts taught me what not to do as a writer."

As well, Traub was the assistant to a director who churned out low-budget films. "I drove him to the set and got him coffee and lunch, but it was a good way of learning how a set works and what a director goes through."

After a gig as a cocktail waitress, she was a salesperson at Williams-Sonoma, the kitchenware chain store.

"It was probably my favourite non-writing job because there was very little pressure and it was a beautiful shop. I was only there for four to five months, but I wrote a screenplay in my spare time. I learned that sometimes it's good just to have a job to pay the rent."

Then her luck changed.

"Eventually, I lucked into a writer's assistant position on the show Mad About You, with Paul Reiser and Helen Hunt. This led me into the field of television writing and, more specifically, writing for half-hour comedies."

Traub, whose sister, Samantha, is a lawyer in Toronto, readily admits that she has had her share of disappointments and setbacks in Hollywood.

"Yes, it's been a hard slog, but worth it. The fact that it was difficult makes me better at my job. And the fact that I had a lot of crappy jobs makes me a better writer."

For Traub, the joy of seeing her work on television is always exhilarating. Yet, understandably, she feels crushed when one of her pilots fails or one of her shows is summarily cancelled.

After more than a decade in Lotus Land, she has reached the conclusion that a successful producer must be guided by a vision, should remain steadfastly committed to it and know when and how to make the right decisions.

"I just mean that it's good to have your own point of view and to stick to it," she said. "Not to let it get watered down, even if everyone wants to change your idea. If you don't stick to your vision, the thing that made it original and fresh will be gone.

"You need to know what you like and don't like so that you can decide which direction to take with the script. There is always more than one way to go, but you have to do what is right for yourself. Or what works in this or that circumstance. There really is no right or wrong, but you have to know what you want. That is really key."

Asked what projects she has in mind for the future, she said, "I'm pretty busy now, so nothing is in the works at the moment. All I can say is that I'm always looking to write things that are original and, hopefully, relatable. Probably a romantic comedy, or anything I get paid to write."

Traub, who admires such TV programs as The Office, Rescue Me, The Sopranos and What Not To Wear, has considered segueing into movies.

"I started in film and would like to get back to it one day. But the nice thing about television is that it's fast. You write, you shoot it, you see it on TV within a few months."

Traub, whose favourite films have been Cinema Paradiso, Manhattan, Rushmore and When Harry Met Sally, claims that movies are far more complicated than television.

"With film, the process is much longer. And often, the script never makes it to the screen. But if the opportunity is there, I would love to write a movie."

Sonny Goldstein, CFP

CARING FOR THE CHILDREN

Workers from the Municipality of Nahariya, inset, unload a shipment of toys from the Toys "R" Us warehouse in Shfayim on July 24. The toys, valued at 225,000 shekels, were donated by Canadian philanthropists Gerry Schwartz and Heather Reisman to the children of Nahariya and Shlomi, who are holed up in bomb shelters, much like the children of Kiryat Shmona, right. Schwartz and Reisman are the founders of the Heseg Foundation, which grants scholarships to lone soldiers in the IDF upon the completion of their military service, for studies at Israeli institutions of higher learning.

Maccabi Canada's new president rose from the ranks

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is, apparently, an avid jogger. Allen Gerskup can testify to the fact because the last time he met the senior Israeli leader – he was deputy prime minister at the time – Olmert asked for a replacement for the Maccabi Canada warm-up suit he had received as a gift years before when he served as mayor of Jerusalem.

On his return to Canada, Gerskup, at the time chair of Maccabi Canada's national athletic committee, complied, sending Olmert the same black and red outfit worn by Canadian athletes at last summer's Maccabiah Games.

Since that exchange, both Olmert and Gerskup have gone on to bigger and better – at least more stressful – things. Olmert succeeded Ariel Sharon as prime minister of Israel, and Gerskup succeeded Lawrence Hart as president of Maccabi Canada.

Tough to say at this particular moment who got the better of the deal but at his Toronto office recently, Gerskup outlined his strategy for steering through the difficulties and opportunities he faces as Maccabi Canada's new top leader.

Maccabi Canada is a successful grassroots organization with a respected pedigree in the community, he said, but for many in the Jewish community, it's an organization that is noticed only during the Maccabiah Games and in the months before.

As president, he would like to increase its profile in the community and to that end, he is considering hiring a full-time executive director. As it now stands, the organization relies on the input of volunteer lay people. Instead, "I'm trying to set up an organization that doesn't rely on one or two people, that doesn't pop its head up every four years and go into a hole for four years," he said.

Allen Gerskup

An executive director in a fully equipped office with contacts in the various regional offices – Vancouver, Winnipeg, Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto and with a good knowledge of the wider Jewish community, is essential, he said.

Putting in place the funds for that sort of office is now being addressed, but with the addition of Ned Goodman, chair of Goodman Private Wealth Management, as a Maccabi vice-president, Gerskup is confident the money can be found.

Gerskup, who served as national athletic committee chair for eight years and as a committee member for four years before that, outlined some of his ideas for his four-year stint as president. One is to recruit younger people who are more attuned to today's young athletes to leadership positions in the organization.

Another is to increase Canada's participation in regional games such as the European Maccabi Games in Rome next July and the Pan American contest in Buenos Aires six months later.

Gerskup also suggested that Maccabi Canada will continue to lend its advice and expertise to the Maccabi World Union (MWU), the umbrella organization that brings together international Maccabi movements and which organizes the Israel games.

He also pointed to the always important issue of raising money. Under Goodman's leadership he expected that to run smoothly, but he suggested masters athletes – those older than 35 who pay their own way to Israel for the Maccabiah Games – will likely be asked to contribute an additional sum to help underwrite the cost of sending elite athletes to Israel.

Assuming leadership of Maccabi Canada was not something he particularly campaigned for, Gerskup stated. He was ready to give up his position with the national athletic committee, and when it became clear Hart was not going to remain as president for a second term, he looked around the organization to see who might replace him.

With his extensive contacts within the Canadian organization and internationally, it turned out he was the natural candidate for the job. He received the support of former national president Roy Salomon of Montreal and senior officials Sid Greenberg and Gary Ulrich. He was elected in February.

Gerskup got his start with Maccabi Canada at the 1985 Games when he served as manager of the silver-medal-winning softball team. He's been to all the games since, but the highlight for him was in 2001. The intifadah was raging and there was a real question whether the Games would go ahead at all. In the end, the Games went ahead but with a reduced profile and Canada sent a smaller team than had been expected.

He's especially proud that the Canadian athletes, when consulted, agreed to be housed in Netanya even after a bomb went off and other teams turned their backs on the seaside city.

En route to the airport in Toronto, he asked the bowling, water polo and wrestling teams if they'd agree to be housed in Netanya and "they all agreed to go there."

The experience was wonderful and incident-free. "People appreciated that we were there," he said. The athletes soon found themselves receiving beer on the house from grateful restaurateurs.

"I was proud of the athletes and they were the first who said, yes, we will go," Gerskup recounted.

"Going to Israel in 2001 was to me the highlight [of my Maccabi career]," he said. "I think it gave the organization so much credibility, not just with MWU, but with the government of Israel."

Apparently the prime minister hasn't forgotten, and if he has, every time he goes jogging he's sure to be reminded.

CIBC donation aids JCC Maccabi Games

VANCOUVER — CIBC, one of Canada's largest banks, has donated $50,000 to the JCC Maccabi Games to support the Games' Days of Community Spirit program. In addition, many CIBC staffers have volunteered to assist in related projects.

The Days of Community Spirit, which is part of every JCC Maccabi Games, is a volunteer program in which young athletes join with local community organizations to work on various tzedakah projects. The Days of Community Spirit promotes community involvement, teamwork and pride in being Jewish. The purpose is to teach caring for others so that the athletes will incorporate these values into their daily lives once they return home.

"CIBC's long-standing relationship with the JCC [Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver] and their ongoing involvement and participation in the JCC's many endeavours, including the annual JCC Sports Dinner, has helped the centre raise the funds essential to its continued and expanding role in the local and general community," states a JCC Maccabi news release.

The JCC Maccabi Games run from Aug. 13 to 18 in Vancouver, one of three North American cities hosting the Olympic-style competitions. More than 1,200 athletes aged 13 to 16 from Canada, Israel, South America, the United States and Europe will compete in 12 sports. Including the other two venues, Stamford and Phoenix, an estimated 6,000 teens will participate, making the Games the largest organized sports program for Jewish teens in the world.

The truth, disengaged

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

New Views

The current crisis in the Middle East has united virtually the entire Israeli public and the Jewish Diaspora in support of Israel's operations against the Hezbollah in Lebanon. The basic message from the Israeli public these past few weeks has been, "We are going through a tough time, but we are united."

How soon things change. Just 12 months ago, Israel and world Jewry were in the midst of one of our worst internal struggles. The months leading up to the August 2005 implementation of the Sharon government's disengagement plan were an ugly time – pitting the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) against Israeli citizens, rabbinic authorities against the government, left against right. Disengagement was on everyone's lips, and the battle lines were clearly drawn.

For some, that intensity has begun to melt away, but others still seem to be suffering from disengagement-on-the-brain. Pro-right, anti-disengagement journalists remain intent on keeping the controversy at the forefront of Israeli and Jewish news. That in itself is no problem, but the tone adopted by some writers has often been ugly and irresponsible. Two recent examples:

• In a June website column, "The Taxi Driver," Jerusalem-based author Naomi Ragen told the story of a formerly high-ranking IDF official making a living driving a taxi after he was fired for refusing to serve in the disengagement. The story was topical and interesting, but Ragen concluded by saying that the driver's story had angered her to the point where she wanted to "punch somebody in the nose; somebody really high up; somebody fat, complacent, and careless." It left a bad taste in an otherwise worthy column.

• A June 23 story on the website of right-leaning Arutz Sheva (both these stories were reprinted in the Toronto Zionist Council's Israel and the Jewish World), reported that Israeli Defence Minster Amir Peretz had recommended government compensation for West Bank residents who agreed to leave their homes before the next stage of disengagement began. The story went on to quote Peretz: "He hopes to begin destroying Jewish communities within the next 18 months." Peretz never uttered that statement – he couldn't have – but Arutz Sheva still published it.

There is nothing wrong with an anti-disengagement stance, even a year after the end of the affair. The events of last August will remain etched in our minds for a long time and the pain of those who were evacuated should be retold. But the highly emotional nature of these storytellers has led to ugly, animalistic tendencies (a desire to punch the ailing former prime minister is clearly ugly), and a readiness to bend the truth (Israeli government officials never say they want to "destroy Jewish communities"). In the last 12 months, the right has proven time and again that it has no problem doing whatever it takes to make a point.

And now, with northern Israel under attack from Hezbollah, it is still trying to keep the Gaza disengagement on top of the news. On July 16, as rockets fell in Haifa, Safed and Tiberias, writer Rachel Saperstein questioned whether former Gush Katif residents should accept their military responsibilities to fight Hezbollah. She quoted a close friend who refused to serve in the current crisis, who said: "You destroyed my home… You destroyed my life. And now you want me to fight for you?"

It was another predictable shot from the right. These days, it seems as if they'll take any opportunity to talk about their plight and perceived unfair treatment.

Twelve months later, none of us expect the pain to be gone, but the responsibility to remain honest, fair and considerate never goes away. These writers have failed to uphold their responsibility. For them, honesty and integrity matter little when the occasion to make a point arrives.

SOLELIM DAMAGED BY STORM: All 139 campers and 37 staff at Canadian Young Judaea's Camp Solelim in Sudbury were evacuated to dorm rooms at Laurentian University after a severe storm on July 17. About 30 to 40 large trees fell, and eight tents were demolished, said camp director Risa Epstein, who praised the Red Cross, local police, local transit, neighbours and camp staff for taking care of the teenage campers and helping to get the camp up and running again within two days.

Can Diaspora Jews really get it?

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

I was sitting on the shores of Lake Muskoka, my eyes closed and my head tilted toward the sun. Images passed through my mind of 19-year old Israeli soldiers dying in the war and the citizens of northern Israeli cities and towns who have been killed.

I swam out into the shallow warm waters and considered the carnage in Lebanon and the innocent families suffering from a war they do not want and cannot control. Then I dove underwater and tried to reach a nearby buoy some 50 metres away.

As a Diaspora Jew, am I truly aware of the depth of the suffering going on in Israel?

The following is an e-mail that I received from a friend in central Israel. It's not edited. It reflects his angst, and it asked the question that I asked myself on the shores of Lake Muskoka.

My chaver writes: "Do you people have any idea of what's going on over here? There are people dying daily from Katyushas. Main cities – Haifa, Safed, Zichron Yaacov, Tiberias. It's mighty scary.

"The draft is back in place. My sister-in-law's husband was just called up to the front line. They've been married only about a year. He's 40. Those guys have no mercy on who they call in. She's devastated – worried like anything. I'm interested in hearing how things look from your side. Someone at my wife's work, her 21-year-old son was just killed.

"Iran is stuffing Lebanon with bombs. We're probably not even making a dent in things. You should tell the folks around to say some prayers. It's very serious here.

"One hundred and sixty bombs fell into Israel on Shabbos alone. One hundred and sixty bombs. In one day. One fell on a building in Safed and flattened it. Our neighbour's brother was in it. There's no one here that isn't worried. Do you people have any idea of what's going on over here?"

Suffice it to say, my friend, that you, an Israeli Jew, are on the front lines and we in the Diaspora are the support team. Your raw anger is not difficult to understand, and I respect you and encourage you in challenging us: do we have any idea what's going on over there?

In truth, it's impossible for us to know what's going on, certainly not to the extent that you do. Unlike you, we never made aliyah and, therefore, do not wake up to the eerie sounds of air raid sirens or instructions to run down to bomb shelters as the rockets fall.

Please remember, however, that the Israel-Diaspora relationship is strong and important. We need each other and benefit greatly from each other's ingenuity and networks. So, ask away. Test us. Force us to feel and think so that we will be compelled to act – be it through aliyah, prayer or simply buying a piece of pizza for a soldier on the front (as suggested in a unique offer on an Israeli newspaper's website).

Keep on writing your eyewitness reports and know that many Diaspora Jews are walking around with heads down, saddened, worried and unable to enjoy their day because of the suffering of Jews and other good people.

Yes, there is an imbalance here, one that is age-old, but you are not alone. You are our witness to the horror and we are, therefore, indebted to you for safeguarding the Jewish people, once again. But remember, too, that the threats you are all too familiar with are also reaching the Diaspora.

We send our good wishes to your family, and to the family at your wife's office. We pray that the war and terrorism should end, and that security and shalom should be ours.

A Community of Caring

Mount Sinai Hospital is made up of dedicated clinicians, researchers, nurses, staff and volunteers and we are proud to be an integral part of the community. Events allow you to get involved in the Hospital while providing much-needed funds for patient programs and services.

Please join us at our two new upcoming events!

Works of heart

fine art auction and dinner

Join us for a fine art auction and dinner, featuring exquisite works from well-known artists including Tony Scherman, Charles Pachter and Group of Seven member Franz Hans Johnston, also known as Frank Johnston. Limited editions by Cathy Daley, James Lahey and Micah Lexier are also available for sale.

Works of Heart, championed by Honourary Chair Rosalie Sharp, Co-Chairs Michael Bregman and Jeffrey Rosenthal and Art Chair Lisa Draper, is a way for big hearts like yours to support the small hearts of our most fragile patients.

Funds raised will support care and research in the Neonatal Intensive Care Units at Mount Sinai Hospital in Toronto and Shaare Zedek Medical Centre in Jerusalem.

Please join us on Tuesday, September 26 at the Royal Ontario Museum.

Behind Closed Doors

Imagine yourself, in a beautiful home, marveling over a collection of remarkable paintings. Or imagine your thrill to view sculptures normally hidden in corporate offices. Now your dreams to enjoy collections usually behind closed doors are possible for one day only. You can have a personal invitation to see some of the city's most revered collections in magnificent homes and affluent businesses at Behind Closed Doors: An Entrée to Private Collections.

Funds raised from the event will enable the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre at Mount Sinai Hospital to continue to meet the ever-growing needs of those who depend on its services.

The world is coming to the 13th Annual Krinos Taste of the Danforth! This year "The Krinos Taste" is featuring wines of the world, music from around the globe, and — as always — the chance to sample the best of the Danforth's eclectic restaurants. From August 11th through the 13th, the Danforth will be closed to traffic from Broadview to Jones, as visitors take part in the largest Greek festival in North America.

"The Krinos Taste of the Danforth has become one of Toronto's signature events, attracting a million visitors, including tourists from Europe, the U.S. and across Canada," says Chris Trahiotis, Chair of the event and owner of Ouzeri. "The restaurants and other merchants along the Danforth are proud to welcome you to our businesses and to our neighbourhood, and we promise you the world."

They are also proud that over 12 years of support, the Krinos Taste of the Danforth has raised over $3/4 million for the Toronto East General Hospital! This year, the Toronto East General Hospital will unveil a plaque celebrating the naming of the Special Care Nursery. Alex Alexakis, General Manager of Krinos Foods Canada comments, "This plaque is a reminder of what a community can achieve when it works together."

New this year is the Philippe Dandurand wine garden, featuring 28 different wines. The Skyy Vodka Martini Lounge, and beer gardens featuring Amstel Light and Heineken (the two most popular beers in Greece) round out opportunities to sample a truly cosmopolitan selection of beverages.

The Krinos Taste of the Danforth features entertainment on the ScotiaBank Stage, including Flamenco, Cuban and of course, Greek performers. Throughout the weekend, the Greek Stage will feature more talented Greek performers. In addition to music, visitors can try their hand at rock climbing and various sports, or spend time in some cool activities. Win tickets to the hottest concerts with Pepsi Access. Sample Clodhoppers while browsing music in the Jam Van. Experience a close shave with the Gillette "Start the Reaction Tour", or get yourself out of jail with Bell Mobility. Visitors can also call anywhere in the world, courtesy of Vonage.

When it comes to food, this year's Krinos Taste of the Danforth is offering up over 85 tasting tables. Also back this year is the popular "Healthy Eating" area, featuring special products, helpful seminars, and advice to help you "Eat Right, Live Long".

"The Krinos Taste of the Danforth marks what's best in food, including the exceptionally healthy Mediterranean diet," says Alex Alexakis, General Manager of Krinos Foods Canada. "From the benefits of quality olive oil to the wonderful taste of Greek olives, you can find it all at the Krinos Taste of the Danforth".

There's no substitute for freshness. In seven short years, Ampeli has drawn the kind of rave reviews restaurants covet, and now belongs to that select group of restaurants that keep loyal clients coming back for more. Discerning diners (including Saul Korman, among others) seek out Ampeli for the kind of attention to detail and fresh-from-scratch taste that are intrinsic to any authentic Greek dining experience.

George, the manager, attributes this success to a simple formula: use the freshest, highest-quality ingredients, lightly seasoned and prepared simply. Everything's cooked to order, meaning you have to wait a little longer for your meal to arrive; but the wait is more than worth it.

Meat and fish are always fresh, never frozen, and Ampeli has become renowned for both. The rack of lamb and Ontario lamb chops are both first-rate, and the fresh fish is so popular customers usually specify, when making reservations, which type of fish they want. Red snapper, porgy, codfish, smelts, whiting — if it's just been caught, you'll find it on Ampeli's table the same day.

For George this means more legwork, combing the market for the freshest catch of the day. "This isn't an option," he notes. "It's an obligation to our customers."

Warm ciabatta bread accompanies every meal with a side of olive oil and balsamic vinegar. Fresh pasta is handmade on the premises, and all sauces are à la minute.

Ampeli's distinctive red brick exterior and huge patios, complete with bright flowers, are a welcome sight for anyone seeking Greek and Mediterranean cuisine as it's meant to taste.

> "... Only at Ampeli did we meet moist, tender, roast Ontario lamb. Ditto the moussaka experience .... at Ampeli the moussaka was marvellously fragrant, full of rich flavours. Roasted mashed eggplant dip is zinged with fresh mint, and marinated octopus is tender with a lovely vinegar bite. Meaty little quails have been marinated for tenderness and are cooked just so, and the grilled fresh porgy is a paragon of Piscean virtue, with especially crisp skin."

Christina's: star quality on every level

For truly authentic, upscale Greek cuisine, live entertainment and star quality, no restaurant shines as brightly as the effervescent Christina's. Though it continues to move with the times, with its sprightly updated decor, sparkling new menu, and year-round heated patio, Christina's has remained the hub of GreekTown activity by relying on a time-honoured formula: fresh, homemade Greek recipes, prepared lovingly, one meal at a time.

Two other things that haven't changed are Christina's friendly service and its magnetic appeal to the silver screen set. If that really is Robert De Niro seated next to you — or Bette Midler, or Jim Carey — it doesn't necessarily mean that you're on camera. It simply means that they share your good taste in Greek cuisine.

The portions are spectacular, the preparation refined. There's a difference between being full and being fully satisfied; Christina's chefs grasp this distinction across the full spectrum of the menu, hence Christina's continuing popularity among young and old alike.

Christina's is ideally suited for intimate private functions such as Bar / Bat Mitzvah parties, graduations, birthdays, and sweet 16s, and does a brisk business in special event catering.

If you're a lamb lover, Christina's leg of lamb, rack of lamb, and lamb chops are legendary. Other delights include Stuffed Chicken Breast, Mediterranean Seafood Platter, Moussaka (both traditional and vegetarian), and tender Kalamari, both grilled and fried. Hearty combination platters featuring your favourite dips, meat, and seafood items go down smoothly with a glass of ouzo or wine from Christina's vast Greek and international selection. Fish and seafood are delivered fresh daily, so ask for the catch of the day when you're reviewing the menu.

Live entertainment on weekends includes belly dancing and a two-piece (bouzouki and guitar) Greek band playing a blend of old and modern Greek tunes. There's nothing like a rendering of Never On Sunday or Zorba The Greek to tug at your heartstrings and whet your Greek appetite.

Thuna Herbals' past a beacon for future

It's a delightful anachronism reminiscent of an old English apothecary shop. Fifteen hundred glass jars, each filled with a different herb or root, stacked high in orderly rows. The original creaking hardwood floor. And a proprietor who's all about knowledge and caring.

Established in 1888 (how's that for history?), this family business is now run by Evelyn Dorfman, the granddaughter of founder Dr. Max Harriman Thuna, and a staff of qualified herbalists on the original turn-of-the-century premises at 298 Danforth Avenue.

Over the years, the Thuna family has seen the use of herbal remedies — once the de facto method of treatment for most medical problems — lose ground to the synthetic drugs that have flooded the marketplace.

More recently, however, the pendulum has slowly but surely begun to swing back, as more and more people seek alternatives to mainstream medicine. Thuna's doesn't diagnose problems presented to them; rather, they advise customers seeking a diagnosis to obtain it from their medical practitioners. Some come with the blessing of their GP, but many are referred by naturopathic practitioners. Typically, clients come in on their own initiative.

Saul Pasen helped pioneer herbalism in Canada

THUNA HERBALS

Drawing on their schooling, Dorfman and staff choose from some 2,000 herbs, berries, roots, and leaves the precise combination most likely to alleviate an ailment presented to them. To cite but one example, a formula for bladder infection, or even interstitial cystitis, might include uva-ursi leaves, buchu leaves, parsley leaves, marshmallow root, corn silk, and goldenseal leaves.

Dr. Thuna and his children, including son-in-law Saul Pasen, pictured above, helped pioneer herbalism in Canada.

The current premises stand as a rich reminder of Canadian history. Even if you have only a passing interest in herbalism, you owe it to yourself to visit this Toronto landmark. And who knows — by asking a few questions, you might become further enlightened on this ancient practice.

Home cooking lives at Kalyvia

Think of the best home-cooked meals you've ever tasted. Probably they were (or still are) your mother's. Maybe your grandmother's. Sitting down at that dinner table was one of the most pleasurable experiences you've ever had.

That's the kind of homemade taste you can expect at Kalyvia, served up in gargantuan portions worthy of any doting mother.

This is particularly true of the combination platters (poikilias) of seafood and meat, priced from $25.95, which are so big you need a road map just to get around them. Teeming with a variety of Greek specialties, these platters are more than just food ... they're a symbol of the bountiful GreekTown dining experience.

If you're a fish and seafood lover, you can cut your travel time to Greece by about 14 hours. Try the garides (shrimps sauteed in white wine sauce) or the salmon steaks topped with Kalyvia's own homemade lemon sauce, which also garnishes the broiled Red Snapper. Like everything else at Kalyvia, all the dips and sauces are made fresh daily from scratch.

How much better does this taste than prepared food? It's like comparing your mother's cooking to fast food: no comparison.

KALYVIA

WWW.KALYVIA.COM

Founders Mike and Peter Tsafatinos are both from the Greek town of Kalyvia; when you name your restaurant after your home town, you've got a culinary legacy to live up to. These lofty standards for quality and freshness have earned Kalyvia a four-star rating from Toronto by Night Journal.

While Kalyvia's cuisine is authentically Greek, it's a family place that caters to appetites of all ages. Kalyvia's Makaronada (Greek-style spaghetti), available in a variety of entrées and as a side alternative to rice or potatoes, will appeal to the kids, and it's a fun way to introduce them to Greek cuisine.

The Tsafatinos' sons Jim and Jim, and a host of other family members, ensure that each and every dish emerges from the kitchen brimming with the homemade taste their customers expect.

Kalyvia's homemade goodness can be enjoyed on the premises, or in the privacy of your home or office. Large enough for substantial gatherings, but configured for intimacy, Kalyvia is ideal for birthday parties, Bar Mitzvah parties, and other special events.

Kalyvia is one of a very few places in Toronto where you can still enjoy the tastes and trappings of home in a family restaurant environment. It has "Mom" written all over it.

For Astoria, the future of Greek dining is now

Think "Danforth", and you're liable to think "Astoria." For over 30 years, this venerable "institution of higher dining" has come to symbolize the culinary qualities the Danforth is known for: great food, great quality, and great value.

If it shone before, now it positively sparkles

Astoria recently underwent a major renovation that has seen it emerge brighter and roomier than ever. If it shone before, now it positively sparkles. A nouveau rustic take on traditional Greek motifs unfurls in rich golds and maroons, with elegant tile underfoot and soaring sky blue overhead.

Company Director Peter Kerasiotis undertook the renovation with a view to embracing the needs and tastes of a new generation of diners while remaining mindful of Astoria's long-standing clientele. "Many of our original guests are still regulars three decades later," he notes. "They rely on us for their family outings and special occasions, and it's their loyalty that has allowed us to grow. The renovation of our GreekTown restaurant and the opening of our new location in Mississauga were both slow, painstaking processes, but we wanted to ensure that in doing so we maintained our standards. The idea was to build on and enhance the Astoria brand, not dilute it. That is something our customers would never have accepted."

The feedback on both fronts, says Kerasiotis, has been overwhelmingly positive. The essentials — freshness, quality, and friendly personal service — are still unfailingly apparent at both locations. Astoria still imports staples such as feta cheese, olive oil and olives in small quantities directly from Greece. Their staggering portions still quell the most outrageous appetites.

Astoria's now-famous "souvlaki window", always a beehive of activity, is an indelible image of Danforth life. And what souvlaki! Judged "Best of the City" by Toronto Life and "Best of Toronto" by Now, Astoria's souvlaki helped make it a multiple winner of the Toronto Sun's Readers' Choice Award as Toronto's favourite Greek restaurant. Astoria was also rated "Best Greek International Restaurant" by Where.

Other jewels on the menu include hearty moussaka, exquisite grilled sea bass and salmon steaks — and Greek appetizers like grilled calamari and creamy homemade tzatziki, if you can keep your souvlaki craving at bay long enough to sample them.

Freshness, quality and personal service still rule

Location and atmosphere are other Astoria assets. For a big restaurant, it's remarkably cozy, due to its corner location and dual outdoor patios (still the Danforth's largest, and now among its brightest as well!)

It's no accident that the first signs of an upcurve in the popularity of Greek cuisine coincided with Astoria's opening, nor is it coincidental that its continued growth in popularity parallels that of the Astoria we know today.

Heading eastbound on Bloor, you know you're on the Danforth once you hit Broadview; but you don't really feel it until Astoria leaps joyously into view, bidding you "Welcome to GreekTown" in words that the food lover in you understands so well.

Pan's innovations come from the source

If you really believe there's nothing new under the sun — and nothing new in Mediterranean cuisine — a visit to Pan On The Danforth will alter your belief system considerably.

The great taste that has earned Pan accolades as "one of the city's best" Greek restaurants (Toronto Life) isn't new. What is new are some compelling additions to the menu courtesy of Nikos Stamatiou, Pan's new chef from Greece who has taken an already innovative menu to unprecedented new gastronomic heights.

Though owners Chris and Soula Christodolou and son Giorgio are the face of Pan, "a restaurant's soul resides in its kitchen," says Chris. "If your cooking isn't inspired, your customers won't be either. Your mother was probably the "superstar" of her kitchen, and we rely on our head chef to play that role in ours," says Christodolou. "He needs to bring his "A" game every day." (Based on a recent sampling of Stamatiou's work, the liberal sprinkling of show business personalities among Pan's clientele have reason to be concerned that he's stealing their thunder).

Stamatiou's "A game" includes some virtuoso dishes:

- Yuvetsi. Oven-baked lamb pie with fresh herbs and spices and three cheeses, served with orzo pasta;
- Lithrini Me Alati. Salt-encrusted red snapper, baked crisp on the outside, sealing the moisture, juices and flavour inside;
- Karapes. Think the French have a monopoly on crêpes? Think again. This delightful Greek interpretation is served as either an entrée or dessert with a variety of fillings. Among the dessert offerings, the lemon custard filling is tart and delicious, the strawberry tangy, both exquisitely understated and without the cloying sweetness we dislike.

Some things never change here, like the quality of the dips (still unparalleled on the Danforth for taste and presentation), the warm personal service of a true family business, and the feeling you've gotten value for your dining dollar. For lunch, dinner and intimate events, Pan has everything we could wish for in a cozy, intimate dining environment.

Pantheon synonymous with fresh fish

The Olympic Pantheon was blessed with the opportunity to taste the Ambrosia and Nectar of the Gods. The Olympics happen every four years, but at Pantheon, in the heart of GreekTown, you can indulge in those same taste sensations whenever the mood strikes you.

In nine short years of operation, Pantheon has earned a city-wide reputation for fresh fish. So extensive is the selection — and so impeccable the preparation — that the name "Pantheon" has become synonymous with superb fish and seafood.

In addition to the popular varieties of fish you'd expect from a Greek restaurant, like red snapper, atlantic salmon and sea bass, Pantheon's spectacular selection includes many you wouldn't expect (like baby sea smelts and fresh anchovies imported directly from Greece), plus striped bass, orange roughy, black porgy, red mullet, sea smelts, and many others. Chef Nick Paroussis — who, with partner John Troupis, pilots the ship — understands the subtleties of each fish and knows how to bring out its full flavour.

Another thing that sets Pantheon apart is continuity. Unbelievably, in a business where turnover is the norm, Pantheon has kept the same head chef and most of the same wait staff for its full nine years of operation. That means three things:

1. People like working here;
2. They like the clientele;
3. The clientele likes them, showing a loyalty that is clearly reciprocated. For, just as you enjoy seeing the same familiar faces, they enjoy seeing you, and the stellar service for which Pantheon is known is a reflection of that mutual affection and respect.

Exemplifying this continuity is the presence of Bobby Troupis, John's son, to whom John is slowly but surely passing the torch while transmitting a wealth of culinary expertise.

Mouthwatering homemade desserts are another Pantheon trademark. The traditional baklava is at its flaky best here, the homemade Greek honey cake "as golden and desirable as an Olympic medal" (Toronto Star). But in our opinion it's the homemade walnut cake that steals the show.

Sun Valley more than brand names

If you value quality, hate spending hours schlepping through giant faceless supermarkets, and need more than the corner grocery store can offer, Sun Valley Fine Foods is tailor-made for you.

Larger than the typical neighbourhood European food store, yet small enough to navigate your way through quickly, Sun Valley is boutique food shopping at its very finest. Just about every sought-after brand name is here, from gourmet grocery items to breads, cakes and pastries. The produce is spectacular; the meat, fish and poultry are perfection itself.

Sun Valley Fine Foods
583 Danforth Ave.
416•469•5227
www.sunvalleyfinefoods.com
Open to 9 p.m. 7 days • Delivery available

But Sun Valley is more than just brand names and quality. It's about finding exactly what you need for your family and special occasion dining with efficient, friendly personal service.

It's these attributes which keep customers coming back — not only the locals, but shoppers from North York, Thornhill, and even Richmond Hill, often armed with the temperature-controlled bags that have become standard equipment among shoppers willing to go the extra mile for the very best.

People come from outside GreekTown to shop Sun Valley "for the same reasons they patronize the restaurants," says partner Spiro Aravantinos: "quality, freshness, flavour, and value."

Ah yes, value. What Aravantinos doesn't mention — but what's obvious from a quick tour of Sun Valley — is that they've resisted "snob appeal". In true GreekTown spirit, they've kept their prices affordable even as their reputation has continued to grow.

The bottom line is that under this one roof you'll find exactly what you want in less time — yet at a more leisurely pace — than in the "big box" supermarkets. And, if you're a husband who'se been "commissioned" to bring home the groceries, your chances of getting a glowing report card on arrival are better here than just about anywhere else.

The reason is simple: Sun Valley just doesn't sell anything that won't get the spousal seal of approval — no matter how hard that may be to come by in your household.

Historical flavours come alive at Messini

When visiting most websites, you're tempted to "Skip Intro" as prompted. You want to get to the heart of the matter ASAP.

Visit Messini's website, however, and you'll find yourself engrossed in the historical introduction; at Messini, history is at the heart of the matter.

A sequence of richly-textured, sepia-toned photographs of the southern Greek village of Messini, circa 1930, set the historical stage for the taste treat you'll experience at 445 Danforth.

After 23 years of restauranteuring in Europe, owner Marinos Dafnas opened Messini with the singular goal of elevating gyros preparation to the lofty level it enjoys in Greece. If you know gyros only as meat on a pita, Messini will open your eyes — and your taste buds — to an exciting new dining experience.

- Meticulous preparation. Roasted to perfection on a spit, the gyros (pronounced yee'-ros, from Modern Green guros, "turning") combines the finest marinated cuts of moist and dry meat to ensure that it retains its juiciness and tenderness throughout the cooking process. Unlike your typical fast-food gyros, Messini's are prepared fresh from scratch: no freezing, no precooking;
- Quality and freshness of trimmings. The tzatziki, red onions, parsely, spices, and French fries (as per Greek tradition), like the meat, are all up-to-the-minute fresh;
- Pita made fresh daily on the premises. As with any fresh homemade bread vs. mass-produced, there's simply no comparison.
- Variety. Messini caters to a wide range of palates and dietary preferences by offering chicken and vegetarian gyros in addition to the traditional meat.

MESSINI AUTHENTIC GYROS
445 DANFORTH
416-778-4861
WWW.MESSINI.CA

The result: a whole that's greater than the sum of its parts — a sandwich that melts in your mouth with a rich blend of subtly interwoven flavours.

The prices are more than reasonable, with gyros dinner entrées starting from $8.25, lunch specials from $6.50. The menu also includes mainstream Greek selections, but you'll do yourself a disservice if you don't at least try the gyros.

Messini's immaculate interior flanks an open kitchen. Pleasant brown and cream tones — gleaming ceramic tile floor, rich wood trim and comfortable seating — create an aura of casual dining elegance.

The beaches of Peloponessos may seem far away, but at Messini, some of southern Greece's best tradition and culture is right here for the sampling.

Big Carrot's major expansion means 40 percent more to love

When The Big Carrot expanded in 2002 by leasing space across the courtyard for its dispensary, customers smiled. When it grew again in 2004 by annexing an adjacent retail space, those same customers grinned even wider. Now they're positively giddy. Why? Because the latest expansion, now in progress, will see The Big Carrot's floor space grow by a full 40%. That means that Toronto's best selection of natural, organic, and GMO-free products just got larger.

Organic, GMO-free, Kosher-certified products

In practical terms, the expansion means larger produce and bulk departments featuring new, state-of-the-art dispensers; more cash desks; and three express lanes to ease congestion at the checkouts. The store entrance will have wider automatic doors. There will be a new separate nutritionist area for private consultation. The body-care department will be spacious and sunny, offering new rejuvenating products. The vegetarian deli will provide more seating and the meat department will get a facelift. The fridge and freezer department will also be expanded to meet the ongoing demand for more frozen natural convenience foods.

The entire three-stage process is slated for completion in mid-September, but you can already see and enjoy the roomier new environs and larger selection. And with newly extended hours to be introduced in September, you'll also have more time to enjoy the experience.

The Big Carrot has remained the leader in an increasingly crowded field by offering products that are as good for the environment as they are for its customers, and by providing a level of expertise and personal service unmatched in the industry. From humble beginnings in 1983, it had already grown, prior to the latest expansion, into metropolitan Toronto's largest Canadian-owned purveyor of products for healthy living.

Run as a worker owned co-op, The Big Carrot caters to a loyal clientele that embraces both its ethos and its products: minimally processed, organically grown, cruelty free, environmentally safe and, increasingly, GMO-free. Many of these products are also Kosher-certified.

The Big Carrot is really three stores in one: a health food store and market, a wholistic dispensary, and an organic juice, coffee and sandwich bar.

Health-conscious customers seek out The Big Carrot for its extensive organic fruit and vegetable department (over 100 varieties at peak season) and its unmatched selection of organic bulk foods, dairy products, frozen foods, and packaged goods. Its extensive body care department boasts Canada's widest selection of personal care products for the entire family, including baby.

The Big Carrot's well-versed staff can help you decide which products will suit your dietary needs and your palate. If it's wheat-free — if it's dairy-free — if it's simply good for you, The Big Carrot has it.

For natural and organic pastas, breads, buns, bagels, flatbreads, cookies, müffins, and other wholesome noshery, no other store — or bakery, for that matter — even comes close. There are literally dozens of choices here, many of them wheat-free, dairy-free, Kosher-certified — or a combination thereof. The Big Carrot has by far Toronto's largest selection of soy milks and other non-dairy beverages, both fresh and tetra pack.

Among many others, the Kosher-certified products include Crofters Organic Premium Fruit Spreads from Ontario; tomato products from Utopia, also Ontario-grown; Imagine Foods Tetra Pack Dairy-Free Soups (the ultimate in convenience); Nature's Path Organic Cereals; Organic Meadow Yogurts & Pressed Cheese; Cold Mountain Miso; Soy Delicious Non-Dairy Frozen Desserts; selected products from Eden Foods; Kemach Organic Spelt Matzah; and an immense variety of chips and other snack foods. And, coming soon, Strub's Organic Pickles.

The Big Carrot carries a tremendous variety of healthy desserts and sweets. Made-in-Israel Kosher-certified products include Tropical Source chocolate bars and Beit Yitchak jams. Sunflower Kitchen dips, pesto and soups are popular mainstays, as are Bob's Red Mill packaged grains, cereals and baking goods; the Big Carrot stocks both in abundance.

The Deli counter offers more than 50 mouth-watering selections, both hot and cold. From the Organic Lentil Daal to the Organic Couscous Salad, every item is a taste and visual treat. It also offers a selection of sinfully delicious desserts without the sin, since they're free of refined ingredients.

Toronto's only 100% organic juice bar

The Big Carrot's juice bar is the only one in Toronto that's 100% organic. There are over 50 choices of juices, blender drinks, nutritional boosts, shakes, and fair-trade organic coffees, as well as sandwiches and other treats.

Among the sandwiches, try the Grilled Tempeh, lettuce, tomato, red onion & honey mustard mayo. Fresh, delicious and wholesome — just as Nature intended.

For a summer treat, enjoy Mapleton's organic ice cream, as well as Cool Hemp, a Kosher-certified, organic non-dairy dessert available in a cup or wholesome organic cone.

Through its ongoing expansion, The Big Carrot has retained the humility and friendliness of its early years. This is a store that's down to earth in every possible sense, and a real pleasure to visit. It's an oasis of calm amid the chaos of everyday life. A visit here isn't just grocery, supplement and cosmetics shopping; it's a balm to the spirit.

Fifty-six years of expertis

He's crazy like a fox, that Saul Korman. All these years he's been pulling the wool over our eyes. Even if it is the purest virgin wool from the finest Italian mills, and even if the Boss and Canali garments it graces keep us looking like menchen through thick and thin. Saul Korman has still gotten over on us.

All these years, he's been extolling the virtues of Korry's expertise. Well okay, that much is true. He's been preaching value. Okay, also true — how can you argue with cutting-edge retail prices coupled with tailor-shop service? And through it all, of course, he's been ranting about GreekTown. The food. The shopping. The atmosphere. The colour. Well, okay...as a final concession point, it can't be denied that Korry's is the epicentre of the city's finest mix of restaurants and eclectic retail shops. And the fact that he reminds us of it 30 times a day or so by no means invalidates that declaration.

Cutting-edge retail prices with tailor shop service

No, it's his experience claims we take issue with. His statement that Korry's has 56 years of experience with which to outfit you better is fraught with inaccuracy.

Fifty-six years...are you kidding? Two hundred years is more like it.

For most, a half century is a milestone of longevity. For Korry's, it's just a forspeis. Saul Korman, 56 years in the menswear trade. Franco Gagliardi, 35 years. Jerry Baker, 52 years. Michael Korman, 24 years. Frank Smith, 32 years. That's over 200 years right there, and we haven't even gotten into the tailor shop, where Rudy and the boys are good for another 200 years or so. For a guy known for occasional overstatement, Korman's 56-year mantra is the understatement of the century. "To those of us who have to listen to him every day," winks wife Myrna, "it seems like 400."

So how does a menswear institution grow its business and continue to gather steam after 56 years?

First and foremost, by attending to its customers' needs. From Korman to the last man in the tailor shop, all the staff's energies are focused on making you look your very best. "One thing I absolutely will not tolerate," says Korman, "is people twiddling their thumbs. There is always work to be done, whether it's giving someone your personal attention, following up an order, or making sure every garment hangs perfectly at 7:30 a.m. when you're alone in the shop. I love my staff and we all take breaks, including me, but when you're between the white lines, you've gotta perform."

Are you listening, Gibbons, Pinball, Maurice and Mitchell?

One of Korman's most endearing qualities is his spontaneity, both on the floor and on the air. His gravelly rasp is eminently listenable compared to the annoying sameness of corporate drivel that pollutes the airwaves. Korman doesn't have scripts; he wings it every time he goes on air. Love him or hate him, you have to respect him for going live. If you haven't actually been to Korry's, and know him only as a voice on the radio, you might be surprised at how many people love him. That his fellow merchants do goes without saying, since he tirelessly promotes them — and GreekTown — on his dime. But his shoot-from-the-hip style has also grown on his contemporaries, his colleagues, and the general public alike. Brother Jack, for years a sibling rival in the menswear trade with his own highly successful shop, recently attended Korry's annual charitable golf tournament and remarked, "I couldn't believe the amount of goodwill he's created. He's respected by so many people. I'm proud of him."

The Danforth is so successful, says Korman, is that it creates a scenario wherein giving is not only easy, it's un. "Where else can you enjoy such great food and such great entertainment, period?" he exclaims. "Even without the charity it'd be a slam dunk. With the charity, it's an absolute no-brainer. Doing business during that weekend is the last of our concerns. In our BIA meetings, we talk about how we can make the event work, not about how much business we can do. For those three days, making the event work is our business."

It's easy to be passionate about an event like the Krinos Taste of the Danforth, as well as Korry's regular in-store events, such as an upcoming trunk show featuring a free-for-a-week Mercedes draw. For Korman, however, every day at Korry's is an event fuelled by his passion for the menswear trade and his love of people. Further spiking his enthusiasm is the fact that, more than ever, men are dressing to look their best. "Schlepping was never "in", says Korman, "but with the influence of television, well-dressed men are constantly on display. Both men and women see on a daily basis how good they can look, even in a casual office environment."

Even so, he continues, "We're seeing more freedom of choice than ever before, in terms of both styling and colour selection. Pink, lime green, orange, rust, you name it, it's all good now", he notes, "but the colours have to be coordinated and the look has to be crisp. The selection of golf wear has just exploded. More and more men are entertaining clients on the golf course, and it's just as important to look sharp there as in a business meeting — maybe more important. If you're concerned about how your suit looks in a half-hour presentation, you'd better be aware of how you present yourself on the golf course, when your customer has five hours to size you up." Whether you need golf wear or a jacket and tie — whether you spend a few hundred dollars or a few thousand — Korry's has the expertise to make you look like a million.

Wives and girlfriends are now front and centre in the menswear shopping process, and their opinions carry weight. According to a recent informal survey of Korry's clientele, nine of ten women don't fully trust their partner's buying instincts. (The other woman was lying).

Increasingly, these trusted female advisors are taking advantage of Korry's exquisite custom tailoring service to have suits, blazers, skirts and pants made up for themselves. "All the luxurious fabrics available to the men are available to women as well," says Korman. "Why waste all that great fashion sense on the guys?"

Boardroom or golf course, appearance counts

Back on the menswear front, Boss, Canali, and Pal Zileri continue to set the pace, with black and navy the strongest colours. Coming on strong is Arnold Brant with a new exquisitely-textured line of jackets. Woven entirely from bamboo, they offer a cashmere feel with superb breathability and shape retention.

Shirts have always been a cornerstone of Korry's business, never more so than today. The selection is spectacular, from conventional and French cuffed dress shirts with scads of matching cufflinks, to the full spectrum of sports shirts and golf shirts.

Sharing Korman's ongoing quest for excellence is his son Michael, who Saul is grooming to eventually take over the business whenever — if ever — he decides to retire. "My dad is like Old Man River," says Michael. "He just keeps going. Why shouldn't he? This is what he loves."

Speaking of rivers, Mark Twain once referred to the Mississippi as a "wonderful book [with] a new story to tell every day." As a new chapter in the Korry's saga unfolds, two generations of Kormans do what comes naturally: clothe their customers and go with the flow.

Dine like royalty...

Others may treat you like royalty; here, you are royalty. Serving you is not our first priority, it's our only priority.

If you haven't yet been to our cozy little kingdom, ask someone who has.

Ask them how they enjoyed our Hot Mezze Platter (Kalamari, Grilled Octopus, Loukaniko, and Bifteki). Perhaps they'll tell you they were so captivated by it, they forgot it was "just" an appetizer.

Ask them if the the Avgolemono soup was delicate enough, or the Greek salad crisp enough.

Ask them if the Lamb Kleftiko's divine combination of lamb, feta, sweet bell peppers, onions and mushrooms wasn't simply the most exquisite thing they'd ever tasted...

... until the Red Snapper arrived at their table. (Ask them if they enjoyed the salt spray on our boat that morning. After all, fresh-caught means fresh-caught).

Ask them if the assortment of homemade desserts they inhaled was truly the crowning glory.

And don't forget to ask them about the incredible birthday party they threw for Moishe in our private party room.

But no need to ask them if you can borrow their crown. Yours is waiting for you at reception.

Sher-E-Punjab: pioneer still reigns

The recent explosion in popularity of East Indian cuisine has seen items like samosas and pakoras offered as fast food on a growing number of menus — even those of some mainstream restaurants.

For the true connoisseur of this genre, however — for the perfectionist who insists that each dish, each item be prepared slowly, lovingly, one by one — there's still only one place that unfailingly fulfills these expectations.

SHER-E-PUNJAB RESTAURANT
351 Danforth Avenue
West of Chester subway
416-465-2125

The soulful strains of the sitar greet you as you enter. The deep, rich earth tones of Indian slate tile — reddish brown, copper, a hint of gold — are exotic, yet peaceful. Magnificent tapestries, hand-woven in Rajastan, adorn the butternut-yellow walls.

You're not even seated yet, and already you've begun to experience the tranquility that is Sher-E-Punjab.

30-year legacy of Northern Indian home cooking

For Amar and Malkit Singh (and recently, son Jaspal), this is more than a restaurant; it's a 30-year legacy of fine Northern Indian home cooking. They've not only shared wonderful flavours, but also touched guests with their gentle demeanor and quiet dignity.

Widely reputed for its Butter Chicken, Chicken Tikka Masala, Pakoras and Samosas, Sher-E holds the distinction of making Toronto's finest Naan bread — a soft, oval loaf that's best served hot. But be forewarned: it's addictive! Hand-made on the premises, it is baked fresh virtually on demand — every 15 minutes or so, at busy times — and delivered piping hot to your table. The experience of seeing it emerge from the massive Tandoori clay oven is surpassed only by the pleasure of eating it. This, truly, is manna from heaven.

Saag — a pureed mixture of spinach, broccoli, and rapini — is prized by Sher-E's customers for its unique combination of sharp and mellow tastes. The ever-popular Daal (pureed lentils) and Bartha — barbequed eggplant with green peas — are also first-rate.

If you can put down the Naan bread long enough to order dessert, try the refreshing Kulfi (Indian ice cream). Indian Tea – strong, sweet, and mildly spiced — is a piquant complement to any meal or dessert.

Those unfamiliar with Northern Indian cuisine tend to associate it only with curry. To be sure, you'll enjoy fine curried dishes here, made from scratch with the freshest, hand-blended spices; but this is only a very small part of the culinary picture. Sher-E-Punjab completes the tableau with elegance and grace, and with the kind of personal attention, respect and warmth that's only found in a long-established family business.

Nowhere is the multicultural appeal of the Danforth better exemplified than at Sher-E-Punjab, and those who visit it are in for a richly rewarding experience.

Myth leading special event venue

If there's a party happening in GreekTown, chances are it's at Myth, whose avant-garde Mediterranean cuisine has made it not only a favourite dining destination, but also one of Toronto's leading special event venues.

In truth, happening parties don't just "happen"... they are the result of meticulous planning by both the party planner and the staff of the venue they choose.

Myth's popularity on this front stems not just from its cuisine but also from its unique ambience. As a restored theatre with a loft-style mezzanine, it offers a spectacular setting with a variety of seating arrangements ideal for both casual and formal events.

Palatially high ceilings and richly-textured Greek, Far Eastern and Italian motifs in gold, black, copper, maroon, and pewter are striking evidence that this is not just another venue. Large enough to host major functions, yet small enough to ensure intimacy for family milestones, it has become a destination of choice for party planners city-wide.

The management and staff spare no pains to ensure that your needs are met, from special menus to decorations and every detail in between. The warm, attentive personal service that's important in any dining scenario is especially critical when you're hosting an event. You want to be free to mingle with your guests and enjoy their company, not have to deal with details every five minutes. Owner George Kapassouris and his staff go all out to ensure that you and your guests enjoy that freedom.

Myth's combination of spacious elegance, superb cuisine and warm hospitality have made it the most frequent host not only of upscale private parties, but also (among GreekTown's may eligible restaurants) of the annual Taste Of The Danforth Launch party.

Having the professionals at Myth host your event is the easiest way we know to transform question marks into an exclamation mark...as in "Opa!"

Tending to the roses

The appeal of ethnic neighbourhoods like GreekTown stems from their culture, cuisine, specialty shopping, and a variety of other stimuli. If we live or work in one of these areas, we enjoy the good fortune of immediate access. If we don't, we enjoy the good fortune of access — period.

More than any of the above attractions, however, the primary magnetism of a neighbourhood is its people. They define it. There's nothing like the repeated contact with its "regulars" — be they merchants, residents or fellow visitors — to expand the comfort zone that brought us there in the first place.

There's a qualitative difference between merely being in a neighbourhood and being part of it. For me, the latter state requires human contact. No visit to GreekTown is "official", no passport stamped until I've encountered the welcoming faces I've come to know and love. Like the Rock of Gibraltar, those faces are always there, bidding me welcome.

Now, two of them are no longer there.

I knew them casually, and it would be presumptuous of me to eulogize them here. That has already been done by others more qualified than I. Suffice it to say that their untimely and premature passing has left a void in their families, in the general community, and in GreekTown.

Only their intimate friends and family — and others impacted by similar tragic events — can fully appreciate the magnitude of the loss. It doesn't make sense. It never will. After we have expressed our condolences and grieved with them, there is little we can do for them other than to carry on.

There is, however, something we can do for ourselves.

To a greater or lesser extent, we all take life for granted. On the one hand, we tell ourselves we shouldn't. On the other hand, it's unrealistic to expect ourselves never to take life for granted. To endeavour, by dint of conscious effort, to make every hour, every minute, every second count is to live life with an intensity that is unsustainable. Surely, we need to remind ourselves occasionally to stop and smell the roses, but to do so with military precision is to defeat the purpose and spoil the experience.

The roses at home are another story. I'm not sure we can tend to them too often or too carefully.

Have I ever taken my loved ones for granted? Yes. Do I still do so, at least sometimes? Mea culpa.

We [I] need to view our [my] loved ones — and see them, and greet them — not as people we expect to be there, but as long-lost friends we may never see again.

Because at some point — be it today, tomorrow, or ten years from now — we won't.

Select Bakery evokes childhood memories

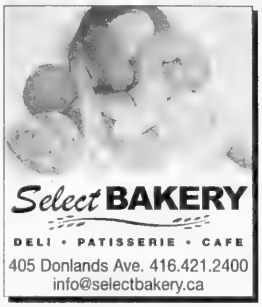
A bakery is not merely a place where bread is made. It's a symbol of sustenance that evokes treasured memories of still-warm goodies emerging from the oven with a maternal blessing and simultaneous admonishment not to overindulge.

Nowhere is this symbol better exemplified — and brought to life on a grand scale — than at Select Bakery. Huge (5,000 sq. ft.) yet intimate (GreekTown's only bakery with a dedicated seating area), its majestic array of baked bounty is to the palate what surround sound is to the ear. Enhancing its seductiveness is the colour scheme (tan on caramel on chocolate) and a refinement of presentation worthy of the illustrious cafés of Europe after which it's modelled.



The father-and-son team of Emmanuel and Kosta Katsamakis, with a combined 50 years of expertise in baking, lead a cheery staff of skilled bakers and pastry chefs. A full range of traditional Greek, European and continental pastries (baklava, galaktoboureko, petits fours et al) is complemented by exceptional European breads, specialty cakes of the highest order, and sublime specialty coffees.

Further distinguishing Select is its prepared foods. No time to cook? Moussaka, pastitsio, Greek-style lemon oregano chicken — and many other entrées — plus the full gamut of Greek dips and sauces — are prepared fresh daily for your dining pleasure. Many entrées are available fresh or frozen, and most are suitable for freezing. Need to entertain on short notice? Select is a one-stop destination for party trays, rolls, and related comestibles. And its ultraconvenient location on Donlands just south of O'Connor has ample, inexpensive meter parking at the front door.

But we digress from the baked temptations. Among the highlights at Select are:

- European Village Bread: crusty on the outside, buttery soft on the inside;
- Kalamata Olive Bread: as good as it sounds. Buy two;
- Chocolate-covered baklava: a hybrid pioneered by Select, it picks up where "to die for" leaves off;
- Mille feuilles: Select's version makes a good run at the proverbial thousand sheets, each one shatteringly good.

Bakeries are the stuff of childhood longing; each is measured against our favourites of yesteryear. This bakery belongs in that Select group.

GreekTown on the Danforth: Canadian heritage in the making

More than a tourist area, GreekTown on the Danforth is a community. In the summer, when the trees reach their full green and Toronto's restaurateurs put out their patio tables, GreekTown puts on its Mediterranean face.

color and exotic decor; the sounds of the bouzouki; the aroma of lamb souvlaki wafting from a grill; and the tastes of exotic foods. It is the restaurants above all — and the atmosphere they help create, at once lively and relaxed — which draw people from all over the city

There is plenty of live entertainment here. At many establishments, audience participation is the rule, though after a fine, full meal, you may feel disinclined to dance on a tabletop.

Alexander The Great Parkette at Danforth and Logan: a popular spot to pause, relax, and reflect

Here, when friends and acquaintances greet, you are as likely to hear "Kall' imera! Ti kanis?" as "Hi! How are you?" In the restaurants and cafés, you hear patrons converse in every language of the world.

Plenty to woo your senses

While the music of Greek polysyllables will appeal to your ears, the most important thing is not the language, but the fact that people do greet each other. Bustling and busy as the community is, everyone — not just tourists, but everyone who lives and works here — is as liable to stroll as to hurry.

There is plenty on the Danforth to woo your senses, and make you want to slow your steps: bright

Many restaurants capture, in their decor, the pleasing colours and terraced style associated with the Greek islands and mountainsides. And while souvlaki is everywhere on the Danforth, its dining establishments take pride in offering the full range and flavours of Greek and other Mediterranean cuisines.

But the Danforth boasts many other fine ethnic restaurants as well. To name but a few, Japanese, Italian, and East Indian cuisine are well represented. And its cafés and dessert houses are unparalleled, both in number and quality.

GreekTown is also home to Toronto's finest natural and specialty food stores and many alternative health practitioners. And it's become a leading fashion destination, with a host of fine specialty boutiques for men, women, and

There are a few other Toronto streets which are wider in actual metres, but the Danforth has an expansive feel about it which you don't find anywhere else. Majestic trees shade well-kept homes; here and there are streetside parks, where you can sit and rest your feet.

A solid community with solid values

If you look closely, you see there is a solid community here. You see not only the tourists, but also the elderly and the children, as they shop, stroll or sit and chat in the cafés and parks. In the restaurants, waiters and bartenders offer everyone prompt, friendly service; there are plenty of regular guests whom they greet by name.

Nor is it just staff who do this. You will see the owners showing guests to their tables, greeting them warmly; in GreekTown, customers are family.

Also here are the institutions that belong in any healthy city neighborhood: schools, houses of worship, clubs, and community centres. People not only work here, they live here; and it is in great part because they keep GreekTown pleasant to live in, that it is pleasant to visit.

If you really want to get to know the community, chat a little with the staffs of different restaurants; you'll find that everyone knows everyone else. There is plenty of competition here, but it is friendly. To thrive, a restauranteur has to cherish the firm conviction that his or her establishment is the best; but in GreekTown, they do so without knocking the competition. If anything, the reverse is true.

It is from this wealth of restaurants that the "Taste of the Danforth" festival was born. This annual event has become so popular that GreekTown is closed to traffic for its duration. It's a great opportunity to sample the Danforth's culinary delights while enjoying its ambience, all in support of worthy charities like the Toronto East General Hospital Foundation.

While the Danforth is a community, it has never been a closed enclave. Saul Korman of Korry's Clothiers, an active member of the Jewish community, is also an enthusiastic promoter of GreekTown. Having been there for half a century — Korry's is now celebrating its 50th anniversary — Korman knows the people of this community, many of whom started as dishwashers and short-order cooks in the '50's and '60's, then opened the first modest Greek restaurants in the '70's. Many of them came here seeking both prosperity and freedom; the late Andreas Papandreou (a recent Prime Minister of Greece) lived in Canada from 1969 to 1974.

Korman shares with the people who live and work on the Danforth their joy in the prosperity and freedom of Canada. If you come to GreekTown, you are breathing, hearing and tasting Canadian heritage — not in a museum, but as contemporary history in the making.

New Moon Kitchen's delicious baked goods now KSA Kosher certified

You love the idea of healthy baked goods, but are skeptical of the reality? Don't believe they'll taste as good as the "real thing?"

If that's true, then it's time for you to get out of your old kitchen and into New Moon Kitchen.

An all-natural, gourmet bakery devoted to making delicious and healthy baked goods since 1997, New Moon Kitchen features a line of dairy-free, egg-free and nut-free products made with the finest natural ingredients and without sacrificing the all-important taste that compels you to nosh in the first place.

- COOKIES: Scooped by hand and baked to perfection in six scrumptious flavours, each with its own unique texture: Chocolate Chip, Bite Me (seed & raisin), Mo-Mint (organic peppermint & chocolate), Ginger Snappers, Goldies (classic oatmeal, named after President Eden Hertzog's Great-Bubbie Goldie), and Mokas (organic fair-trade espresso and fine Belgian chocolate with a sprinkle of cinnamon).
- MINI-LOAVES: Exquisitely moist with minimal fat, in three captivating flavours: Bunny (carrot / raisin); Nana (Banana); and Corn. Available at The Big Carrot, Noah's, Whole Foods, and and other specialty and health food stores throughout the GTA and Ontario, New Moon products would make any Bubbie proud.

Even better, New Moon's entire product line is now certified Kosher Parve by KSA. For Hertzog, obtaining Kosher certification was a natural continuation of the ongoing process of making New Moon's products available to the largest possible audience.

Heavenly home cooking at Zorba's

More and more, we seem to measure restaurants by their ability to simulate "home cooking", and a big part of GreekTown's appeal is that so many of its dining establishments achieve this goal. But if ever a restaurant could be said to welcome you into its home and sit you down at its kitchen table, that restaurant is Zorba's.

Your first clue is that the decor, while cheerful, is neither trendy nor obtrusive. Tastewise, however, Zorba's katsarola (Greek for "pot", a metaphor for home cooking) will spoil you as few restaurants can. Always off the menu and priced from $8.50 to $12.00 for a mammoth portion complete with potatoes, rice and vegetables, katsarola makes it doubly easy to forget you're "eating out".

Each day, owner and chef Kosta Carasoulos slaves over three to five of these specialties and spoons them into the steam vessels at front. And, just as you'd expect in a home environment, what he cooks depends entirely on his whims of the day. Typically roasted or stewed, these dishes won't just remind you of home; they are home.

That's the good news. The bad news is that once they're gone, they're gone, and with an eager clientele weaned on home cooking, you're advised to arrive early for best selection.

Remember your Mom's or your Bubbie's chicken fricassee? Zorba's lamb fricassee will melt in your mouth just as hers did. Lamb with orizo, a rice-like pasta, is equally heavenly, as is the beef stew. These preparations generally feature green beans, cauliflower, zucchini, or okra, often in combination, gently oven-simmered in a light tomato sauce. Vegetarian specialties include roasted gigantes (lima beans), a local favourite.

Zorba's mainstream menu tends toward casual, and many entrées are offered in three sizes (small, regular and large). The medium Greek salad could easily pass for a large; the large is off the charts. As with the katsarola, the prices are exceptionally modest. For example, the Lamb Souvlaki is offered as a sandwich for $4.75, with fries for $6.25 or with salad for $7.45.

Since Zorba's defines itself by its home cooking, it's only fitting that multiple family members be present. Try seven. At any given time, you'll find Kosta, wife Christine, sons Bobby, Anesty and Spiro, and daughters Demetra and Maria minding the store. The attitude is warm and friendly, the affection genuine, both between family members and with customers. Says Bobby, "We don't really know where home life ends and the business begins; they've become one and the same."

If you've never had the pleasure of dining in a Greek home, a visit to Zorba's will quickly fill that void in your life experience.

Danforth Jewish Circle: building community values

Some seven years ago, a handful of interested parents met in Debbie Plested's living room and decided to start a Jewish studies program in the Riverdale area.

They were all members of the newly formed Danforth Jewish Circle (DJC), a grassroots, liberal egalitarian congregation in Toronto's east end, established in 1996 and then chaired by Marlee Wyman.

Giving children a sense of community

At the time, Plested, co-chair of the DJC education committee, said children's education was a priority for many DJC members.

"We were really a community," she recently said. "We wanted our kids to learn and study within our community and feel a part of the community."

Plested said the group recognized the necessity of setting up a program that could meet the diverse educational needs of the children.

At that time, the local Hebrew heritage program, a school board program that had been operating in the neighbourhood for some 15 years, could only offer a basic introduction to Jewish studies, she said.

"The program was instrumental in creating a sense of Jewish identity and a sense of community," she said. "But [it] had trouble developing as a curriculum because it had to cater to a wide age group. What was happening was that our families had no choice but to look outside the community to further their child's Jewish education."

The group of parents met many times in the course of the year to establish a community-based supplementary school. They had to develop a curriculum, hire teachers and publicize the program to attract students, find funding and find a space to hold classes, Plested said.

Now in its 11th year, the DJC Children's Jewish Studies program runs weekly classes for elementary school students out of a local school. Through discussion, debate, music, drama and art, the children study Hebrew, Torah, Jewish history and current events, Jewish holidays and rituals, Plested said.

"Our program values Judaism as a dynamic, living religion. Our students learn to understand what it means to be a Jew and how being Jewish affects our values, beliefs and behaviour."

While the exploration of Jewish identity is a key component of the curriculum, Plested said that given the high proportion of interfaith families, there is also an emphasis on "respect for the broad spectrum of multiculturalism which exists within Judaism and in the neighbourhood."

The goal of the Hebrew language program is to help the children learn to read Hebrew, recite the basic prayers and gain familiarity with Hebrew songs, she said.

"We want the children to be able to decode Hebrew so that they'll be able to prepare for their Bat or Bar Mitzvah...If they have more of an interest in conversational Hebrew, we encourage and assist them [with] supplementing their studies by connecting them with a tutor."

B'Nai Mitzvah program: building and bonding

In addition to the school, the DJC offers a B'nai Mitzvah program, which is run by parents and not funded by any group. "This group is the beginning of a connection to the community for the future because the kids are building friendships and bonding as a group," Wyman said.

Wyman said she marvels at the growth of the community education program. "It shows you what a group of dedicated volunteers can accomplish. They're incredibly motivated. That's the whole thing about volunteerism: action is taken because we want to see results."

Hezbollah feels the pressure

By DAVID HOROVITZ
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Hezbollah is hurting under the impact of Israel's military action, but it is not yet showing signs of desperation, according to Uri Lubrani, an adviser to the defence minister and formerly Israel's longtime co-ordinator of activities in Lebanon.

Watching Hezbollah's broadcasts, "my sense is that they are feeling the pressure," Lubrani told the Jerusalem Post. "It's also plain that the IDF [Israel Defence Forces] operation in Baalbek [last week] had a real impact. They'll have to explain that to their supporters."

The hope in Hezbollah that the Qana tragedy would lead to a far wider escalation of anger in the Arab world, and one that would dramatically constrain Israel, has not been fully realized, he added.

But a good barometer of the Hezbollah mindset, Lubrani suggested, would be the degree to which its backers press at the United Nations for an urgent ceasefire. "I would consider a real sign of desperation if their supporters starting putting on frantic pressure at the UN for a ceasefire," he said. And that might happen, he posited without elaboration, "if they fear that we are about to go further."

Lubrani stressed that stability in Lebanon, and for Israel, required the maximal marginalizing of Hezbollah and its Iranian backers.

"We have to demand the maximum in the next 10 days and insist on the minimum. I know there's talk of a demilitarized zone. We need to insist that Hezbollah is reduced in its capacities. We need to insist that it comes under over-sight and supervision from those who will have the gumption to resist its pressures, in an international force. We need to insist that [UN Security Council] Resolution 1559 be implemented to the full, that there be no threat at the border."

Lubrani added that "the international community has to be aware that this cannot be racheted up and down; a longer-term solution is required.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Group Seeks Flag Ban

TORONTO — After rallies against Israel in Montreal and Toronto in which protesters praised Hezbollah and carried its banner, B'nai Brith Canada called on Ottawa last week to ban the waving of the terror group's flag. "Hezbollah is outlawed in this country, and it therefore should be illegal to wave the flags of this terrorist group on our city streets, an activity that encourages and promotes allegiance to terrorism," said executive vice-president Frank Dimant. He repeated an earlier call to close loopholes" in anti-terror laws by criminalizing demonstrations and support for terrorist activity."

Site Adds Burial Info

MONTREAL — The Canadian Jewish Congress National Archives has added a new feature to the CJC's website that provides death and burial site data for Canadian Jewish servicemen killed in World Wars I and II and the Korean War. The database, located at www.cjc.ca/archives/casualties.php, was developed after veterans and their families reported that non-Jewish military burial markers had incorrect information.

Bridge Champ Dies

MONTREAL — Montreal native Ralph Cohen, a four-time North American bridge champion who held many international titles and leadership positions in the game, died at his Memphis home of cancer June 13 at 79. He was remembered as a math genius, voracious reader and worldwide traveller who loved to explore Jewish areas in exotic lands.

Threat to El Al

BRUSSELS — Belgian authorities are investigating a threat against local El Al operations. Brussels' city prosecutors said July 31 that a letter was found in the toilets of Zaventem airport threatening attacks on Israel's national carrier. The would-be terrorists reportedly wanted to avenge Israel's offensive in Lebanon.

Shul Vandalized

AUCKLAND — Israel's envoy in New Zealand blamed New Zealand politicians for a July 31 attack on a shul in the city of Christchurch. Pavement outside the shul was daubed with phrases such as "Shower, you murderous swine," and wall plaques were etched with swastikas. David Zwartz linked the graffiti attack to officials' weak support for Israel in its war with Hezbollah.

Plot Foiled

LOS ANGELES — Five people were arrested July 30 on suspicion they were about to vandalize Temple Beth Shalom in Long Beach, Calif., local media reported.

Petition Delivered

NEW YORK — A pro-Israel student petition was delivered to Kofi Annan July 31. Started by the student group Hillel, it garnered more than 43,000 signatures and asks the UN secretary general to "join us in clearly and immediately reaffirming the right of Israel to defend its citizens and ensure its security in the face of relentless attacks, killings and kidnappings by Hezbollah."

Vandals Hit Shops

ROME — Vandals defaced some 20 Jewish shops in Rome. Fliers signed by a group calling itself the Armed Revolutionary Fascists included pro-Hezbollah slogans and condemned the "Zionist economy," AP reported. Rome's mayor condemned the vandalism.

Synagogue Defaced

GLASGOW — Jewish leaders in Scotland condemned graffiti at Scotland's oldest synagogue. The word "Hezbollah" was smeared across the Garnethill Synagogue in Glasgow last week, the BBC reported.

Alleged Shooter Faces Multiple Charges

SEATTLE — The alleged gunman in the July 28 attack on the Seattle Jewish Federation will be charged with an array of crimes, including first-degree murder.

Naveed Afzal Haq, 30, has also been charged with five counts of attempted murder in the first degree, kidnapping in the first degree, burglary in the first degree and malicious harassment. King County Prosecuting Attorney Norm Maleng said last week he would seek either the death penalty or life imprisonment without the possibility of parole.

Earlier, Haq's parents apologized for their son's actions. In letters to Jewish groups, Mian and Nahida Haq said they don't want the shooting to create hatred between Jews and Muslims, the family's lawyer said.

Haq allegedly killed one person and wounded five others in the incident after making anti-Semitic comments. He is believed to suffer from mental illness. The woman killed in the attack, Pam Waechter, was buried July 31 after a funeral service attended by an estimated 1,300 people.

Aussies Show Support

MELBOURNE — A standing-room-only crowd attended a pro-Israel solidarity meeting in Melbourne, Australia, last week. Some 1,700 people heard speeches and prayers at the event, sponsored by Australian Jewish groups. Pro-Israel rallies have also been held in Sydney and Canberra.

Graffiti Found

MIAMI — Anti-Semitic graffiti was spray-painted on two synagogues and two Jewish community businesses in south Florida. Congregation Shaaray Tefila, Young Israel of Greater Miami, Kosher World and Judaica Enterprises were vandalized July 30, the Miami Herald reported. A police spokesperson said he believes the attacks weren't motivated by anti-Semitism, but Yitzie Spalter, the owner of Kosher World, disagreed. "They were too organized to come to two temples in the neighbourhood and two Jewish stores," he said.

Attacks Days Apart

SYDNEY — , Police in Sydney, Australia, were searching for 10 men who attacked a shul in the city's suburbs, when a second shul was hit by arsonists a few days later. In the first attack, the Parramatta Synagogue was attacked July 30 with bricks and concrete that damaged doors, windows and his car. No one was hurt in the incident, believed to be the work of men of Middle Eastern origin. A few days later, there was an attempted arson at the Mizrachi Synagogue. The fire did not do serious damage.

Community agencies asked to heighten security

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In a move reminiscent of previous Mideast hostilities, Jewish agencies responsible for community security have issued advisories to institutions across the country asking them to step up their security procedures.

Canadian Jewish Congress has called on community centres, synagogues, schools, camps and other institutional buildings across Canada to put in place security protocols designed to forestall potential anti-Semitic attacks. A similar advisory for institutions in Toronto was published by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"We felt it was important that institutions across the country in Jewish communities across the country to be very security conscious, and that police forces be equally security conscious and in that way avert possible incidents," said Manuel Prutschi, national executive vice-president of Congress.

"We sent an advisory to all Jewish community institutions [calling for] a heightened state of alertness within the community," said federation spokesperson Howard English. "Events in the Middle East can encourage people with malicious intent."

The advisories coincided with a July 28 shooting in a Seattle Jewish community centre by a lone gunman. Naveed Haq allegedly killed one woman and wounded five as he shouted his anger at Jews for violence in the Middle East.

Prutschi said there was no evidence of any specific acts being planned against the Jewish community in Canada. Congress has been in contact with the RCMP, CSIS, Canada's security agency, and with local police forces to determine the level of danger. "Police across the country have agreed to step up [their] visibility around Jewish institutions," he said. "They are also conscious of the danger and they are keeping their antennae up regarding possible danger.

"Police take the threat very seriously. We're comforted that they do," he added.

Despite the absence of a specific threat, Prutschi said Hezbollah has announced its intention to wage all-out war outside the Middle East.

"Unfortunately Hezbollah does have an international infrastructure. They previously have acted against Israel and the Jewish community during another Israel-Lebanese conflict," he said, referring to the 1992 bombing of the Israeli embassy in Buenos Aires and the 1994 destruction of the AMIA community centre in the same city that killed 85 people and wounded more than 300.

Congress' first security manual dates back to 1985, when Israel was embroiled in a conflict with Lebanon. Congress has also alerted Jewish community agencies about potential terrorist and anti-Semitic threats at the time of the first Gulf War (1991), the second intifadah (2000) and following the 9/11 attacks.

Anti-Semitic incidents spiked following those events.

English said the shooting in Seattle demonstrated that "no community is immune from the possibility of attack and there are lunatics out there capable of undertaking an attack."

He said more visible security has been implemented at the Lipa Green Building, which houses numerous community agencies, as well as at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and the Wolfond Centre at the University of Toronto.

Jewish organizations have pre-existing plans that are put in place when the security situation warrants it, English said. He and Prutschi declined to give details about security measures.

English and Prutschi said the costs of enhanced security will be borne by community organizations, but Congress and the federation have been requesting financial assistance from provincial and federal governments.

"We are pushing hard on the question of government support for community security," said English. "We are continuing to advocate for it. But so far, the funds spent for it are community funds."

He noted that in the United States, the Department of Homeland Security does provide grants to non-profit organizations for security measures.

Israel at War

The importance of leaders

It is much harder to discern, let alone test, the true mettle and character of a leader in our day and age. The technology of the times, especially the television monitor and computer screen, have profoundly affected the public's notion of just who and what is a good leader.

Telegenicity – the ability to look and sound good on the screen – is a far more important criterion of electability in our national leaders than, say, strength of character and sound judgment. In fact, in the high-tech, visual world dominated by the video camera, "sound judgment" has come to mean something else entirely.

It is against this background that the decision by Prime Minister Stephen Harper to stand on a principle regarding Israel's war against Hamas and Hezbollah (and their patrons Iran and Syria), rather than adopt a position on one that is popular among much of the media and Opposition leaders, is so remarkable.

He has resisted severe political taunting and even an apparent slide last weekend in public support for his party to remain steadfast in his belief that Israel has a right to "fight back."

Harper described his policy to The CJN last week as "principled and in the best interest of the country."

This important linkage cannot be overstated. The principled policy is also the policy that serves the best interests of Canada. In this case, it means supporting the right of a democratic country to defend itself against sophisticated, well-armed, fanatical cadres of malicious terrorist groups seeking its demise.

The reasoning behind the prime minister's policy was explained succinctly to The CJN by Prof. David Bercuson, director of the Centre for Military and Strategic Studies at the University of Calgary.

"This government… sees Canada involved in this developing global conflict between jihad and the western industrialized liberal societies… so the enemy killing our soldiers in Afghanistan is the same rocketing Israel with Katyushas."

Harper has accurately defined the issue underlying the war Israel is currently fighting. The war is not about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, the "occupation" as it is provocatively but inappropriately called, although, to be sure, for Harper as for the Israelis, the conflict is an urgent matter that must be resolved once and for all. Rather, it is about the very right of this tiny, Jewish, and very western society to live as a free, sovereign state in a Middle East that Hamas, Hezbollah and their like wish to be Islamic in their image and thus, anti-western.

Harper is not alone in this understanding of the current fighting. British Prime Minister Tony Blair shares his view. Last week, in a speech to the Los Angels World Affairs Council, he spoke about the "arc of extremism" that must be resisted by the West. He also singled out the terrorism of Hezbollah as the root cause of the war.

Like Harper, Blair has been derided for his views in much of the press. But he, too, has not withdrawn from pressing the argument, nor, more tellingly, from standing firm in his support of U.S. President George W. Bush and the campaign against terrorists in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"There is an arc of extremism now stretching across the Middle East and touching, with increasing definition, countries far outside that region. To defeat it will need an alliance of moderation that paints a different future in which Muslim, Jew and Christian; Arab and western; wealthy and developing nations can make progress in peace and harmony with each other.

"It's [the arc of extremism's] purpose is explicitly to prevent those countries [Iraq and Afghanistan] becoming democracies and not "western style" democracies, any sort of democracy. It is to prevent Palestine living side by side with Israel; not to fight for the coming into being of a Palestinian state, but for the going out of being of an Israeli state. It is not wanting Muslim countries to modernize but to retreat into governance by a semi-feudal religious oligarchy.

"And most contemporaneously, and in some ways most perniciously, a very large and, I fear, growing part of opinion looks at Israel and thinks we pay too great a price for supporting it and sympathizes with Muslim opinion that condemns it. Absent from so much of the coverage is any understanding of the Israeli predicament."

At this point in his remarks, Blair poignantly described how Israel was provoked into fighting the terrorist organizations and demonstrates deep empathy for the people and the government of Israel. He believes it is imperative to embolden moderate, mainstream Islam to win the hearts and minds of Muslims away from extremists.

He offered a four-point strategy for doing so, the second of which is "to re-energize the Middle East peace process between Israel and Palestine." But re-energizing the peace process is very far from the minds of most Israelis at this moment. Israeli soldiers are fighting for their lives and for the lives of their fellow countrymen. Moreover, given the behaviour of Palestinian leaders since September 1993, Israelis are entitled to ask who and where are the moderate Palestinian leaders with whom they might re-energize the peace process?

Blair hopes that such moderate Palestinian leaders will one day step forward. So, too, does Harper. So, too, do Israelis.

Aliyah director has mixed emotions about leaving

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Dina Gidron, the regional director of the Israel Aliyah Centre, is both glad and sad to be leaving Toronto now that her two-year contract has ended.

With her 19-year-old son in the Israel Defence Forces, Gidron is glad that she and husband David, along with their 16-year-old son, will be joining him in Israel.

But she's sad because, "Toronto has been great. The work has been good, and there is so much more that I could do."

She says that since coming to the centre, which is affiliated with the Jewish Agency for Israel, she has seen hundreds of olim leave for Israel, "and I've met hundreds more who are considering aliyah."

Toronto lawyer fulfils his dream
see story page 28

Her "baby," she says, was the first ever Nefesh B'Nefesh aliyah flight from Canada in July 2005. "I had noticed a growth trend, so I phoned Nefesh B'Nefesh [an organization that helps people make aliyah] and asked them why they weren't flying from Toronto. Two hundred olim went with them last summer, and another flight is set to leave on Aug. 15."

Whenever possible she likes potential olim to meet with her before making a decision. "Only after meeting with a shlichah can they get accurate, updated information. That way, they can make their decision based on fact."

Her role, she says, has largely been that of a counsellor. "I help them decide if moving to Israel is the right thing for them to do."

Even following surgery for a broken ankle that she suffered after slipping on ice this past winter, she continued to interview potential olim. "I interviewed people over the phone from home, and met them as soon as I was able."

Dina Gidron

Some people come in with an idealistic picture of Israel changing their life, Gidron says. "They want to move away from their problems. I tell them, however, that their problems follow them.

"And things only get harder, because they'll also have to deal with being newcomers – a new language, and new culture. I don't discourage them, though. I just advise them to think carefully about what they're planning."

She could just sign them up, she says, "but I want them to know what they're doing. I suggest that they spend time in Israel without committing, a pre-aliyah pilot trip. Take the opportunity to meet [potential] employers, pick out schools, and meet people who have moved there."

Realizing that there is a financial deterrent to making a pre-aliyah trip, El Al offers a 20 per cent discount for people flying for that reason, says Gidron. "UJA Federation [of Greater Toronto] also has a proposal on the table to find funding for people planning a pre-aliyah trip."

People move at a different pace, says Gidron. "Some know that it's the time to go right now, while others take 20 years to plan their big move. Life just happened while they were making their plans."

Rambam Saves Lives Under Attack

To the Friends of Rambam Health Care Campus in Haifa and the State of Israel

Rambam, the major tertiary referral medical center for all northern Israel, is now literally at the battle front in the current war launched against the people and the state of Israel by our terrorist enemies. Dozens of civilian and military casualties, from the battlefields, from other hospitals throughout northern Israel, from the neighborhood adjacent to Rambam and all parts of Haifa and its environs, are evacuated everyday to Rambam for life-saving treatment.

Personal stories of life-saving heroism abound, as Rambam's surgeons and medical care teams work around the clock, while themselves being under deadly missile attack.

Enemy warheads contain deadly pellets, whose aim is to deliberately inflict lethal injury to the greatest number of civilians and this presents an especially disturbing challenge to Rambam's surgical and medical teams.

In one case, Rambam's chief of surgery, immediately diagnosed and treated a patient with such a pellet that penetrated the heart of a young man, saving his life. In another an injured artery in the neck was repaired, and after two days in a coma, the injured soldier awoke to face the Israel Defense Force Chief-of-Staff; this brave soldier's first act was to salute his Commander-in-Chief.

RAMBAM Health Care Campus

Team work and vast experience are what have enabled Rambam's magnificent, courageous, and dedicated staff to rise to the challenge of providing life-saving treatment for those under attack, while simultaneously being under attack itself.

At the same time, this one thousand bed medical center continues to provide comprehensive medical care to all the citizens of northern Israel, irrespective of their background and denomination.

While now in a state of war – our urgent mission at this moment in time is to provide the citizens of northern Israel, and the Israel Defense Forces, with confidence that they can count on Rambam and its staff to provide the medical and surgical back up and treatment that is urgently needed.

While Rambam is protected, equipped and ready for any and all eventualities, the current war has shown us that as a battlefront high activity and intensity hospital, a major upgrade of the physical facilities housing our emergency services is urgently needed.

The Government of Israel has provided resources to reinforce some more vulnerable parts of the hospital with protective abutments and material. However, in addition our most urgent and immediate need is to purchase equipment that will allow us to double our emergency services and intensive care capacity – which is currently strained. The nature of the injuries inflicted require the rapid ability to accurately and rapidly locate life-threatening metal pellets, with which the deadly missiles are loaded and which disperse upon impact and explosion. The relocation of many hundreds of our patients to safer locations within the medical center facility – also requires urgent special equipment arrangements. The immediate cost of these emergent needs is very high, even as the war rages on.

In the longer run – we have learned the hard way – that immediately following completion of the war, we need to rapidly initiate a major upgrade of our Emergency Services physical facility – which is currently one of the smallest in size relative to the volume of activity we experience even in peace time, and is not optimally constructed to accommodate a situation of safely providing life-saving care under enemy fire. The costs of this upgrade, together with bed secure inpatient intensive care facility will also require generous support from our friends in Canada and throughout the world.

We wish to thank our friends and supporters for their encouragement and support during these difficult times. We appeal to you for your continued encouragement, generosity and help, so that we may be able to meet the current challenge and fulfill our mission on behalf of the state of Israel and the Jewish people, and for the benefit of human health. Shalom.

Romania embracing Holocaust education

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

The former director of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto is helping Romania develop its Holocaust education teaching strategy.

Peninah Zilberman, who was director of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto from 1989 until 1998, spent three weeks this past spring in Romania holding seminars for teachers. She made presentations in the capital, Bucharest, and the city of Cluj, in central Romania.

"As a child of Romanian Holocaust survivors, it was of utmost importance for me to have the opportunity to address Romanian teachers about the Holocaust," said Zilberman, whose father currently spends half a year in Romania. Zilberman's mother grew up in Sighet and lived on the same street as novelist and activist Elie Wiesel.

"My paternal grandparents brought me up with many stories about Romania, and in their memory and in the memory of my maternal grandparents, which I never knew, as they were gassed in Auschwitz, I felt very good for being able to guide Romanian teachers in their quest in teaching the Holocaust."

Zilberman spent a day in May in Cluj, at Babes-Bolyai University, where she lectured to 30 teachers.

Others who made presentations at the four-day seminar included Chava Baruch from Yad Vashem and Michael Poznanski of the Centre of Mémorial de la SHOAH in France.

The seminar at the University of Bucharest's Goren-Goldstein Hebrew studies Center ran from May 10 to 12 and 58 teachers, ranging in age from 28 to 60, participated. Zilberman said the seminar was not as intense as the program in Cluj, which had three parts."

"They spent a whole week in February learning about the history of the Holocaust and how it [affected] the state of Romania. In May, they [learned the] methodology," she said.

Each participant will now write an essay on subjects concerning the Holocaust, which they will present at their third and final seminar this October, before travelling to Auschwitz.

According to the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, 15 years following the fall of communism in Romania in 1989, there still had not been any acknowledgement of the Holocaust. This is an added challenge when teaching Holocaust education, Zilberman said.

"The person who co-ordinated the program in Cluj insisted that those who attend have to be fluent in English and not older than 32, because they [don't] come with preconceived ideas," Zilberman said.

"Until 1989, nobody spoke about the Holocaust. Nobody taught [Holocaust education]. They completely denied that there was a Holocaust," she said.

Zilberman said the underlying motive for this new interest in Holocaust education in Romania is political.

Memorial to be unveiled in Bucharest on Oct. 9

"One has to understand that this is a growth that Romania wants to be accepted in 2007 as a member of the European Union," she said. "Part of the requirement is acknowledging the Holocaust."

On June 13, 2003, the Romanian government released a statement denying any Romanian responsibility in the Holocaust. Five days later, following a spate of international condemnation, a statement was released by the government, acknowledging what had occurred more than 61 years ago.

On Oct. 22, 2003, the former president of Romania, Ion Iliescu, announced the establishment of a commission to investigate the Holocaust in Romania and on November 11, 2004, a 400-page Final Report was released. According to Yad Vashem, the report documents the history of the Holocaust in Romania as well as recommendations on how the government can promote Holocaust education, remembrance, research and awareness.

This year, a Holocaust memorial will be unveiled in Bucharest on Oct. 9, Romania's Holocaust Remembrance Day.

On Oct. 9, 1941, the deportation of Jews to local concentration camps in the regions of Bukovina, Bessarabia and Transnistria began.

Zilberman said that in Transnistria victims died of hunger, beatings and malnutrition, and also because of environmental factors.

"October is pre-winter, lots of rain, and it's in the northern part of Romania, which means that it's cold and it snows. What happens is... the ground, turns into a mud, that if you put one foot [down], and you don't lift it up immediately, you get stuck," she said.

"It's a terrible thing because when you talk to some survivors, they sometimes say that they saw their parents get stuck to the ground."

The deportation of Jews from the Transylvania region, which was the center of Chassidism, to Auschwitz began on May 15, 1944.

According to the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, in 1933, Romania's Jewish population was approximately 980,000. Today, Romania is home to a Jewish population of about 14,000.

Bully wants ceasefire

Israel has been battling Hezbollah and its sponsors for more than three weeks. Deadly rockets and missiles continue to rain down on civilian neighbourhoods in Israel. Eight people alone were killed last Thursday under a barrage of some 130 rockets. In response, Israel targeted more Hezbollah launch sites and other military installations and drove deeper into southern Lebanon with thousands of ground forces, methodically pushing Hezbollah further and further away from the border.

In a sure sign Hezbollah was feeling its losses, Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah, the hate-laden leader of the Shiite terrorist group, appeared on Lebanese television last week to reassure his supporters that Hezbollah was actually winning the war. That he used Alice-in-Wonderland rhetoric to describe the degradation of Hezbollah's arsenal and the carnage that still smouldered on Lebanon's crushed earth as a victory for Lebanon and its people was neither surprising nor persuasive – least of all to the Lebanese. He threatened to send missiles into Tel Aviv if Israel bombed Beirut, but not before he offered to end the shooting of rockets into Israel if Israel stopped its attacks on Hezbollah targets.

The same day the cherubic leader of Hezbollah appeared on Lebanese television, his mentor and sponsor, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, spoke to an emergency gathering of Muslim leaders in Malaysia. "Although the main solution is for the elimination of the Zionist regime, at this stage an immediate ceasefire must be implemented," Ahmadinejad said, according to Iranian state-run TV. Thus, the bully and his backer both want Israel to stop the fight that they began.

As of this writing, diplomatic momentum toward a ceasefire was indeed building. The permanent members of the United Nations Security Council were moving with considerable haste toward that aim. Israeli forces, however, were also moving with considerable haste to rout as many of the Hezbollah thugs from their hidden warrens in south Lebanon before any ceasefire would be imposed upon them.

But the Security Council must not impose a one-sided obligation upon Israel to cease and desist from its military campaign against the terrorists, nor should Israel agree to a ceasefire before its work is substantially completed and its northern border is protected and secure.

Uri Lubrani, an adviser to Defense Minister Amir Peretz, told the Jerusalem Post that stability in Lebanon and Israel means marginalizing Hezbollah and its Iranian backers. "We need to insist that Hezbollah is reduced in its capacities… that it comes under oversight and supervision from those who will have the gumption to resist its pressures, in an international force. We need to insist that [Security Council] Resolution 1559 [which calls for the disarming of all Lebanese militias] be implemented to the full, that there be no threat at the border."

He also had plenty to say about Iran. "There are those who believe Iran can be talked to, reasoned with. Don't count me among them… I take Ahmadinejad seriously. People think he's a clown, a buffoon. He's not… They want to wipe out the U.S., and us, too… as the representatives of western culture. This can't be swept under the carpet."

As Israel has shown these past three weeks, it will not be.

25 years ago in The CJN

Brig.-Gen. Amos Baram, deputy head of the Israel Defence Forces' northern command, told reporters in New York that a recent ceasefire between Israel and the PLO in Lebanon was a mistake "militarily" because the army was set to rout the PLO and stop it from shelling Israeli towns in northern Galilee. He also said the PLO had received "sophisticated and accurate" weapons from East Germany, Libya and Syria, and purposely located itself in civilian areas as a shield against Israeli retaliation.

Biased news reporting in the U.K.

We need more Stephen Harpers and Tony Blairs ("Harper rejects moral equivalence between Israel and terrorists," CJN, Aug. 3).

I just got back from a meeting with the Board of Deputies of British Jews in London. I have never heard so much hatred and biased news as I did on the BBC and Sky News, as well as in the headlines of the Guardian, the Times and the Independent. I now understand why the Jews there act like dhimmis [non-Muslim subjects of a state governed in accordance with Islamic law] and hide. The media in the United Kingdom make Jews and Israelis sound worse than Nazis. I work in the media and I am a grassroots activist, but even I felt like tucking my Magen David under my shirt at certain times.

I spent a Shabbat dinner with friends and had to listen to their children describe how Jews stole the land for Israel from Palestinians. I listened to the kids talk about how Jews murdered and killed millions of Palestinians and destroyed hundreds of thousands of villages – and if we could just give back the West Bank, all would be well in the world.

Freedom and democracy will lose the battle if we allow lies to become truth, and facts to become fiction. Bravo Prime Minister Harper!

Ralliers 'were Canada at its best'

Often, as Canadians, we take our safety, security, and most importantly, our democracy for granted. It is with this in mind that I congratulate the organizers of the Stand for Israel Rally ("8,000 rally for Israel in Toronto," CJN, Aug. 3). To have been invited was an honour, but to have personally witnessed the overwhelming support of thousands of people is an indelible memory. Peacefully gathered, shoulder to shoulder, the ralliers represented Canada at its best.

When I arrived, I was stirred by the thousands of people gathered outside the Toronto Centre for the Arts to watch the rally on video screens. Inside the overflowing hall and outside, a sea of Canadian and Israeli flags waved, held by citizens from all walks of life, all religions and all communities across the Greater Toronto Area. To say it was moving would simply be understating this show of solidarity.

I can only echo the sentiments of the speakers, Robert Lantos, retired major-general Lewis MacKenzie, Miriam Shemtov and Julia Koschitzky, that this is not just an Israeli issue. Rather, this is about the free and democratic nations of the world standing together to fight terrorism everywhere, and not just on the front lines of this global conflict.

The rally showed the compassion and commitment of Canadians. In a perfect world, these rallies would be unneccessary, but in its absence, I pray for a quick and reasonable settlement that will allow democracy and the rule of law to succeed.

Grieved by violence in Middle East

As Jews, Canadians and human beings, we are deeply grieved by the escalating violence in the Middle East. We mourn the death and suffering of Lebanese, Palestinians and Israelis and decry the killing and destruction by all parties.

We do not believe that it is in Israel's or the world's interest for Jews to provide unquestioning support for the Israeli government's ever-more destructive military response in Lebanon. This excessive reaction has created a humanitarian disaster, destroying infrastructure and killing and wounding hundreds of civilians, including many children.

We do not discount the threat from Hezbollah, which has launched unjustifiable attacks on Israeli citizens. But it is becoming increasingly apparent that the present crisis cannot be solved by military means. We agree with Henry Siegman, former head of the American Jewish Congress, who observed in Britain's Guardian that Israel's response to the attacks, "far from providing protection to its citizens, may well further undermine their security by destabilizing the wider region."

We support the many Jews and others in Israel and around the world who call on the Israeli government to pursue an immediate ceasefire and diplomatic solutions to the current crisis, and an end to the boycott of the Palestinian Authority and the occupation of Palestine. We believe the Canadian government should join other nations in calling for an immediate ceasefire and negotiated solutions.

Why Israel must win this war for the free world

Ya'acov Amidror

Dan Diker

By YA'AKOV AMIDROR and DAN DIKER
Jerusalem Post

Israel went to war to remove Hezbollah's strategic missile threat on the Jewish state's northern border. The terror group has kept Israel hostage to its missile threat for the past six years, and during that time, it has transformed itself into a highly effective deterrent force.

Hezbollah leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah decided to ignite the northern front in the middle of last month on the assumption that Israeli war jitters would prevent the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) from responding with its full might.

But while Israel is at war only to eliminate the acute strategic threat of some 13,000 to 15,000 short- and longer-range Iranian and Syrian missiles pointed at its major cities, this Israeli campaign must also achieve three additional and necessary outcomes that have far-reaching implications for the future of the Middle East region and the free world.

First, an Israeli victory over Hezbollah – meaning the uprooting of Hezbollah as an armed force that has become an army within an army – may offer the Lebanese people another window of opportunity to become a democratic sovereign state free of the fear and tyranny Syria and Iran, via Hezbollah, have imposed on it. That important process had picked up speed after the murder by Syrian operatives of Lebanese president Rafik Hariri last summer, followed by the million-person demonstration for freedom in Beirut's Martyrs' Square and the removal of Syrian troops from Lebanon.

However, Lebanese progress toward freedom was stopped dead in its tracks as Hezbollah, backed by Syrian and Iranian patrons, remained the strongest armed force in the country, in direct contravention of UN Security Council Resolution 1559, which calls for both the disarming of all foreign militias in Lebanon and the removal of all foreign forces other than the Lebanese army.

Moreover, several hundred members of Iran's Revolutionary Guards have remained in Lebanon as advisers and trainers of terror activity, including the launching of various Iranian medium-range rockets and the maintaining of Iranian Zelzal long-range missiles.

The uprooting of Hezbollah terrorist forces and their Iranian and Syrian advisers from Lebanon, and the imposition of effective security arrangements by the international community, must thus prevent Iran and Syria from returning to the status quo ante in Lebanon.

Only if this is done, will Lebanon be able to move toward freedom, "normality" and stability within the international state system.

The second necessary byproduct of Israel's war against Hezbollah will be the ripple effect it will have on the international axis of radical Sunni and Shiite Islamic networks. Radical Islam is nurtured by its perceived successes, just as it is poisoned by its perceived failures. Unfortunately, since the 1979 Iranian Revolution, and particularly following the defeat of Soviet forces by al Qaeda in Afghanistan in 1989, radical Islam has felt "well fed" by its successes against the West.

Osama bin Laden is alive and has been in command since the al Qaeda attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. The United States is bogged down in Iraq. Al Qaeda scored qualitative hits in London and Madrid, and even caused a change of government in the Spanish elections.

Moreover, Israel's unilateral retreat from Lebanon in May 2000 was considered a major victory by Hezbollah, providing important encouragement to then-Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, who, in 2000, based his intifadah strategy on Hezbollah's terror war of attrition in Lebanon from 1982 to 2000.

Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza in September 2005 was also clearly understood by the Palestinians as a vindication of the Hamas terror group's actions, and this led in no small part to the Hamas electoral victory in January this year. The Muslim Brotherhood, the first of the radical political Islamist groups, has since refortified itself in Egypt and Jordan.

Therefore, and in no uncertain terms, the Israeli counteroffensive in Lebanon is one of the last stations at which the apparently runaway train of radical Islam can be stopped, or at least slowed in its tracks.

The West and radical Islam have reached a dramatic, yet still undetermined, turning point: an Israeli victory over Hezbollah would send a critically important signal to the American and Iraqi government forces fighting the radical insurgency in Iraq and Afghanistan, to the Hamas terrorists in Gaza, and to the Hezbollah leadership and its Syrian hosts in Damascus. An Israeli failure would have the opposite effect, strengthening Hamas' terror operations and radical Islamic groups in Europe, and increasing the threats against Jordan, Egypt and other Arab countries.

The third critical byproduct of a successful Israeli campaign would be a blow to Iran. Israel must neutralize Tehran's strategic weapon – Hezbollah – which has been a lever by which Tehran could threaten to ignite the Middle East at will.

Aside from Iran's missile arsenal, Hezbollah is the most flammable match in Iran's weapons cache: if Israel can destroy the threat of Hezbollah missiles from Lebanon, Iran will have lost a key strategic deterrent weapon in which it has invested hundreds of millions of dollars in weaponry, infrastructure, training, command and control in its attempt to "light up" the Middle East.

The stakes in the current war are very high, both for Israel and for the free world. A victory would mean that radical Islam is sent an important message that red lines have been crossed and the free world will not hesitate to engage and defeat what is considered by many to be the most powerful and threatening Islamic terror axis.

However, if Israel is forced into a ceasefire before it has physically neutered Hezbollah, thus isolating Iran and Syria's major command and control terror centre, the implications for Israel, the Middle East and the free world could be devastating.

Opinions

Inspired by a blank page

It just sits there, quiet yet intimidating. Another sermon to be written, and all I have is a blank page. Will I have something inspirational to say?

Inspiration is hard to come by. Maimonides points out that inspiration is like a bolt of lightning: enlightening, sometimes shocking, and extremely uncommon. And so, the blank page taunts me, a reminder of my own uninspired mind.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Rabbis searching for sermons aren't the only people who need inspiration. It's required on a daily basis. Everything significant in life, from relationships to friendships to work, can either be inspired or routine.

Of course, our dull everyday routine is often necessary. We simply can't live in a constant state of high energy. Much like sleep, we all require some quiet routine to replenish our strength. Yet, like sleep, if we slip into the routine all the time, we end up living our lives in a spiritual coma, unaware of the powerful moments that are constantly available to us. Living without inspiration is a true waste of life.

So where do we find the inspiration to fill the blank pages of our lives? Strangely enough, in an empty box. When you give a two-year-old child a toy, they are usually more enchanted with the empty box. To them, a box is filled with possibilities: you can put things in it, turn it upside down and stick it on your head. Two-year-olds know that even an empty box is inspiring.

But a 40-year-old doesn't find inspiration, he uncovers it. A 40-year-old has, over the years, covered the inspiration of an empty box with layer upon layer of routine. To find inspiration, a 40-year-old has to peel back the layers of routine and rekindle that child-like excitement.

When we remove the thick covering of routine, we're inspired by a fresh look at life. At times, we find ourselves enthralled by the little things we take for granted. On other occasions, we are angered by the mediocrity and petty corruption that we're willing to accept as a matter of course. Most importantly, without routine to hold us down, our creativity soars, because we are willing to explore the unfamiliar. The inspiration we need to renew friendships, relationships and work is already within us, waiting to be rediscovered.

As a rabbi, I often find myself settling into a routine, repeating themes, citations and anecdotes. This is why that blank page is so frightening. I'd really like to find something inspiring to say.

Our challenge is clear

The unsought war that Hezbollah and Hamas imposed on Israel has tragically thickened the memorial books of Israel and the Jewish people. Both terrorist groups sought to fulfill their uncompromising genocidal visions by amassing deadly arsenals and launching unprovoked attacks. As a result of this evil, there are dozens of freshly dug graves in Israel, representing shattered families, grieving mourners and lives prematurely cut short. Entering the shivah house of a fallen soldier entails entering a world of heartbreak, of human potential lost, of deep relationships ripped apart, of young vigorous heroes stolen from the people who loved them and whom they loved.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Yaniv Bar-On was a 19½-year-old Israeli tank hero, killed in the first series of Hezbollah ambushes that triggered the conflict. His mother Carleen, a United Talmud Torahs/Herzliah graduate, made aliyah from Chomedey and his maternal grandparents Moish and Raisy Cohen still live in Montreal. In eulogizing Yaniv, his father, Asher, eloquently bid farewell to his "best friend," his brave, sensitive, patriotic and beloved son. Speaking to a crowd of 1,500 enveloped in an eerie, shocked silence, Asher described the beautiful valuefilled life they built in the Israeli suburb of Maccabim as a "bubble" that had been cruelly burst.

Words of comfort fail, even though by doing his duty, Yaniv saved others' lives and served as the first line of defence in a civilizational struggle between the western forces of freedom and nihilistic Islamo-fascists. Noble sentiments are lovely, but the grieving survivors would much prefer to have their loved ones back. There are, however, actions that can honour their lives, further proving that Yaniv and others did not die in vain.

Even as Israel's soldiers mobilized courageously to fight a ruthless enemy, the rest of the country mobilized, too. Of course, the one million Israelis living in the north endured an involuntary mobilization as thousands of lethal Katyushas pummeled their homes. Still, the rest of the country pitched in. Strangers opened their homes and hearts, hosting thousands fleeing the bombardment. Shopping malls, summer camps, amusement parks and hotels all welcomed the northerners, demonstrating extraordinary national unity in a famously fractious country. The pictures from Israel were less dramatic than the pictures from Lebanon, partially because Israelis responded so effectively – just as 50 years ago Israel solved the problems of Jewish refugees from Arab lands by integrating them, rather than keeping them in refugee camps to score political points with their pain.

Amazingly, a vast network of non-profit organizations and individual volunteers bloomed overnight. Shelters and army bases have received mounds of goodies and necessities from organizations such as Lev Echad, which has put young Israelis from all over the country to work helping in Safed and elsewhere. Singers such as David Broza have toured the shelters. Haim Avraham, a national icon whose son Benny Avraham was murdered by Hezbollah in a botched kidnapping in October 2000, has visited military camps, hugging every soldier he's met.

Meanwhile, in the northern hospitals, especially Haifa's Rambam Medical Center, doctors, nurses and administrators work round the clock to care for the wounded. Even as air raid sirens shrieked, even, as in the first two weeks of fighting, 25 Katyushas just missed hitting Rambam, the medical miracle workers operated calmly, efficiently and humanely.

We in the Diaspora should marvel at our Israeli brothers and sisters – and mimic their altruism. We have our part to do, lobbying governments effectively, fighting media libels vigorously, expressing solidarity communally, contacting our Israeli friends individually, visiting the country consistently, and, yes, donating some of our money generously. The needs – to rebuild ruined infrastructure, compensate for lost wages, resupply medical equipment, counsel children, rehabilitate the injured, psychologically comfort the traumatized, and fortify hospitals, communal structures and homes for the future – are vast. Each of us needs to push ourselves, and each other.

A common Israeli phrase of condolence is "Anachnu mishtatfeem be'tzareichem," we participate in your sorrow. The challenge is clear. Are we proving by our actions that we really do participate in the sorrow of dozens of families like the Bar-On family, and will we help them find comfort with the many other mourners of Zion? If the answer is yes, let us do more. And if the answer is no, shame on us all.

Life goes on, but the mood has changed

"Surrealisti" – surreal – is the word she chose to describe us that morning, sipping coffee together at a café beneath her apartment on Rehov ha-Palmach, safe in Jerusalem while the conflagration in the north escalated daily. Chain smoking, she compared Israel's current battle against Hezbollah to her experiences fighting in the 1948 War of Independence.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

By sheer coincidence, I met Netiva Ben-Yehuda at her regular table outside a small grocery store that serves coffee and rolls. By the time my caffee hafuh was ready, all the tables were occupied. The proprietor suggested I sit with the nice woman sitting alone. "She likes company," he said.

Although I had never met Ben-Yehuda, I knew her novels – thinly disguised autobiographical volumes based on her experiences before, during and after Israel's War of Independence. She served in the Palmach, beginning in 1946, and fought alongside such figures as Yitzhak Rabin and Yigal Alon as the commander of a sapper unit, setting and disarming mines. An athlete, she trained for the Olympics as a discus thrower, until a bullet ended her aspirations for athletic competition.

Known for her quick wit, intelligence, and eccentricity, she studied art at the Bezalel Art Academy. Together with Dan Ben-Amotz, she co-authored dictionaries of Hebrew slang, insisting that the language of the street, even when grammatically incorrect, is the mark of a vital and living culture. By now almost 80, she broadcasts a weekly radio program and holds court at a white plastic café table, where passers-by of all ages greet her and stop to chat. She rarely moves beyond the street where she lives, but her finger is on the pulse of the nation.

The word she chose, "surreal," comes up frequently these days, as people go about their usual business in the parts of Israel where the daily hail of missiles have not sent families to the safety of shelters or to friends and relatives in quieter regions. In Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, and Be'er Sheva, people sit in cafes and restaurants with friends, attend films and concerts, and seek ways to entertain those who have come to seek reprieve from the north. Museums, parks, the biblical zoo, local swimming pools, and shopping malls are teeming with children and their parents looking for distraction and shelter from the heat. Scholars continue to use the vast and rich resources of Israel's National Library, local artists organize exhibitions of their work, and neighborhoods organize street fairs. Normal life goes on.

But the atmosphere has changed palpably from the upbeat mood of late spring. Most people are glued to the news, simultaneously checking radio broadcasts and Internet updates every few minutes, or they flick from channel to channel, comparing coverage of the situation on local programs with that on CNN, Fox News and the BBC. Others announce that they need time away from the news, but few remain unplugged for long.

In downtown shops that cater to foreign tourists, proprietors recite psalms, awaiting the infrequent customer looking for hamsas, mezzuzot or kippot. Merchants in all four quarters of Jerusalem's Old City wonder how they will recoup this lost time, which had been predicted as one of economic resurgence. Residents in the north whose businesses depend on summer vacationers – both Israeli and foreign – have already written off this summer. Music and dance festivals have been cancelled, hotels and bed-and-breakfast "zimmerim" (rooms) are deserted in Safed, Tiberias and the Golan. Residents of northern areas know that the economic ripple effect will be felt for a long time.

Meanwhile, volunteers travel to the north to bring succor to children and adults. The Israeli singer David Broza has gone with his guitar from shelter to shelter in the Galilee. Our friend's daughter reads bedtime stories to children who are hunkered down there. Tourists and residents alike line up to donate blood to the mobile blood units in the downtown areas of major cities.

Netiva Ben-Yehuda has often spoken of the devastation of war, and the lack of joy even in winning. "It was necessary," she reflects, "but I still suffer shell shock from 1948." These days, she asks her listeners to call in to share their good news, so that they can hold on to a sense of joy amid the current news. The real joy – the only joy – she notes, would be an enduring and secure peace.

Hezbollah proves to be a formidable enemy

It took Israel six days to defeat Egypt, Syria and Jordan in the 1967 war and three weeks to subdue Egypt, Syria, Iraq and Morocco in the 1973 Yom Kippur War. But after more than three weeks of fighting, the Israeli armed forces are still battling Hezbollah guerrillas in southern Lebanon, while towns and cities in the Galilee are being constantly hammered by Katyusha rockets.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Last week, Israel expanded its ground offensive and Prime Minister Ehud Olmert grimly advised Israelis to steel themselves for "pain, tears and blood." He declared that a ceasefire was not imminent and that the offensive would continue until a multinational peacekeeping force is deployed. But as he delivered these sombre messages, Israelis were surely wondering why Hezbollah had not already been crushed.

When the war on the northern front broke out last month, most Israelis assumed that Hezbollah would be routed in short order. Their assumption hinged on several factors. Hezbollah has neither an air force nor a tank force, and its army consists of only about 3,000 full-time fighters. Israelis who claimed that Hezbollah would be no match for Israel – a regional super power that has won a succession of battles against regular Arab armies – thought Hezbollah would be smashed by a combination of devastating air strikes and decisive infantry and tank assaults. These tactics have worked to Israel's advantage in the Gaza Strip, where Israel is currently engaged in a lower-profile, low-intensity war against the forces of Islamic radicalism, as exemplified by Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

But like so many assumptions that have proven to be overly sanguine, this one melted away in the harsh, blinding light of reality. Two examples will suffice. First, when the elite Golani Brigade penetrated the town of Bint Jbail – a Hezbollah nerve centre – Hezbollah sprang an ambush, killing eight of its soldiers. Second, Israel needed four whole days to take the neighbouring village of Maroun al-Ras, only two kilometres from its border. These setbacks reminded Israelis yet again that Hezbollah – a Shiite force that emerged in the aftermath of Israel's second invasion of Lebanon in 1982 – was indeed a resilient adversary, and that Israel's relationship with the Shiites, who comprise one-third of Lebanon's population, had once been immeasurably better.

When Israel pushed into Lebanon in 1982, Lebanese Shiites, fed up with the state-within-a-state the Palestinians had created in Lebanon after the 1970 civil war in Jordan, welcomed Israeli soldiers with rice and rose water. They were glad that Palestinian militias, commanded by the PLO, had been driven out of the border area they had used as a staging ground to attack Israel. With the PLO vanquished, Israel would no longer have cause to launch retaliatory attacks, and life could return to normal in the Shiite villages of southern Lebanon. But Shiite attitudes toward Israel hardened when it prolonged its occupation. Hezbollah – an Islamic fundamentalist group supported by Iran and Syria – exploited this chaotic situation. For the next 18 years, Hezbollah fought Israel, a conventional army pitted against a guerrilla force.

Hezbollah, a formidable and tenacious enemy, constantly surprised Israel with costly roadside bombings, suicide attacks and ambushes, all of which exacted a terrible toll on Israeli troops. In one horrific incident in 1983, Hezbollah blew up an Israeli encampment in Tyre, slaughtering 75 Israelis. And in a brilliantly executed ambush in 1997, Hezbollah wiped out 12 Israeli commandos.

Palestinians in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and Sunni insurgents in Iraq would copy these tactics with varying degrees of success.

In general, Israel got the better of Hezbollah in clashes, but Israel's mounting casualties were such that the realization set in that its presence in southern Lebanon was untenable. Israel's hasty unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon in May 2000, carried out when on-again, off-again talks with Syria over the Golan Heights finally petered out, was interpreted as a victory by Hezbollah. No sooner had Israel pulled out than Hezbollah, based in the southern suburbs of Beirut and regarded by most Lebanese as liberators, fortified the border region with a web of bunkers, tunnels and emplacements.

As well, Hezbollah took delivery of an arsenal of some 12,000 Iranian and Syrian short-range Katyushas and longer-range Fajr-3, Fajr-5 and Zelzal rockets. Hezbollah also came into possession of laser-guided anti-tank missiles and explosive mines. Compared to the Palestinians, Hezbollah had a highly sophisticated armoury of weapons.

Hezbollah, whose network of schools and health clinics endeared it to Shiites, had the added advantage that its fighters lived among the population, could cynically use civilians as shields and could store weapons, munitions and rockets in homes, institutions and mosques.

Hezbollah, which has 25 seats in Parliament and three posts in the cabinet, never intended to disarm and thus comply with United Nations Security Council Resolution 1559, passed in 2004. And Hezbollah had the support of Emile Lahoud, the pro-Syrian president of Lebanon. On the sixth anniversary of Israel's pullout from southern Lebanon, he said that Hezbollah was entitled to keep its weapons until the Arab-Israeli conflict was resolved.

Shortly after the Israeli army evacuated southern Lebanon, Hezbollah, Syria's surrogate in Lebanon since the withdrawal of Syrian forces last year, began to bombard the Shebaa Farms area – where the borders of Israel, Syria and Lebanon converge – and northern Israel with sporadic rocket and mortar barrages. Israel's response was usually mild. Hezbollah claimed that Shebaa Farms was Lebanese territory, notwithstanding the fact that the United Nations had classified it as Syrian and certified that Israel had officially withdrawn from Lebanon to the international border. The Lebanese government remained complicitly silent as Hezbollah committed aggression.

An Israeli soldier in battle in southern Lebanon

Israel's patience with Hezbollah snapped when it crossed the border in a brazen incident on July 12 in which eight Israeli soldiers were killed, two others were kidnapped and Hezbollah shelled the Galilee. Hezbollah hoped to trade the abducted soldiers for its operatives in Israeli prisons. But Hezbollah miscalculated. Israel hit back hard with air strikes aimed at Hezbollah's bases, rocket launchers and facilities. And Israel struck Lebanon's infrastructure –Beirut airport, power plants, bridges and roads – so as to jolt the Lebanese government and army to act against Hezbollah.

As of last week, Israel claims to have killed 300 Hezbollah fighters and destroyed two-thirds of Hezbollah's long-range missiles and military infrastructure. But much of Hezbollah's arsenal is still intact, which explains why Israel escalated the war by calling up 30,000 reservists, attacking more towns and villages in Lebanon, sending commandos to Baalbek, targeting the Lebanese army and moving toward the Litani River.

Having warned Lebanese civilians to leave the battleground, Israel is raiding localities where rockets have been fired from and where sympathy for Hezbollah is strong. Israel's objective is not to occupy Lebanon, but to "cleanse" the border region of Hezbollah so that a secure buffer zone, patrolled by international peacekeepers, can be established

In the meantime, Israel has not succeeded in neutralizing Hezbollah's rocket-firing capacity, a sure sign that Hezbollah is far from finished. On Aug. 2, Hezbollah lobbed 231 Katyushas, a record, into Israel, and one landed near Beit Shean, the farthest town to come under fire. Nevertheless, Israel is determined to obliterate Hezbollah's military capabilities before a truce takes hold. As Israeli Justice Minister Haim Ramon put it, "If [the war] ends today, it means a victory for Hezbollah, with far-reaching consequences."

Even if a ceasefire is imposed on Israel sooner rather than later, Hezbollah, led by the charismatic Hassan Nasrallah, has already left a deep impression on Israel's psyche and accomplished what no Arab army has achieved since 1948. Hezbollah rockets have pounded Haifa and the Galilee: Afula, Nahariya, Acre, Safed, Tiberias, Rosh Pina, Nazareth, Maalot, Karmiel, Kiryat Shmonah and kibbutzim. Twenty seven civilians, including seven Israeli Arabs, have been killed, hundreds have been injured and nearly 2,000 have been treated for shock. Numerous buildings have been damaged, the port of Haifa has been forced to close and tens of thousands of Israelis have sought refuge in bomb shelters or fled southward. The economic and psychological impact will be felt for years to come.

There is a sense of déjà vu about this conflict. During the 1948 War of Independence, Israel lost one per cent of its population (6,373 civilians and soldiers). During the 1967 war, Jordanian shells hit more than 900 buildings and killed 20 civilians, while Syrian artillery fire damaged a string of settlements. Syrian Frog missiles crashed into kibbutzim during the 1973 war, and in the 1991 Gulf War, 39 Iraqi Scud missiles damaged 4,096 buildings, mainly in Tel Aviv and Haifa, and directly killed one civilian.

Now, in the war in Lebanon, Israel wants to end this vicious cycle once and for all.

Gesher reaches out to kids in Nigeria

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Campers who attended Camp Gesher last month, as well as seniors from the Lodzer Centre Holocaust Congregation, are reaching out to schoolchildren in Nigeria as part of an international program called Art in All of Us.

Rochelle Michaels, the mother of a camper and a Lodzer member, was the catalyst who brought the groups together. She learned of the program after its co-founder, Belgian photographer Anthony Asael, e-mailed her in June to wish her well in her efforts to rid a website of some hate-related postings.

He also asked if she would help bring his project to North America.

When Michaels learned that the headmaster at Nigeria's Rantya School, which has 400 children from ages two through 18, was eager to become involved with the intercultural program, she thought of Camp Gesher and contacted its director Shaul Zobary.

"It was a perfect fit," Zobary told The CJN. "Although we are a Zionist camp concentrating on Judaism and Israel, we also teach our campers to know that we are part of the world... We want to do things to repair the wold because part of our camp is tikkun olam."

The 160 campers, age 10 to 16, who attended the July session of the Labour Zionist summer camp, which is affiliated with the Habonim Dror youth movement, all took part in the project. They used markers to draw pictures and write messages on 10-inch by 10-inch pieces of fabric for the Nigerian children, who are English-speaking Muslims and Christians.

One square depicts three figures, identified by the Muslim crescent, Christian cross and Jewish Star of David over their heads. The accompanying quote reads, "'Let's be friends.' – God."

Members of the Lodzer Congregation, where Habonim Dror's youth program will run as of September, used that square and 29 others to create a tapestry that will be sent to the school as a gift. The remaining 120 pieces will also be sent to the school.

Art in All of Us (artinallofus.org) involves at least 90 countries. It aims to develop creativity, curiosity and artistic sensitivity in children through poetry, drawing and photography.

In addition to finding a school to pair up with the Rantya School on a longer-term basis, either through an exchange of art or letters, Michaels is hoping to help Art in All of Us attract schools across Canada to join its programs. She said the program is "a very simple and grass roots way to bring children together," particularly at a time of "uncertainty... and diminished hope."

For more information about the program, call Michaels at 905-881-8907 or e-mail her at rochelle_michaels@yahoo.ca. Asael can be reached at anthonyasael@artinallofus.org.

Camp Arrowhead holds 50-year reunion

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Excitement is mounting as alumni, parents and campers prepare to celebrate the 50th anniversary of Camp Arrowhead at a reunion on Sunday, Aug. 13, from 2 to 10 p.m.

The fun-filled day will include activities for the entire family, such as memorabilia exhibits, a corn roast, carnival games, sports, arts and crafts, a live animal show, and waterfront activities with boat rides and a ski show. The day will culminate with a fireworks display.

Spearheaded by the Posluns family, Arrowhead was founded on the west side of Lake Simcoe near Belle Ewart in 1955. Many area cottagers who are now parents and grandparents were once campers and have children and grandchildren who attend the camp.

In the 1990s, due to financial problems and a declining camper population, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto took over the camp's land and gave its parent association a 99-year lease while specifying that it be run with Jewish content.

Today, the non-profit camp has 150 campers from ages three to 14 and boasts 280 feet of shoreline in what is now Innisfil.

Heather Goldberg, an early childhood specialist whose family members are longtime cottagers in the area, is president of the Arrowhead Parents Association. A former camper whose two children, Grant, 12, and Emily, 9, now attend Arrowhead, she said that the camp started with 20 children in 1955 and today, "each year the numbers are increasing, as many young people are buying cottages in the area."

Campers, staff and parents "can all remember the fun times and numerous stories of our experiences at the camp," said reunion chair Charles (Chuck) Katzman. "It was a place where everyone knew your name, and of course, knew two more members of your extended family. Camp provided us all the opportunity to form some great friendships, learn some valuable life skills, but most of all, it was a great place to have fun."

Debbie Snider, who attended Arrowhead from 1956 to 1965, said she has fond recollections of its early days: Sabbath services led by Freda Steinberg, the first Arrowhead camp director; songs written by Joanne Rutherford; skits performed by campers; and visits to nearby Watermans grocery store for candy.

Goldberg said there was always a special Camp Arrowhead spirit, "and we hope that it will continue for many years to come."

The cost for the reunion is $30 for adults and $12 for children under 12. For details, call 416-638-9687, or visit www.camparrowhead.ca.

Yad Vashem program helps teachers at non-Jewish schools

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

When Clint Lovell, a 43-year-old history teacher in Barrie, Ont., began his career almost 20 years ago, many students in Ontario were learning nothing about the Holocaust.

"Quite honestly, unless you [as a teacher] did [Holocaust education] yourself, it didn't happen," he said in a phone interview last week. Until last year, when Holocaust education was made mandatory in the Ontario high school curriculum, teaching of the subject was "sort of haphazard."

Clint Lovell

Last month, Lovell, along with 12 other teachers from across the country, attended an intensive 18-day seminar at Yad Vashem in Israel on teaching the Holocaust and anti-Semitism. A total of 41 educators, including some from the United States, England, Poland and Slovakia, took part in the program.

Thousands of educators from around the world have completed the seminars, which have been held at Yad Vashem's International School for Holocaust Studies since 1981.

"All our efforts now are in the direction of sending more and more teachers," said Goldi Steiner, chair of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem's continuing Holocaust education committee. "Our hope is that we will build a strong team, and that we will bear on the educational system in Canada."

Lovell, who teaches at Barrie's Eastview Secondary School, said that many of his students probably have not met a Jewish person.

Steven Rosseel

He sees bringing in guest speakers who are Holocaust survivors as "a huge responsibility," knowing that such opportunities will be available only for a finite time.

The Yad Vashem program, with faculty that "you've only read about," helps teachers avoid common pitfalls in teaching the Holocaust, Lovell believes. "Often, there's a huge emphasis on perpetrators and, partially, on victims. There's very little on bystanders or life before the war."

Limited teaching time is a problem, he noted. A typical course unit runs only for six or seven periods of 76 minutes each.

Steven Rosseel, 38, who teaches at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) at the University of Toronto, said one of the reasons he felt it was important to take part in the seminar was the "incredible amount of racism and discrimination" in the world.

"I think if we're not well informed about the past, these types of atrocities are going to continue to happen."

When he taught the Holocaust as part of a section on Judaism in a world-religions course at the high school level, he never felt completely confident, Rosseel said. "Now I have a much better understanding of the events that took place during the Holocaust, and what life in Jewish prewar Europe was like as well."

He believes that his experience at Yad Vashem will have an exponential impact through the 150 future teachers in his classes, he said.

He plans to discuss the Holocaust in the justice and ethics section of a theology course for prospective teachers in the Catholic school system, and to include it in a world-religions course he also teaches. In addition, he said he would like to plan an evening program for OISE students on Holocaust education. Like Lovell, however, he noted that the time he can devote to one aspect of a course is limited.

More than going through the motions

By RABBI MICHAEL SKOBAC

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

Judaism is commonly understood to be a very action-oriented religion. We've even come to describe commitment to Judaism based on levels of "observance." Demographers and community planners are drawn to visible indicators of Jewish commitment that can be quantified – Shabbat observance, kashrut, tzedakah, Torah study and involvement with Israel. Yet the Torah repeatedly whispers to us that there is more – an inner and ultimate goal – to "love the Lord your God" (Deuteronomy 11:13, 22).

The contrast between religion and spirituality has been compared to the difference between reading a menu and eating the meal. When we recite the foundational Shema Yisrael prayer twice each day – "And you shall love the Lord your God with all your heart" – we are encountering Judaism's menu. We only begin to nourish ourselves spiritually when this recitation leads to contemplation. What does it mean to love God? Why should I love the Creator? How do I express this love? What should I do if I'm not feeling anything?

We have a long history of writers who have lamented the all-too-common reality of the practice of Judaism falling short of this mark. The prophet Isaiah (29:13) relates how God Himself bemoans those who serve Him "with their mouths and lips, but their hearts are far from Me and their reverence of Me is acted out mechanically." In the 18th century, Rabbi Moshe Chaim Luzzatto's seminal work Path of the Just begins with an observation of how common this superficiality is and the vital need for a conscious engagement with the spiritual bottom-line of Judaism.

Love of God is often associated in the Torah with the directive to "serve Him with all your heart" (Deuteronomy 10:12; 11:13). The service of God is identified by the Talmud as prayer (Taanit 2a). Significantly, the love and service of God are connected with the ultimate spiritual goal of dveikut – cleaving to God, striving to totally attach ourselves to Him (Deuteronomy 10:20; 11:22). One of the meanings of the Hebrew word for prayer, tfillah, carries the idea of bonding and connection. Clearly, prayer is meant to be far more than the mere recitation of liturgy. According to Rav Chaim Soloveitchik, prayer is to be a time when we are to palpably experience ourselves standing in the presence of God.

Rabbi Luzzatto describes the fostering of this personal connection with God as life's greatest achievement and greatest pleasure. Along these lines, the chassidic master Rabbi Shlomo of Karlin offered a wonderfully creative take on the Torah's directive to thank God after consuming a meal. The portion of Eikev contains the source for our Birkat HaMazon (Grace after Meals): "and you shall eat and you shall be satisfied and you shall bless the Lord your God" (Deuteronomy 8:10). The Karliner refocuses us: "and you shall eat, and you shall be satisfied when you bless the Lord your God!"

Of course, the sensitivity needed to nurture and take pleasure in developing this relationship with God doesn't come easily. Bachya Ibn Pakuda's classic Duties of the Heart suggests that it's impossible to progress spiritually if we are preoccupied with mundane pleasures and worldly concerns. The Torah relates that the miraculous daily manna that God provided to the Jewish people during their desert trek after leaving Egypt was a test. The Italian Bible commentator Rabbi Ovadiah Sforno explained that the test was whether the people would be attentive to God if they wouldn't have to worry about their livelihood.

The lure of materialism is certainly powerful, and we must be extremely determined to withstand the test of affluence. One of the miracles in the Holy Temple was that the rains (geshamim) never extinguished the pyres on the altar. May we, as well, retain our spiritual passion amidst the bounty (gashmiyut) that we have been blessed with.

Yaakov's lesson has urgent resonance

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

This week's Torah portion, Eikev, describes the commitments that both God and Israel have to each other through the Covenant. The parshah is filled with beautiful statements of loyalty and trust, and involvement and outcome. The sense of responsibility that one feels when reading it serves to underscore how every action we take and every interaction we have with others is an expression of ourselves at that moment, as well as of our eternal and never-ending relationship with God. And as always, the text makes timeless connections for us through the use of a single word. In this instance that word is the name of the portion, Eikev.

Most often in this verse, the word "eikev" is translated as "because" or "since." Quite literally, the word "eikev" means "on the heels of," but it's easy to see how it gains the meaning "because." If one event occurs on the heels of another event, we see the two as connected by cause and effect. In this sense, the second event is seen not just as occurring after the first, but rather occurring because of the first. In English, the translator will skip the literal meaning of "on the heels of," since it makes a sentence complex. The word "because" conveys the meaning of the literal phrase while not bogging a reader down with difficult and flowery ancient language. After all, what difference could one word make?

Yet to anyone hearing the word "eikev" in Hebrew, the immediate connection is made by the ear. Our patriarch, Yaakov, bears the Hebrew name that comes from the same root, "eikev." He was born on the heels of his twin brother, Eisav, and, therefore, was named for this action. In fact, Eisav will accuse his younger twin, Yaakov, of nipping at his heels several times, and this will express itself in a dangerous anger that Eisav feels toward Yaakov.

As a result of Yaakov gaining the birthright blessing from his father, Isaac, Eisav vows to kill Yaakov, and Yaakov must run to his uncle's camp outside the Land of Israel. He will remain with his uncle for many years while he builds his family and his fortune. When it's time for Yaakov to return to the Land of Israel, he must face the challenge of facing his brother Eisav after so many years of what has likely been a build-up of rage on Eisav's part.

Yaakov is the only Patriarch to willingly leave Israel and build a life elsewhere. He is the first Patriarch to then return to what is likely an unstable and dangerous situation. We watch as the Torah describes Yaakov carefully strategizing how to encounter his brother. We listen as the Torah describes how Yaakov sends messages of goodwill and peace toward his twin. We take note as the Torah describes how Yaakov makes preparations, should the worst occur.

The midrash at that moment tells us that Yaakov sent a final message to Eisav. It stated: if you are prepared for peace, I am with you. If you are prepared for war, I am ready. Yaakov taught us that we must stand prepared at all times. Inviting peace includes being ready for its rejection. Both positions are positions of strength.

In the Torah portion Eikev, in the book of Deuteronomy, which speaks of Moses addressing the children of Israel, the descendants of the Patriarch, Yaakov, the appearance of that single word is essential. "Eikev" connects the Jewish Patriarch who re-entered the Land of Israel to the nation as it prepares to enter the land after hundreds of years, and to us as we stand with Israel now and forever.

Getting shivers from a piece of clay

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

This year, as we approached one of the darkest days in our religious calendar, it was worthwhile to ponder the historical/archeological evidence behind this commemoration. We know that the Temple was destroyed twice in our history. It is interesting to note that archeology has revealed a number of other shrines with altars that were set up at different places. These shrines sometimes competed with the central Temple in Jerusalem, especially those in the breakaway northern kingdom of Israel that were set up in direct competition with Solomon's Temple. It's interesting to note that almost all of the shrines that have been excavated ceased to exist by the reigns of the reforming monarchs, Hezekiah in the eighth century BCE, and Josiah in the late seventh century BCE.

It was in Hezekiah's reign that Judah had to face the devastating assault of the Assyrian armies led by Sennacherib around 701 BCE. We have accounts of this invasion in the Bible, as well as Sennacherib's version. Sennacherib destroyed many cities as he converged on Jerusalem. Archeology has vividly borne out the ferocity of his attack, especially at the city of Lachish. Baruch Halpern, chair of Judaic studies at Penn State University, has put forward the idea that the centralization of both worship and the monarchy can be traced to Hezekiah's efforts to preserve a remnant of the kingdom from the invading Assyrians. His reforms were centred on Solomon's Temple and the institution of the monarchy.

Jerusalem escaped the wrath of the Assyrians, but 115 years later, it would not be so fortunate. Seventy-five years after Hezekiah's reign, his grandson Josiah ascended the throne. Josiah completed the reforms of his grandfather and destroyed those shrines that had survived Hezekiah's zeal. Josiah was considered to be the most righteous of Judah's rulers. Some have even thought of him as a prototype for the Messiah. But his premature death in battle at Megiddo (Armageddon) against the Egyptians was a complete mystery to those who believed that a righteous life ensured one of a death at a ripe, old age. Less than 25 years after Josiah's death, Jerusalem would lie in ruins and the Temple would be destroyed.

I was involved in the excavation of one of the most fascinating series of artifacts found on Israeli soil dating to these tumultuous years. It was a hot Jerusalem summer in 1982, around the Ninth of Av, when we were digging at the base of the Stepped Stone Structure in the City of David. The destruction wrought by the Babylonians more than 2,500 years ago was still vividly visible in an ash level that was over a metre thick. Out of that ash would emerge more than 50 bullae (inscribed clay seals). As we cleaned them, a name emerged that sounded familiar: Gemaryahu Ben Shaphan, a man who was inextricably linked to those tumultuous events and to the prophet Jeremiah. We quickly went to our Tanachs and read the following amazing words:

"In the fifth year of Jehoiakim, the son of Josiah, king of Judah, in the ninth month, all the people in Jerusalem and all the people who came from the cities of Judah to Jerusalem, proclaimed a fast before the Lord. Then in the hearing of the people, Baruch read the words of Jeremiah from the Scroll, in the house of the Lord, in the chamber of Gemariah the son of Shaphan, the secretary, which was in the upper court, at the entry of the New Gate of the the Lord's House." (Jeremiah 36:9-10)

I tried to to make personal sense of this small piece of clay that I held in my hand. It tied me to one of the pivotal events in our long history. Even now, I get shivers thinking about it. Here I was in a new Jewish state that had arisen, phoenix-like, from the ashes of the old. My wife was pregnant with our first child. Her parents had survived the awful cataclysm of the Holocaust. For me this event symbolizes our history: past–forward.

Tehillim/Psalms – Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

I will lift up my eyes to the mountains.
From where does my help come?
My help comes from the Lord, who made heaven and earth!
– Psalm 121:1-2

The Jewish Highway

As thousands of Jews around the world recite Psalms on behalf of their brothers and sisters in Israel, I continue my look at Internet Tehillim resources.

Although the Psalms are most closely identified as being the work of King David, Rabbi Boruch Clinton points out that Jewish tradition tells us there were contributions from other personalities such as Moses – although King David is credited with the vast majority. Rabbi Clinton adds that although the popular image of David is that of a tremendous warrior king, we should not lose sight of his role as a great Torah scholar…" [http://tinyurl.com/judjk]

Judaism has always believed in the power of prayer, particularly when it is said as part of a community. Tehillim Hotline is a network of volunteers who divide Tehillim among the volunteers and together complete reciting 10 cycles of the book of Tehillim daily. As well, you can submit a name of someone to be added to the list of people on whose behalf the Tehillim is being said. [www.tehillimhotline.org/]

Similarly, GlobalYeshiva operates a bulletin board onto which you can add the names of people who need prayers. The site includes some details about the suffering that these people are enduring – everything from serious illnesses to natural disasters. [http://tinyurl.com/kmv3p]

If you want to have a deeper understanding of the prayers you are reciting, then listen to Rabbi Yaakov D. Homnick, who presents four one-hour lectures on Tehillim. The series starts with an in-depth look at the first chapter of Psalms and delves into what makes a good person. [http://tinyurl.com/jm7g5]

Speaking of portability, technology makes it easy to read Tehillim when you want where you want. JewishContent.org offers for your Palm device a download of the entire book in the original Hebrew. This site offers every book of the Tanach for download, as well as complete prayer services. [http://tinyurl.com/fk68k]

Perhaps one of the most well-known and beloved psalms is number 145, better known as Ashrei. Rav Avraham Yitzhak Kook, the first chief rabbi of Israel, examines the importance of this psalm, which is organized alphabetically according to the letters of the Hebrew alphabet. "These letters are the 'building blocks' of the Torah. When we praise God with all of these letters, we recognize that closeness to God is attained through the Torah's enlightenment." Rabbi Kook offers insights to dozens of other psalms on this site. [http://tinyurl.com/edyjm]

Rabbi Simkha Y. Weintraub suggests an interesting and practical way to help you internalize and understand the Psalms. "Words of Psalms can be valuable tools in refocusing, centring and quieting oneself, as a kind of Jewish mantra." He lists 18 phrases that can be recited at almost any time in order to help you elevate the most routine activities of your day. [http://tinyurl.com/pso8g]

If you come across a psalm that you have difficulty comprehending, Rabbi Weintraub has created a form you can fill in to help you extract the essence of the psalm's message. [http://tinyurl.com/mzpgk]

When Varda Branfman was growing up, she thought that the Psalms had been written in "High English by some medieval cleric" and never associated anything Jewish with them. In two lovely essays, she explains how she rediscovered the beauty and importance of Tehillim after she moved to Israel. [http://tinyurl.com/fwuqu]

Branfman then explains how important Tehillim were to her as she saw her mother succumb to illness. "In the last three months of my mother's life, I say more Tehillim than I have said in the last 15 years. She is semi-conscious, and I sit beside her bed as the Tehillim pour out of me… When I open up the Tehillim, I sense my soul speaking to her soul in a time and place that is beyond the reality of the hospital bed. I am shaking inside, but my voice is steady. The words of Tehillim are absorbed through her permeable skin. They are the last words I speak to my mother before she leaves this World." [http://tinyurl.com/j3yth]

Camp Robin Hood celebrates its 60th anniversary

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

Two hundred families spent a hot Sunday at Camp Robin Hood recently celebrating its 60th anniversary.

"There was swimming, archery, canoeing and use of the climbing wall," said Howie Grossinger, the camp director.

The Duffle Bag Theatre Troupe performed the play Robin Hood in the afternoon. Other activities at the July 30th event included playing on inflatable slides and trampolines.

Camp Robin Hood day camp, located in Markham on 50 acres of land, offers nearly 50 activities to campers, including low ropes, a petting zoo, biking and pottery.

There are 900 campers, from the ages of three to 15, and 320 staff members at Camp Robin Hood.

The camp was established in 1946 by teachers and social workers, said executive director Larry Bell, who has owned it since 1964.

Bell began his career as a swimming director at the camp in 1961. Bell's wife, Pearl, also started her career as the camp nurse in the early '60s.

"The camp actually started out of Sherwood Park in Toronto. The park had recreational facilities, and they used North Toronto Collegiate and Northern Secondary School for their swimming pools," said Bell.

Pearl and Larry Bell

"The kids all day long would be walking uphill to the school and downhill to the ravines and the areas where the program was taking place."

Camp Robin Hood is non-denominational, but about 75 to 80 per cent of the campers as well as staff members are Jewish, said Bell.

"We've always felt that that it has been very healthy in that the non-Jewish children get to meet the Jewish children and recognize that children are children, and we all live by the same values, so we learn to respect the other community," he said.

"[Camp Robin Hood] has always been a very open environment," he noted.

Michael Lipson, who sends his seven-year-old son, Jonah, to Camp Robin Hood, has complete trust in the camp.

"The staff and environment are wonderful for the kids. We love the people here and love supporting Robin Hood," he said.

Other Robin Hood-owned camps include Robin Hood Sports Academy, Madawaska, Roger Neilson's Hockey Camp, S.A.C. Summer Camps and Camp Walden overnight camp.

Summer Dreams, an organization that helps send disadvantaged children to summer camps throughout Ontario, was established by 12 former Camp Robin Hood campers and staff members of 10 years ago. Since its inception, Summer Dreams has raised more than $200,000 and 300 children have attended summer camp.

Parents of kids with disabilities not alone: activist

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Author and social activist Miriam Edelson was in the midst of writing her latest book, Battle Cries: Justice for Kids with Special Needs (Sumach Press), when her son Jake died.

Born in 1990 with the neurological disorder lissencephaly, Jake was not expected to live more than a few years, but he beat the odds and celebrated his bar mitzvah in 2003. He died the following spring.

Edelson had begun writing the book because she wanted to know how other parents of children with disabilities managed.

"I wanted to know what worked for them in terms of services, and how they built a sense of community around them," Edelson said in an interview.

Although she stopped writing for a time after Jake's death, she said, she eventually carried on ."I have another child, Emma-Maryse, now 14. She needs me not to lose my balance, so I grieve and keep going."

Also the author of My Journey with Jake: A Memoir of Parenting and Disability, Edelson's message in her new book is that having a child who is disabled can be difficult, "but parents are not alone."

In addition to a section on current services and support available to disabled children and their families, she interviewed eight Canadian families, including one living in Sweden, and talks about the roadblocks families face.

"When a disabled child is born, parents [need to become] a sponge for information about services and programs. Start making phone calls. Ask questions, and always have a notebook ready."

Parents need formal support, she said, but they also need a sense of community. "They need to find families in the same situation and build community around the child.

"Look on the Internet, or ask the hospital to set you up with a support group. Sometimes you're not ready, but when you do take the first step you'll find a great deal of support."

At the beginning, she said, "it's like you're in a different country. You don't know the language and customs. Suddenly, however, you find people who speak your language.

"Advocating for your child isn't rocket science, but you do have to take steps that no one teaches you. Learning to advocate means learning not to take 'no' for an answer. You have to be insistent and assertive. Not everyone has honed these skills. Mothering [brings on] adrenaline."

Edelson said she wouldn't change anything about her experience with Jake.

"There is a lot of richness. Children give back an enormous amount within their limits. [Jake] made me more compassionate. Our kids will not be prime ministers, but they have the same need to be loved and cared for," she said.

"It's not that parenting [a child with disabilities] is totally different, but there are aspects that are more intense. There are ongoing appointments, and you are always going to the doctor. Parenting [can become] very public."

Canadians are better off than people living in a number of other countries, she said, but one of the key issues here is respite care.

"It can come in a number of ways. Sometimes people come into the home, or the child can go away for a week. Mothers have to pace themselves. They can't think of themselves as supermoms. Respite care would enable parents to care for their kids longer. A lot of parents feel marginalized if they can't get out."

In Edelson's interview with the Canadian parent living in Sweden with his disabled child, he talks about the support the child receives "in a wide range of publicly funded programs, schooling and personal assistance. He decried the lack of programs and resources available to Canadian children with severe disabilities and their families."

Edelson feels strongly about the need for a spectrum of support. "Some kids are better off with their parents, while others may benefit from a positive, well-run facility. There has to be room for both possibilities."

Edelson felt a "kind of kinship" with the parents she interviewed for her book, she said. "We felt we were members of the same club, and we even kibbitzed, because that is the way to deal with things.

"Disabilities come in many packages, and so do families, but the challenges are universal."

United Church should reconsider resolution

By MANUEL PRUTSCHI

Comment

There are currently two United Church of Canada (UCC) resolutions aimed at punishing Israel economically. Both are allegedly intended to promote Israeli-Palestinian peace. One is a 2003 Toronto Conference motion, and the other is a national proposal. The Toronto Conference motion was revived in June 2006. The national proposal has been submitted for the consideration of the UCC's General Council, which is meeting Aug. 13 in Thunder Bay.

While the UCC has attempted to distance itself from the Toronto Conference, the two resolutions are quite similar. The UCC's proposal essentially differs from the Toronto motion only in that the latter speaks of both boycott and divestment, while divestment is the single focus of the former. A fair reading of the two documents would conclude that this is a distinction without much of a difference.

UCC's national proposal is an unequivocal call for divestment. It is totally one-sided, recognizes only a whitewashed version of the Palestinian narrative (ignoring corruption, terrorism and anti-Semitism), identifies Israel as the guilty party, unjustly seeks to punish Israel and is counterproductive.

The proposal describes the occupation in a way that places Israeli responsibility at the heart of the situation. Nothing has better shown the fallacy in the idea that ending the occupation will end the conflict than the lethal missiles Hamas and Hezbollah have been raining down upon Israeli cities, towns and agricultural settlements from precisely the two areas where there is no longer an Israeli occupation: Gaza and Lebanon.

Boycott and divestment are egregious policies. The Toronto Conference on June 28, however, went shockingly far beyond this in its publicly expressed endorsement of an anti-Israel resolution passed by Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) Ontario at its convention on May 27.

Manuel Prutschi

CUPE Ontario's resolution No. 50 smears Israel as an "apartheid state." In other words, the Jewish state (where all its citizens, irrespective of race, religion or ethnicity, enjoy full and equal rights) is obscenely accused of practising in the 21st century the racism that apartheid South Africa practised in the 20th, with the clear implication that a Jewish Israel, like an apartheid South Africa, has to be dismantled. This intention is reinforced by Resolution 50's support of the so-called Palestinian "right of return." The resulting demographic shift from the influx of millions of Palestinians exercising this "right" would bring the existence of Israel as the world's only Jewish state to an end.

The Toronto Conference's actions demonstrate how boycott and/or divestment policies put their proponents on a slippery slope that can quickly lead to the pursuit of an extremist, anti-Israel agenda. The United Church's boycott and divestment initiatives have to be understood in the context of the fact that this is a well-orchestrated global campaign to clothe what are in fact calculated anti-Israel actions in the fig leaf of so-called "ethical" economic measures that allegedly have "peace" as their objective.

The real purpose of these measures is to isolate Israel from the international community, and no matter how "nuanced" (and nuance is, in fact, part of the strategy) they might be, their ultimate effect is to marginalize and delegitimize Israel and give comfort and encouragement to its enemies.

Divestment, in its misguided attempt to punish Israel, is unjust, based on wrong premises and counterproductive to achieving peace. Moreover, it detracts from the UCC's constructive involvement in promoting reconciliation among the faith communities of the Middle East and endangers the good, carefully nurtured relations between the United Church and the Jewish community in Canada.

We call on the United Church at its upcoming national General Council to reject divestment as a policy and instead opt for positive investment in Palestinian and Israeli economic development and the promotion of confidence-building projects and coexistence programs that build bridges for peace.

Hillel volunteers build with Habitat for Humanity

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

Jewish students traded in their textbooks for hard hats one day last month when Hillel of Greater Toronto volunteered to help build homes for families in need.

Sixteen students from York University, Ryerson University, Seneca College and the University of Toronto gave their time at a construction site in Etobicoke with Habitat for Humanity, a non-profit organization that builds homes with the help of soon-to-be homeowner families, volunteers and donations.

The families that will receive these homes must contribute at least 500 hours of volunteer labour and hold a job.

Devora Schwartz, director of social action programming for Hillel of Greater Toronto, was inspired to organize a volunteer day for Habitat in Toronto after leading two groups of Jewish students to the Gulf Coast of the southern United States to help build homes with the organization after Hurricane Katrina.

"When we came back [from the Gulf Coast], I thought it would be great if the students got involved here. This is our first time Hillel is volunteering for Habitat in Toronto," Schwartz said.

"At Hillel we believe that tikkun olam [repairing the world] extends beyond the Jewish community. There was a need for help in Toronto, and we felt compelled to respond. I'm hoping that this will be the beginning of a regular volunteer program with Habitat for Humanity."

Hillel's group helped to construct what will be 10 brand-new townhouses on Etobicoke's lakeshore, mostly for single-parent families with children. A long waiting list exists for families who want to benefit from Habitat.

This is not the first time Hillel of Greater Toronto has reached out to the non-Jewish community. In the past, students have helped the homeless with Ve'ahavta's van program, and they've also volunteered at food drives and run tutoring programs for disadvantaged youth.

U of T students Elayna Fremes, 20, and Sara Greenwood, 21, volunteered with Habitat for Humanity for the first time on July 26.

"It's a project I always wanted to be involved in but never had the opportunity," said Fremes as she and Greenwood put up Tyvek paper to waterproof the outside of some houses.

"If you're raised in a Jewish environment, you want to help other people — not just by giving money but by physically helping those who are less fortunate," Greenwood said.

"There are many different ways to be striving toward a better society, whether it's policy-making, lobbying or volunteering. All the pieces are important in order to truly make a difference," Fremes added.

With only 16 spots available for this session, Hillel received such a substantial response that it could not accommodate everyone who was interested in volunteering.

"A lot of people want to volunteer with Habitat. People like the hands-on aspect and want to do something physically," Fremes said.

"The difference between Habitat for Humanity and other charities is that here, you can see your results," Greenwood said.

Brock U's new president is an expert in Judaism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Brock University's new president, Jack Lightstone, is an expert in early Judaism.

Lightstone, 55, assumed his position in St. Catharines last month, a day after his daughter's marriage in Montreal, his home for many years.

Prior to his latest appointment, he spent 10 years as provost and vice-rector of Concordia University, where he was also a professor of history in the school's department of religion.

Born in Ottawa, Lightstone wrote his Brown University doctoral thesis on the history of religions, concentrating on Judaism.

"My research interest was the origins of the rabbinic movement in the first several centuries after the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE," he said.

"I still have an abiding interest in this question, but today go about exploring it in a very different way than I did when I was pursuing my PhD studies and research.

Jack Lightstone

"Most of my published work and conference papers deal with Judaism in the cultural, political, economic and social contexts of the Hellenistic and Roman worlds in the Middle East and Mediterranean basin.

"Our knowledge of the period and of the primary documents from the early rabbinic movement are much more developed and sophisticated today. Therefore, approaches to research in this field have also changed."

At Concordia, Lightstone's area of expertise was in what he describes as "the social, historical and social anthropological study of religion."

While at Concordia, Lightstone also founded the Institute for Cultural and Social Diversity, which facilitates individual and team research in the dynamics of contemporary societies.

An avid reader, hiker, jogger, swimmer and skier, he is Brock University's fifth president and succeeds Terry Boak. His term of office is five years.

Asked whether he is Brock's first Jewish president, he replied, "Honestly, I do not know, though I suspect I am. I never asked, and they never told me, and that is how it should be in our society today, a complete non-issue."

At Brock, he has clear goals in mind.

"Brock has undergone rapid and significant development. Its enrolment has grown from about 9,000 full-time students to about 17,000, and it has hired almost 300 new professors," Lightstone said.

"Having grown so rapidly, Brock will likely not significantly grow in size over the next few years. What it will do is grow significantly in vocation," he added.

"For most of its existence, Brock was a largely undergraduate teaching university. Now it has taken upon itself the task of adding significant research activities and post-graduate programs in a wide gamut of areas and disciplines."

Lightstone believes that the faculty can achieve these objectives.

He accepted the presidency because he wanted to be part of Brock's transition to a new era. "To facilitate such a self-transformation seemed an opportunity not to be missed," he said.

Fluent in French and Hebrew, Lightstone has a strong personal affinity to the traditions of Judaism and keeps kosher.

"My area of academic expertise immerses me in classical Jewish sources on a daily basis," he said. "If study of these texts is an important Judaic ritual, then that is one I fulfil in spades."

Lightstone's wife, Dorothy, is also a teacher, being a professor of psychology and applied human science, as well as a clinical therapist.

CIJR marks 18th year

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — It began as a project in the basement of Concordia University professor Frederick Krantz's home in the days of the first intifadah with a few academics trying to counter what they viewed as media bias against Israel.

Eighteen years later, the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR) may not be as grand as its name suggests, but it's still working daily to make Israel's case known and to represent an unapologetically hawkish viewpoint.

Its main activity today is an online digest of topical articles about Israel, the Middle East and Jewish affairs gleaned from English-language publications worldwide and e-mailed to an estimated 60,000 recipients internationally.

The CIJR also continues to put out the quarterly hard-copy Israfax, which contains reprinted and original articles, and is the sole supporter of the student publication Dateline, which appears once a semester. Equipping Jewish students to be knowledgeable advocates for Israel on campus and after graduation is another major activity for the institute.

It maintains a massive archive of articles and documents, collected and indexed over its history, which will soon be accessible on its website. From time to time, the CIJR also sponsors or co-sponsors speakers to come to Montreal.

All this has been accomplished without any secure funding. The CIJR receives no money from the organized Jewish community, although it has repeatedly sought support, said Krantz, its volunteer director.

The CIJR has only one professional staff member, its youthful assistant director Jacqueline Douek, who works with a full-time volunteer, research chair Baruch Cohen, now 86, who has been with the CIJR since it began. They are assisted occasionally by student interns, as funds allow.

In recognition of its milestone anniversary, the CIJR's annual fundraiser was a little more elaborate this year. On Aug. 9, Irwin Beutel, its national chair for 12 years, was honoured with the Lion of Judah Award.

The next edition of Israfax is due to be published this month. As for the future, Krantz said his hope is to increase the distribution of the CIJR's publications and possibly launch a monthly magazine, as well to strengthen the institute's presence outside Montreal and organize a mission to Israel.

Longtime Winnipeg rabbi moves to St. Louis

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Winnipeggers who regularly attend the alternative High Holy Day services at Etz Chayim Synagogue will be happy to know that Rabbi Neal Rose and his wife Carol will once again be leading them this year.

But Winnipeg will be seeing much less of the couple after that. That's because for the next two years, Rabbi Rose will be serving as scholar-in-residence at Congregation Bnai Amoona in St. Louis, Mo.

Rabbi Rose was drawn to Congregation Bnai Amoona by the presence of his son, Rabbi Carni Rose (a former chief rabbi of Tokyo), who is the 125-year-old Conservative synagogue's senior rabbi. The elder Rabbi Rose and his wife also have four grandchildren in St. Louis.

Bnai Amoona, he said, has a membership of more than 800 families, some of whom are descendants of its founding members.

Originally from New York, Rabbi Rose and his wife arrived in Winnipeg in August 1967. For the next 33 years, he taught at the University of Manitoba first in the Judaic studies department and, later, after the department was disbanded, in the department of religion.

He taught courses on Yiddish, the Holocaust and Jewish thought, as well as courses on good and evil, death and the afterlife, religion and art, and religion and dreams. He also served as a rabbi in the Jewish community, and he and Carol offered family counselling services. For the past five years, he has been serving as director of spiritual care at the Sharon Home seniors residence.

Carol Rose first taught adult education courses for the evening program at Rosh Pina Congregation (which merged with two other north Winnipeg Conservative congregations four years ago to form Etz Chayim), and she worked for Temple Shalom's Sunday school. She also did some USY work and served as an assistant in the Rosh Pina kindergarten.

When her two older children reached school age, she returned to university to complete degrees in religious studies and education. She taught preschool in the Jewish day school system for many years. She and Leona Lakser started the first all-day kindergarten program in the community, and she was also involved in starting Aleph Bet, Winnipeg's first Jewish day-care centre.

In more recent years, she has become a published author and poet, and a teacher of spirituality.

The couple was in St. Louis from mid-January to mid-May. "I was doing some special projects," Rabbi Rose said. "As a result, [Congregation Bnai Amoona] invited me to serve as scholar-in-residence for the next two years.

In his new role, Rabbi Rose said he will be continuing his educational programs, doing outreach to intermarried couples, teaching advanced courses and doing interfaith work. Carol will remain in Winnipeg until November. In St. Louis, she will be teaching imagery courses and conducting workshops, and she also hopes to do some writing.

Rabbi Rose notes that he will continue to be available to advise the Sharon Home as it proceeds with its expansion and consolidation plans in south Winnipeg. He and Carol also hope to be back in Winnipeg to lead High Holy Day services next year.

As to returning to Winnipeg, they say they intend to come back in two years, but that could change.

ISRAEL EMERGENCY CAMPAIGN 2007

THE ISRA CAMPAIG

Prime Minister

Dear Friends,

For the past several weeks, the State of Israel has been engaged in a struggle for its very survival. Following the complete withdrawals from Lebanon and the Gaza Strip, we were subjected to unprovoked attacks on our sovereign territory, culminating in the kidnapping of three of our soldiers and the deaths of 10 others. Since then, Israel has been subjected to a barrage of missiles launched from both the Gaza Strip and Lebanon, intentionally targeting over one million innocent civilians, killing several and wounding hundreds of others.

We will continue to take determined and forceful steps to bring our captured soldiers home safe and sound, keep the Hezbollah out of Southern Lebanon and weaken the terrorist infrastructures established in Gaza and Lebanon. We have every desire to live in peace with our neighbors, however we must determinedly reject every attempt to subjugate us and force us to relinquish our right to security and peace: we will not rest until the security of Israel's citizens is ensured, and until there is peace and tranquility in our land. Our greatest desire is a peaceful and normal life – something taken for granted in many places.

The unexpected conflict has led to a major increase in defense spending, and the repercussions are likely to be felt far into the future. In addition, agriculture, manufacturing and the tourism industry have been severely impacted by the constant missile attacks in the North.

At times like these, I am strengthened by the courage, fortitude and stamina of the citizens of Israel, and the unwavering solidarity of our fellow Jews around the world. United Israel Appeal of Canada and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto have long been staunch partners in the Zionist enterprise, especially in our most troubled times. We appreciate your generosity and steadfastness.

Wishing you a successful campaign,

Sincerely,
Ehud Olmert

Together with Israel.
Together as One.

As you read this, the State of Israel is enduring one of its most difficult periods ever. Terrorist rocket attacks have displaced the lives of more than one million Israelis, many of whom find themselves without homes, jobs or peace of mind. Today, large stretches of Israel resemble ghost towns.

That's why UJA Federation is launching a special Israel Emergency Campaign 2007, a single vital campaign to respond to Israel's emergency situation in conjunction with the Annual UJA Campaign.

UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 is committed to raising an additional $20 million to Israel on top of our regular annual campaign total. With your help, we will provide desperately needed Israeli social services and, at the same time, maintain our vital support for local needs here at home.

And because of initial, generous donations, you can be assured that each and every dollar of increases over last year to this Emergency Campaign will go directly to Israel and the vital needs created by the current confrontation.

Here are some of the many short and long term needs that UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 will fund:

- Trauma counseling
- Overnight camps in safer areas of Israel for children of the north
- Mobile Activity Vans with specialized programming for children still living in shelters
- Specialized emergency assistance for those with special needs, such as the physically and developmentally disabled
- Temporary housing
- Vocational training and business loans for the newly unemployed
- Re-equipping damaged community services, such as libraries, community centres, day cares and homes for the elderly
- Upgrading emergency vehicles, such as fire trucks and ambulances
- Restoring home care, meals-on-wheels and medical care to the elderly

Our partnership with Israel is unwavering and enduring. We've always been there for Israel. And, today we need to be there again.

An increasingly common whisper grows louder

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

New York Times columnist Thomas Friedman ("On the Eve of Madness," July 28) observed: "A religious militia that calls itself 'the party of God' takes over a state and drags it into war, using high-tech rockets – mullahs with drones – and the world is paralyzed."

Well, not quite. Much of the world is active enough to increasingly blame Israel, mostly for "overreacting."

First came the United Nations and the European Union, but now even a number of American liberals are jumping on the bandwagon.

For instance, liberal economist and Times columnist Paul Krugman, casting himself in the role of military/strategic analyst ("Shock and Awe," July 31), wrote the following one day after the Qana tragedy: "Hezbollah has acquired heroic status, while Israel has both damaged its reputation as a regional superpower and made itself a villain in the eyes of the world." Not a villain in the eyes of just the Arabs or Europe, but "of the world."

"There is a case for a full-scale ground offensive against Hezbollah," Krugman conceded. "It may yet come to that, if Israel can't find any other way to protect itself." But Krugman sees "restraint" and "diplomacy" along with "limited counterstrikes" as the preferable option. He believes, as so many others do, that diplomacy will result in getting "other players to rein Hezbollah in."

But Israelis may be forgiven a measure of cynicism when France's foreign minister, while in Beirut (July 31), praises Iran, Hezbollah's principal backer, as a "great country… which plays a stabilizing role in the region."

There is another negative media trend, one that extends far beyond the immediate conflict but that also deals with the existential threat to Israel. This one comes from those who, even unwittingly, badly misconstrue what Israel is all about – the fulfilment of Jewish national liberation in their ancient homeland. Instead, they declare or imply that Israel was a "mistake."

In his Globe and Mail column, "A doctrine of cruelty and folly" (July 29) Rex Murphy warned that we all should pay careful attention to "the number of voices starting to remind us that maybe Israel was a mistake to begin with. In Western opinion, this thought is but a whisper, but how common a whisper it is becoming."

On the very day that Murphy's admonition appeared, Doug Saunders wrote a piece from Damascus for the Globe's "Focus" section ("Who started the fire in Lebanon? You might blame Canada"). He argued that if you trace the cause of the Arab-Israeli conflict – including the latest crisis – back far enough, you end up with the sad fact (in Saunders' eyes) that the United Nations decided in 1947, at the urging of Canadian Supreme Court judge Ivan Rand, to propose a two-state solution, instead of a binational one, for Jews and Arabs in Palestine. "It's hard to avoid concluding," said Saunders, "with the luxury of hindsight, that the decision made by the UN committee almost 60 years ago was the worst, and the most irreversible, of all possible choices."

Lost entirely on Saunders is the irony that India and Yugoslavia, the very countries that strongly backed a binational state in Palestine in 1947, have both been torn apart by ethnic tensions.

The lesson is that the conflict between Israel and its Arab neighbours does not originate with the inherent fact of Israel's Jewish character. Rather, it's that persistent Arab/Muslim intolerance – including, foremost, the refusal to accept the right of the Jewish people to a state in its ancient homeland – will not allow the conflict to end.

In his column, cited above, Thomas Friedman asked the essential question: "When will the Arab-Muslim world stop getting its 'pride' from fighting Israel and start getting it from constructing a society that others would envy, an economy others would respect, and inventions and medical breakthroughs from which others would benefit?"

Saunders would do well to ask the same.

Moose Jaw's shul is now a dance studio

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

MOOSE JAW, Sask., — It's Friday night and I'm in Moose Jaw, Sask., standing outside the House of Israel Synagogue and wishing there were an Erev Shabbat service that I could attend. As it happens, I'm late – by more than 15 years.

The synagogue closed its doors in September 1990, leaving only a cement plaque outside as evidence that it was, indeed, a synagogue, having served a Jewish community in this small prairie town for almost 75 years, beginning in 1926.

Today it's a dance school, with windows boarded up to keep out the sunlight and weeds growing prolifically around the building. But there was a time when the House of Israel Synagogue was a hub of activity, with regular Shabbat services and social get-togethers.

At its height in the 1950s, the Jewish community of Moose Jaw had about 57 families, or approximately 90 people, former residents say. But like other small towns around the country whose once-thriving Jewish communities have dwindled, the town only has about five Jews who still live there.

"Everybody pitched in and was friendly in our Jewish community, it was like a big family," recalls Sam Cohen, who lived in Moose Jaw from 1957 to 1988 and now resides in Vancouver.

"We had a Hadassah that was very active, and a B'nai Brith [chapter] that did a lot of work in the gentile community. We kept kosher, and we knew we were Jews, but ultimately the community disintegrated because you brought up the children to leave. You didn't want them staying, you wanted them in more of a Jewish environment."

His brother, Jack Cohen, who owned a pharmacy with Sam, agrees. "Moose Jaw was a good place to be a Jew between the 50s and the 70s, except that there weren't enough kids for our children to socialize with," he reflects. "But we had lots of fun as a community. I remember we'd have dances, picnics, card games and lots of get-togethers. There would be services Friday nights and some Saturday mornings, and there was a Jewish cheder for the children after regular school hours."

Lillian Butts, 85, remembers the cheder well. The daughter of a Russian-born father and a Romanian mother, she was born in this town in 1921 and lived there until 1943.

"We had to go to cheder three times a week, and I hated it," she says with a gleam in her eyes. "My mother, Rose Schwartz, was one of the few Jews who kept a kosher home in Moose Jaw, so when Jewish travellers came to town and required kosher meals, they came to us. My mother would be up at 5 a.m. on Fridays baking challah, and all week we'd look forward to our traditional Shabbat dinner of chicken soup and meat."

Butts remembers a childhood marked by poverty as her father, a junk dealer, struggled to make a living.

"In a way, Moose Jaw was a sad place, we being the only Jewish family at our school," she says. "One neighbour took to chasing me home every day, because I was Jewish and we 'killed Jesus.' There were a lot of anti-Semites in town when I was growing up, but I thought to myself, 'I have just as much right to be here as you have.'"

Still, she has good memories of life in Moose Jaw, and of attending dances at the Temple Gardens Dance Hall with her friends as a young adult. She recalls the natural spring well that was discovered accidentally in 1910 when someone was drilling for oil. When she lived there, a natatorium was built around it, and "everyone went there for health baths," she says.

The dance hall has long been demolished, but its name lives on as the Temple Gardens Mineral Springs Resort, attracting a wide range of travellers who come to experience its hot mineral water drawn from more than 4,500 feet beneath the earth's surface.

They come to luxuriate in the hot water and to explore the Tunnels of Moose Jaw, a series of underground interconnected passages that snake their way beneath the city's downtown roads and stores.

"When I lived there, I was not aware that the tunnels existed," Butts says. "We knew there were bootleggers in town at one point, but not how they dealt or where exactly they were located."

That's because for some 75 years, Moose Jaw city leaders denied the tunnels' existence, hoping to keep its unkosher history under wraps. Their plan was foiled in 1985, when a heavy truck travelling downtown on Main Street disappeared into a hole after the pavement collapsed under its weight.

After that, the tunnels were transformed into the town's hottest attraction. Today, the Tunnels of Moose Jaw offers tourists two theatrical-style tours that aim to educate and entertain simultaneously. One discusses the living conditions of impoverished Chinese labourers who lived in the tunnels in the early 1900s.

The second describes the bootlegging history of the tunnels during the Prohibition years. Perched at the end of the Soo Line that still runs to Chicago today, Moose Jaw became a convenient retreat for the mob. The tour insinuates that Al Capone came to town at least once and the legend of his visit lives on. It provides good comedy during the tour, rich imaginative fodder for visitors and a convenient theme for city hotels, restaurants and bars.

Between the tunnels and the mineral springs, Moose Jaw has regained some of its former vibrancy. The mayor's office estimates the tunnels alone bring $15 million a year into the local economy.

One thing they can't bring back to this town, however, is its Jewish community, whose descendants are now scattered throughout Canada, mostly in the large cities, with only a handful remaining in town.

Before he left town for Vancouver in 1988, Sam Cohen says he considered the fate of the synagogue and tried to inscribe its history into Canadian Jewish archives.

"I wrote to the Jewish Historical Society in Winnipeg and to the Canadian Jewish Congress, but we couldn't find anybody who was interested in Moose Jaw's Jewish history," he says. "Eventually our Torah scrolls went to Kelowna, B.C., but nobody seemed to care what happened to our synagogue."

Haifa hospital treats injured Israeli soldiers

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Even as Haifa remains under the constant threat of rocket attacks, Rambam Medical Center continues to offer world-class care for both soldiers injured on the front lines and civilians.

According to Rambam's director, Prof. Rafael Beyar, the hospital has received close to 400 wounded civilians and soldiers, but it is optimistic about each patient's recovery.

"Even the most severely wounded are currently at different stages of improvement, and we do hope that everything will continue to improve with them," Beyar said.

"Everyone who has come through the doors has survived," he added.

He said some of the patients are being treated for shock due to blood loss, multiple fractures, chest injuries, brain injuries, shrapnel wounds, limb trauma and other injuries.

"Today we still continue to get casualties. This morning, we received some 20 additional soldiers from the frontier, but they are also improving," Beyar said.

David Green, the president of the Canadian Friends of the Rambam Medical Center based in Toronto, said there are medics on the front line, but when there are injuries they can't treat, most patients are sent to Rambam by helicopter.

"It has a world-class trauma centre, maybe the best in the country, one of the best in the world," Green said.

"We have a tremendous trauma and surgical team. They are extremely successful in doing things quickly and efficiently," Beyar said.

He added that while the 4,000 workers at northern Israel's largest hospital, third-largest in the country with 1,000 beds, are doing their best to maintain a kind of routine, the influx of war casualties have made it a challenge.

"It is not business as usual. Even today, we heard a couple of sirens here that tell people to go into shelters. Luckily, Haifa didn't get any hits today, but since the beginning of the war, when it became clear that missiles were falling in the cities near the hospitals – some of the hospitals were directly hit – we have had to reorganize the hospital to deal with the threats."

Beyar said that late last month, a rocket hit the hospital's parking lot, causing damage to 30 cars.

"One of the security guards was lucky in that he wasn't physically hurt, but he suffered major mental trauma from that event."

A cardiologist, Beyar said he remembers the day clearly because he was in the middle of performing cardiac surgery when he heard the explosions of the rockets falling around the hospital.

In response to these kinds of threats, Beyar said that staff have moved entire departments from one area of the hospital to another, while continuing with treatment.

"We had to move children, patients, from the intensive care unit on the top floor, which is unsafe, to the basement, which until now was just a storage area," he said, adding that the hospital even made arrangements for a kindergarten in the basement of the faculty of medicine campus.

He said the hospital doesn't have bomb shelters, because when the hospital was built, it was assumed that hospitals would be spared from direct attacks.

"In the past, people didn't think that hospitals would be targets of a continuous attack, and that is probably not true. We do have a basement – it is not designed to be a bomb shelter – but it is safer there. But we know where the missiles come from, so we can calculate [what is the safest option]."

Despite the attacks and the growing number of patients, the hospital staff is dedicated to treating patients as well as they can.

"We still have to treat the civilian population's medical problems. We still have heart problems, we still have deliveries of babies, we still have the flu, and [we try to] continue at the same pace," he said.

Beyar is proud of his hospital, which he said "is the main academic hospital in northern Israel and the place where, together with the faculty of medicine at the Technion [Israel Institute of Technology], the two Nobel laureates, the scientific Nobel laureates of Israel [Aaron Ciechanover, Avram Hershko] are working."

Green said the fact that the hospital is a leader in medicine, science and technology is the not only reason he chose to become involved.

"Because they are the largest hospital in northern Israel, they have a patient population that crosses all religious and demographic lines. They are part Druze and Arab, as well as Jewish. I thought to myself, what better way to promote a peace process than to treat the children of people who would otherwise hate you?" Green said.

"The people are very strong – it's unbelievable," Beyar said of his staff. "People are concentrating on what they need to do. When you hear the sirens and you hear that people are on their way to us, [the hospital staff] just stand where they need to be, and nothing matters to them other than the patients that need to be treated."

Technion students hard hit by war

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

The Hezbollah shells raining down on Haifa have, at writing, only come close to striking the Technion Israel Institute of Technology on Mount Carmel, threatening the institution whose graduates are most sought after by the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) for their technological and scientific expertise.

But the impact has been profound in other ways.

The Technion and Haifa University are Israel's two institutions of higher learning under immediate risk of attack by Hezbollah.

But Arnold Ludwig, the Canadian Technion Society's new national president, said in an interview that the Technion has been especially traumatized.

It was Ehud Goldwasser, an IDF soldier and Technion graduate whose abduction – along with Eldad Regev – by Hezbollah on July 12 triggered the continuing crisis.

The Technion was closed for an entire week starting July 16 and the first exam period was delayed indefinitely. Because so many in the student population of over 13,000 are native-born Israelis (courses at the Technion are in Hebrew), Ludwig said, a great many were called up for reserve duty.

In addition, the psychological and financial toll on students has been great.

Like so many others in the north of Israel, Ludwig said, many were forced into shelters during the attacks, and/or had to move to the safety of Israel's south.

Students have had to forego summer jobs around Haifa that help pay tuition. Some have spouses who had to give up their own employment so that they could tend to children whose day-care centres have shut down. Others have had their homes damaged, and new immigrant students and those from "poor socioeconomic backgrounds [have been] particularly hard hit," the institute reported.

"There is just this tremendous uncertainty," said Ludwig, who last visited the institute about a month before the war. "This whole thing just struck like a thunderbolt, with thousands directly impacted."

Like other Israel-based institutions, Ludwig said the Technion has launched an emergency international fundraising campaign, in this case, to directly help students affected by the crisis, including students called up for reserve duty (70 per cent of Technion students are male). Ludwig said no "targeted" fundraising goal has been established among Canadian Technion supporters, but he estimated that internationally, it could tally into the tens of millions of dollars.

Funds raised will be directed toward providing students in the IDF reserves with extra tutoring, video courses, free summer courses, a "ninth" semester, scholarships, economic aid and extra psychological counselling and treatment, as well as to meet the needs of non-reservist students also affected by the war, including help to deal with emotional stress and forced unemployment.

"There is not a single student unaffected by the current emergency," the institute said.

In Canada, an initial e-mailing to supporters is being followed up by a direct mailing.

"We are concentrating all our efforts on friends we already have," said Ludwig, a former president of the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation who for decades worked at the highest executive levels in concerns associated with the Bronfman family, including at Seagram's Canada, CEMP Investments, and Claridge Ltd.

Seagram's founding patriarch Samuel Bronfman was one of the original signatories to the charter of the Canadian Technion Society. Another faithful supporter is developer David Azrieli, an alumnus himself whom Ludwig said has attributed much of his success in life to having attended Technion.

Ludwig said plans remain in gear for a Canadian Technion Society mission to Israel for November.

"Unless the Israeli government tells us otherwise, we're going," he said.

Lawyer fulfils his dream of moving to Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

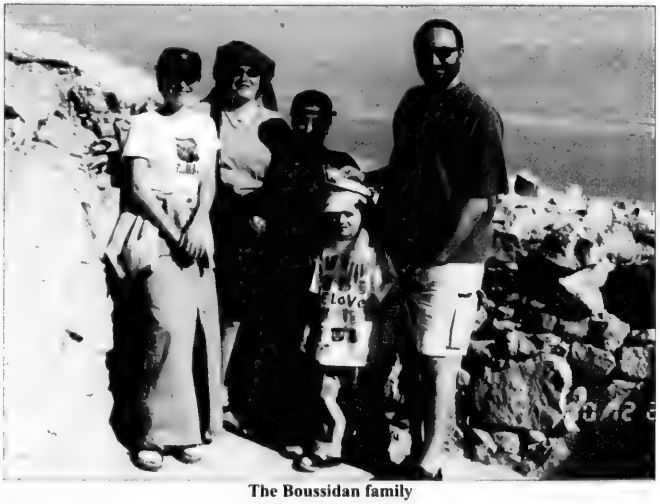
Messod Boussidan, 46, made a five-year plan to move to Israel after his first trip there at age 19.

Next week, along with his wife and two of his children – his 19-year-old daughter made aliyah last year – he will be on a flight chartered by Nefesh B'Nefesh, an organization that assists Jews who want to move to Israel by removing bureaucratic, logistic, financial and other obstacles.

This summer, about 3,000 North American Jews, including next week's planeload from Canada, will be moving to Israel on Nefesh B' Nefesh flights.

Boussidan, a litigation lawyer who came to Canada from Morocco with his family in 1964, said he's never forgotten the five-year plan. "It just kept getting extended."



The Boussidan family

Now, he said, the timing is perfect to make aliyah. "One daughter is there, one just graduated high school, and my 11-year-old son hasn't begun high school. Their education will not be disrupted."

As for making the move during the current crisis in Israel, Boussidan said that anyone from North America who decides to make aliyah always takes into consideration that they're moving to a country that has a history of armed conflict with its neighbours.

"Of course, they factor in the situation as part of a responsible and informed decision process. The element of surprise is minimal," he said.

"[No one] should just pick up and move without thinking carefully about what they are doing. They wouldn't be taking into consideration any number of factors including economic and social unknowns – not just the armed conflict."

Boussidan said news reports make it seem that "all of Israel is under siege, but there is still a country that gets up in the morning, goes to work, and functions in every way."

He has been to Israel "at least" 15 times since 1996, he said, "including during the Gulf War and the intifadah.

"For me, Israel is home logically, emotionally and spiritually. I feel fortunate that I am able to realize the dream of my ancestors. Our people have dreamed about moving there for 2,000 years, and we are actually doing it."

He said he will be "shuffling" back and forth between his family's new home in Modin – located midway between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem – and Canada for business purposes, he said, "because litigation files have a long lifespan. I hope to have an association here for a long time."

His family is appreciative of Canada, he said, "and of the blessings this country has bestowed on us. We are going to Israel always mindful that we have had the good fortune of living in one of the greatest countries in the world."

Jewish state needs full support despite mistakes: ex-MDA head

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

It may have been a mistake on the part of Israel not to have anticipated or prepared for the fierceness of Hezbollah resistance or the number of civilian deaths being encountered in south Lebanon.

But now is not the time to cast blame, and the Israeli government and Israel Defence Forces (IDF) deserve complete backing, the former head of Magen David Adom (MDA) for Israel said.

"We must have only one voice. Let's not criticize," said retired Brig.-Gen. Avi Zohar, who ran MDA in Israel until this year.

Zohar spoke at the YM-YWHA Ben Weider JCC just two weeks after the most recent conflagration began.

Avi Zohar

He retired about six months ago from MDA's top post of director general, which he held for eight years. He was succeeded by his longtime assistant Eli Bin. He was reflective as he spoke to the audience of several hundred.

Zohar, whose home is Haifa, was at one time responsible for IDF infantry operations in northern Israel.

However, most of his remarks focused on the critical needs of MDA at this time. Only during the audience question-and-answer session did Zohar offer an opinion on the war with Hezbollah.

He is committed to the idea that the IDF must be allowed to "finish the job" at the very least, Hezbollah must be weakened to the extent that it no longer poses a military threat.

"It's simple. We cannot live with such an an enemy north of Israel," Zohar said in heavily accented English. They must not have weapons, and it is the Lebanese government that should rule there."

The tragic bombing of a UN observation pose, he said in reply to a question, was an obvious mistake.

Why, Zohar asked, was the United Nations placed in a "clear Hezbollah town"?

"The war started so fast, and that's why there are mistakes," he said. Forgotten, he added, is the fact that in 1982, at the time of Israel's previous incursion into Lebanon, the Israel Air Force accidentally killed 60 of its own troops.

"I was in the infantry, and with all that smoke and dust, it can be very difficult [for aircraft] to identify what's on the ground."

Zohar acknowledged that the most difficult question to answer is whether the Israeli government underestimated Hezbollah's strength.

Already he said, there have been Israeli officers who have criticized the fact that more infantry were not initially called into action because the air force was not enough to "do the job," and that the civilian population was not cleared out of the area before bombing began.

But even if there were mistakes, Zohar said, second-guessing is pointless while Israel needs the total support of the Israeli nation and the Jewish people.

He said the morale of Israelis is not the best at the current time, but "they are streadfast in their desire to ensure that Hezbollah be crippled to the extent that it can't hound us for the next century."

On average, MDA responds in less than five minutes and supplies close to 95 per cent of ambulance services, he said.

Given the current situation, MDA "is running short of supplies," Montreal MDA president Miriam Lang told the audience, and has put out the call worldwide for support during the war.

MDA is among scores of Jewish organizations and institutions that have launched emergency fundraising drives in light of the war.

Zohar cited Canada as among MDA's top supporters besides the United States, Great Britain, France and Australia. While he was in Canada, he also spoke last week in Calgary, Edmonton and Toronto.

'There is a lot of work to be done in the Zionist world'

Israel has a different appeal for different people, she says. "Some have a sense of belonging, some are pulled by Israel's vibrancy, and retirees find Israel the place to be for family, social, cultural and [climactic] reasons."

About 50 per cent of olim are between the ages of 18 and 30, she says. "Some go to university because olim [get funded] for three years. Israel's logic is to invest in these young people because they could stay and raise their family there."

Others go because of a sense of adventure, Gidron says, and some fall in love with the country after going on a free birthright israel trip.

Since she arrived, she says, Friends of Israel Scouts and the Jewish Agency have brought a project to Canada that encourages young Israeli adults to go back and join the army.

"Israel Scouts [their main sponsor] help them – non-Israeli citizens can join – organize as a group and settle them on a kibbutz. About 15 are going this summer, and in November they will go to the army."

Gidron says she wants to continue working in the field once she's back in Israel. "There is a lot of work to be done in the Zionist world, and I hope to continue my work in Israel. I love the fulfilment and the rewards."

Gidron will be replaced by Liane Sela, who worked for the Israel Defence Forces in its education office.

Vancouver rally supports Israel 'in her time of need'

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — More than 2,000 Vancouver Jews came out to show their support at a July 31 Stand With Israel rally held at Schara Tzedeck Congregation.

They gathered in the shul's sanctuary, outside the building and in the basement of the synagogue, where the speakers' words were heard via live audio hookup. In the aftermath of the July 28 shootings at the offices of the Seattle Jewish federation, in which one woman was killed, there was a strong security presence at the shul, with 12 guards and several Vancouver police vehicles outside the building.

"As we gather here, 4,500 miles from Israel, our hearts and prayers are with the innocent victims on all sides who have been killed or injured as a result of extremists who value death as we value life," said Jason Murray, a member of the Canada-Israel Committee's Pacific region advisory committee.

"Canada and Israel share so many values: democracy, freedom of religion, freedom of expression, equality for all citizens – and that is why as Canadians, we must support Israel in her time of need."

Murray urged Vancouver's Jewish community to advocate on Israel's behalf by writing to the prime minister and to their MPs, as well as by writing to newspapers and taking every opportunity to inform other Canadians that Canada must stand with Israel.

"Your federal government supports the right of sovereign states to protect themselves against aggression," he declared to loud applause. "There's no such thing as a dialogue for peace with people dedicated to the destruction of a free state. We defend the right to live in freedom and are committed to working towards long term peace."

Shira Gold, a young woman who had recently returned from a Jewish leadership mission to Ethiopia and Israel, spoke of how she accompanied a group of Ethiopians on their aliyah, learning, as they did, that Haifa, their resettlement destination, was facing rocket attacks from Hezbollah. Only hours later, steps from her hotel, a suicide bomber was apprehended and killed, giving her a first-hand understanding of the immediacy of the violence.

In closing the rally, Craig Diamond, interim chair of Vancouver's Combined Jewish Appeal campaign, called on the audience to contribute financial support to Israel for emergency relief and to aid Israelis in rebuilding their lives and communities.

"We received about $670,000 even before this appeal from our top donors, and last night people contributed about $18,000," said Mark Gurvis, executive director of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver.

"We've been on the phones all day today taking commitments, and have received over $100,000 today alone. So, people are making their gifts, but our goal is to raise at least $2.75 million for the [Israel] emergency campaign between now and November 2006."

Symposium focuses on high-conflict families

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Jewish Family & Child Service's second annual symposium on high-conflict divorce attracted more than double the number of participants organizers expected, says the forum chair.

"With about 480 mental health professionals and lawyers taking part, we realized that people are thirsty for knowledge," said Howard Hurwitz, director of children's services at JF&CS.

Titled "Divorce Poison," the day-long symposium, organized in conjunction with the High-Conflict Forum, provided participants with an understanding of the dynamics of child alienation in families undergoing a separation or divorce.

Keynote speaker was Richard Warshak, a research psychologist who specializes in child custody, including child alienation and the role of children's preferences in custody disputes.

Hurwitz said they chose this year's topic because there is a lot of confusion about how to work effectively with families in which children are alienated from one parent.

"It could be a situation where one parent deliberately withholds contact, or it could be that the children do not want to see one of the parents."

There are no Canadian statistics, he said, "but about 10 per cent of families going through separation are considered high conflict, and within that 10 per cent, there is a smaller percentage in which children are alienated."

High-conflict families often come to the attention of JF&CS, he said, when one parent makes allegations of abuse against the other. "We have to investigate by law, but in most cases we cannot verify any abuse of a physical or sexual nature."

Children within these families suffer psychologically and emotionally, he said, and their behaviour is affected. "They often have difficulties in school and in their relationship with peers. There could also be other psychological symptoms, such as eating disorders, phobias, depression or obsessive-compulsive disorder.

"We see a direct correlation between high conflict levels and the emotional well-being of children."

Health and legal professionals need to work in a co-ordinated manner in order to deal effectively with these families, Hurwitz said.

"In severe cases of alienation, court orders can set out conditions, but we would like to see lawyers work in conjunction with therapists to assist families.

"We also need to put a priority on recognizing high-conflict families and providing individual and group counselling for parents and children."

By taking a preventative approach, he said, "we can intervene early and teach families problem-solving so the situation does not turn into high conflict."

Research tools are being developed by JF&CS along with several other agencies, to aid professionals in detecting levels of conflict within families going through separation, said Hurwitz.

"Currently, there are no tools to define conflict. By using these tools – they are still in the preliminary stages – we will have a clinical indication of low, medium and high-conflict families."

Q. I have been reading a lot about nutrition over the years, and it seems that even though we are obsessed with dieting, reports say we're heavier than ever. Why aren't all these diets working and what is contributing to our being overweight?

A. This is a very astute question because we, as Canadians, are on more diets than ever before, and we are bombarded with diet and nutrition advice. So why aren't we successful at reducing our weight, and why are so many young people overweight?

I think there are several answers. First, many of the trendy, extreme diets that we hear advertised promise enticing results, luring us to the idea of a quick fix, but these diets and the weight reductions they produce often can't be sustained. We can't stay indefinitely on diets that are 800 calories a day, or are free of all carbohydrates, or where we can eat only the food produced and sold by a specific company. Many are simply unhealthy, but they are appealing because we can achieve dramatic and speedy results. However, one year later most of us gain back all of the weight we lost and more.

If you really want to lose weight and keep it off, you have to do it slowly and steadily. Most dietitians, including myself, promise only a one- to two-pound loss per week. For my patients who are compliant, that isn't nearly as enticing, but at least they're losing some fat, not just water or muscle, and the weight will stay off if they continue to eat in a healthy manner.

Also, in order to be successful at losing weight, you have to be motivated. This does not just mean that you say you really want to lose 20 pounds or look the way you did at some previous time. It means that you are actually willing to do the work – and it's hard work – required to reach your goal. This is where the disconnect comes in for many people. In my practice, I find people say they want to lose weight, but they are not committed to doing the work.

Success comes from understanding what foods fill you up and what foods make you hungry, and most importantly, from understanding appropriate portion sizes.

This is where I believe most of our problem lies. Many people eat healthy food, but far too much of it, and most of us have no idea what an appropriate portion size is for us. Our kids also routinely eat far too much, and often, that's our fault as parents telling our kids what we think is an appropriate amount for them to eat. We are giving them the message that they shouldn't listen to their tummy, but eat the amount we deem appropriate. We need to re-think this if we are doing it.

Here are two examples to convince you that you likely eat portions that are too large, and I am sure everyone can relate to one of these two scenarios.

Have you ever gone to a restaurant and ordered an appetizer and a main course? You eat the appetizer and you're waiting for the main course and the service is slow, and you start thinking, "You know, I'm not even hungry anymore." Well, look how little food actually filled you up.

In a perfect world, we would ask the waiter to wrap the main course to go, and go home satisfied. But we don't. We eat the main course anyway, often for fear of being hungry later. However, if we listen to our hunger cues and get hungry later, we can eat then.

In another scenario, you're eating a meal, maybe at work at your desk or at home. The phone rings, someone walks into your office or comes to your door, and you're distracted for a short time. When you return to your food, you look at it and think, "I'm not really hungry anymore." Without the distraction, you would have eaten all the food and believed that you needed that amount – but actually you don't.

It takes our metabolism about 20 minutes to shut off, and most Canadians eat in about three to seven minutes, leaving us still feeling hungry even after eating a large meal.

I suggest that to control our weight we need to turn our attention to portion sizes. We need to eat smaller portions of foods that fill us up and avoid the foods that make us hungry, those with white flour or white sugar. We should choose whole grains, lean protein, and fruits and vegetables, and eat slowly, taking time to enjoy our food.

Comment

Israel is "lucky" this war was forced on it in summer 2006. It made it possible for us to learn – almost too late – about the terrible death trap being prepared in Lebanon, with almost Nazi precision, against the Jewish state.

Iran, fuelled by Islamofascism's uncompromising hatred of Israel, set the trap via Syria. It's a good thing we woke up in time, before Iran could arm itself with nuclear weapons.

Israel is lucky, too, to have such good intelligence services and the best pilots in the world, a combination that has minimized the inevitable damage Ahmadinejad's death machine has caused Israelis and their property.

There is no greater lie than the claim propagated by some Israeli journalists, eager irresponsible egomaniacs, that Israeli intelligence lacked sufficient information about Hezbollah and Iran's preparations. Just the opposite. Israel's intelligence community has provided the finest intelligence information of the last few years.

The question – if there is one – is what the various governments, and the Israel Defence Forces' top command, did with that information.

Certainly the air force was prepared for the war both by its previous commander, current Chief of Staff Dan Halutz, and its current chief, Gen. Eliezer Shkedi, and it has made the best of that excellent intelligence since the war's onset.

At the start Israeli Air Force pilots destroyed a crucial Hezbollah arsenal of long-range missiles capable of reaching distances of 200 to 250 kilometres – one of Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah's promised "surprises," gifted by Iran in order to threaten areas in Israel "beyond Haifa" and as far as the greater Tel Aviv area. This danger was neutralized in the first half hour of the war.

But the dangers are still out there. Iranian trainers integrated into the Hezbollah forces may yet try to fire long-range missiles from the launchers they retain before they, too, are bombed from the air.

The vast system of tunnels Hezbollah dug from south Lebanon into Israeli territory has yet to be uncovered – another reason why it is important to control a buffer zone of two or three kilometres along the border. The amazing hunt for rocket launchers is still going on, with unprecedented success, day and night and in all weather conditions. Never have IAF bombers had such sophisticated radar systems for precision bombing.

IAF pilots are, of course, not always successful in destroying their targets. The intelligence information flows in real time, sometimes in less than a minute, but the authorization to attack and destroy is often delayed too long, and the target disappears.

Or, as happened in Bint Jbail during the heavy fighting, an aerial strike was postponed for a humanitarian reason: a Lebanese with American citizenship managed to contact the American authorities to ask them to intervene with Israel so it would not bomb the village from the air until his family could be safely evacuated. Israel naturally complied.

The supreme importance Iran attributes to the outcome of the war in Lebanon is what is causing it to urge Syria to try to supply weapons of every kind to Hezbollah – on trucks making their way secretly along "military roads," those numerous trails leading from Syria across its border with Lebanon.

It may be assumed that the IAF has prepared an extensive and detailed bombing timetable.

Another important role for the IAF is to support the Israeli ground forces moving northward in the direction of the Litani River, in order to make sure to crush Hezbollah at least in that area of south Lebanon, from the border with Israel to the Litani River.

The fighters of Israel's infantry units are now being sent to war, reminding us of their importance to Israel's security for many years to come.

Neglecting them has been a colossal mistake. The cutbacks in their training exercises and the closing down of reserve units must stop.

The outcome of this war will be a measure of the United States' standing in the Middle East. U.S. President George W. Bush understands this well, which is why, besides his basic friendship for Israel, he is trying to enable Israel to achieve as much as possible on the battlefield.

It was unpleasant for Defence Minister Amir Peretz to hear U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice hint last week in Jerusalem that she was disappointed with the IDF's achievements because the current situation has not yet enabled the United States to broker an American settlement for a ceasefire in Lebanon.

The administration knows that it is not only Iran trying to cause this type of initiative to fail. Russian President Vladimir Putin is craftily exploiting anything he can to undermine America's standing in the Middle East so Russia can take its place.

That is how the abduction of Israeli soldiers and this war in Lebanon, which the current government of Israel was dragged into against its will, has turned into a major acid test in the struggle between Islamofascism – which is trying to use the Kremlin to its own ends – and the American president's campaign for democratization and peace in the Middle East.

An Israeli victory could prevent a third world war.

World must deal with Iran

The international community has to make it possible for the Lebanese government to be able to govern free of threat – to marginalize Hezbollah's capacity to browbeat and to threaten, to fulfil 1559 to the maximum."

Looking at the wider picture, Lubrani said stability in this region and beyond required facing up to the threat posed by Iran. "The wider reality here is that we are at the beginning of a much wider confrontation," he said. "There are those who prefer not to think or talk about it. There are those who believe Iran can be talked to, reasoned with. Don't count me among them."

Regarding Iran, Lubrani elaborated that "the world has to come to the conclusion that the Iranian threat requires root-canal treatment. I take [President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad seriously. People think he's a clown, a buffoon. He's not."

Leaders of the Iranian hardline regime, he said, "believe they have a direct line to God, and they'll do whatever 'divine inspiration' requires them to do. Talking to them is pointless. They want to wipe out the U.S., and us, too, in the bargain, as the representatives of western culture. This can't be swept under the carpet."

Turning his attention to the buildup to the current conflict, Lubrani said Israel erred in not raising a diplomatic rumpus over Hezbollah's arms accumulation in the six years since Israel withdrew from the security zone to the international border. "We let them put us to sleep for six years while they built up an arsenal. And we did nothing, not even diplomatically. That was our screw-up.

"When they built up this array of missiles, this arsenal, they knew it wasn't planned for use against Syria or Turkey. It was clearly for use exclusively against us. They built this up even though they knew we had left Lebanon, that we never had designs on its territory, that we weren't going to carry out attacks there since we were obligated to an internationally demarcated border line. We almost never responded to provocations at the border.

"We should have prompted an international scandal. The United Nations Security Council passed a binding resolution, 1559, backed by all, celebrated by all, and it wasn't being fulfilled. We should have said [to the UN], 'Either you ensure that 1559 is implemented, or we will.' We should have created the climate to legitimize the actions we needed to have taken."

Now, Israel has to insist that 1559 – a resolution, he noted, that France co-initiated – is fully implemented.

The international force set to deploy, he added, "has to be supplied with effective teeth."

Spanish leader leads anti-Israel chorus

By JEROME SOCOLOVSKY
JTA

MADRID — The prime minister poses for a photo wearing a Palestinian headdress. The opposition accuses him of anti-Semitism and "Israelophobia."

The war between Israel and Hezbollah is having repercussions in Spain in ways not seen before. After decades of pro-Arab sympathies, Spanish governments in recent years have made efforts to moderate their views on the Arab-Israeli conflict.

But amid the latest flare-up of violence, the Socialist prime minister, José Luis Rodriguez Zapatero, has been one of the fiercest critics of Israel in the European Union, accusing it of using "abusive force" and failing to learn what he sees as the lessons of the Iraq war – that military action produces "radicalization, fanaticism and instability."

Even though Zapatero didn't put the keffiyah on himself – a member of the Al Fatah youth group did so – the prime minister later said he didn't regret posing for the photo, and would do it again.

"When in the heat of a tough and bloody war, the prime minister of a country wears the Palestinian symbol and doesn't do something similar with a Jewish symbol, he is sending plenty of messages, none of which are of neutrality," Pilar Rahola, a pro-Israel commentator, wrote in the El Pais newspaper. "Do we need a reminder that that quaint symbol is also used to fire tens of thousands of rockets against Israel, or to indoctrinate suicide bombers?"

Zapatero's comments and keffiyah pose led Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, to say that the "Spanish prime minister wears his anti-Israel bias on his sleeve."

Zapatero was elected following massive terror bombings on the Spanish train system in March 2004 and immediately pulled Spanish troops out of Iraq.

He has been promoting an "alliance of civilizations" as an alternative to U.S. President George W. Bush administration's war on terrorism, arguing that the threat from Islamic terrorism should be reduced not through military action but through dialogue and mutual understanding between Islam and the West.

José Luis Rodriguez Zapatero

José Maria Lassalle Ruiz, a member of Parliament representing Spain's conservative Popular Party, said Zapatero's idealism is leading him to see everything as "good guys vs. bad guys," blinding him to the complexities of the Middle East conflict.

"He wasted no time in rising to Olympian heights of progressivism with the wings of his dove disguise" and "attacking Israel, blaming it for virtually everything," Ruiz wrote in the ABC newspaper.

Ruiz acknowledged that popular sentiment in Spain is anti-Israeli, and he accused Zapatero of pandering to it.

Indeed, protesters burned an Israeli flag at a demonstration in front of the Israeli Embassy, while Spanish media have focused on the suffering of Lebanese and Palestinian civilians and underreported the threat to Israel.

The Portuguese Nobel laureate Jose Saramago wrote in El Pais, "As long as a single Palestinian is still alive, the holocaust will continue."

The stepped-up criticism began in late June, as Israel responded with military strikes in the Gaza Strip to the killing of two soldiers and kidnapping of a third by Hamas. At the time, the president of the Madrid regional government, Esperanza Aguirre, made a trip to Israel.

Aguirre wanted to see if Israeli water-management technology could be used in the greater Madrid area, where reservoirs are running low after two years of sustained drought. When she returned, the head of the Socialist faction in the regional assembly criticized her for going while Israeli tanks were "mercilessly invading Gaza."

The Socialist politician said Aguirre's visit had helped legitimize "the aggressive, warlike and I would even say genocidal policy by the State of Israel toward Palestine and its population."

Then Zapatero added his voice.

At a Socialist Party meeting several days after Israel began retaliating for a July 12 Hezbollah attack that left eight Israeli soldiers dead and two captured, Zapatero criticized the death of civilians and said the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq "has only produced radicalization, fanaticism and instability."

He said it should serve as a "lesson for always, that there should not be another unjustified and illegal military intervention."

When Socialist Party official José Blanco went further and said Lebanese civilians were "deliberate targets" for the Israeli military, Zapatero defended him. He also responded to criticism that his foreign policy was anti-Semitic.

"When somebody disagrees with Spain, you don't have to call him anti-Spanish," he said, "and when somebody criticizes Israel, there's no need to call him an anti-Semite."

The allegation of anti-Semitism had been levelled by Mauricio Hatchwell, a prominent Spanish Jewish businessman who is a member of a commission investigating Nazi gold transactions during World War II.

Several days later, Gustavo de Aristegui, the Popular Party's chief foreign affairs spokesperson in Parliament, backed up Hatchwell's accusation, saying Zapatero's views on Israel are the product of "anti-Semitism, anti-Zionism and Israelophobia."

He said the prime minister had gone further than other European leaders in criticizing Israeli military actions.

"We think it's scandalous," de Aristegui told the Parliament's Foreign Affairs Committee. "Far from adopting a balanced position, he only referred to the State of Israel and didn't talk about 1559" – the U.N. Security Council resolution that calls for disarming and disbanding all militias in Lebanese territory – "and at all times avoided criticizing Hezbollah."

Blair optimistic about ceasefire

By JONNY PAUL
Jerusalem Post

LONDON — British Prime Minister Tony Blair says he's hopeful a United Nations resolution will be agreed to soon, paving the way for a ceasefire in Lebanon.

Speaking last Thursday at a monthly news conference at 10 Downing Street, Blair said, "I'm now hopeful we will have such a resolution down very shortly and agreed within the next few days. The purpose of that will be to bring about an immediate ceasefire and then put in place the conditions for the international force to come in support of the Lebanese government."

Calling it a "very critical time," Blair said Britian, the United States and France have "been working very hard" on a UN Security Council resolution and that remaining differences were very slight.

Blair refused to condemn Israel's actions as "disproportionate." Instead, he called for restraint on both sides.

"The solution will not come by condemning one side simply by statements we make. It will only come with a ceasefire on both sides," he said.

He did, however, condemn comments by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who said last Thursday that the main cure to the Lebanese conflict was "the elimination of the Zionist regime."

"We do need some balance on how we look at this situation, with the Iranian president's call for the elimination of Israel, how helpful is that at this moment in time?" Blair asked.

Blair said it's vital to have a genuine ceasefire as well as security on Israel's northern border. He also said the death of civilians is unacceptable.

"The loss of civilian life in Lebanon is unacceptable. What is happening in Lebanon is a catastrophe, and it's my job to make sure it stops," Blair said.

"I stand in complete solidarity and sympathy with people in Lebanon, innocent people who have died in Israel as well, in what is a terrible, terrible situation, but my job is to bring it to an end," he said.

Blair also called for a "revival and re-energizing" of the internationally sponsored "road map" Mideast peace plan, once the Lebanon conflict calms down.

Israel Briefs

Kana death figure revised

A Lebanese hospital has revised the death toll from the Israeli attack on Qana to 28, down from initial reports that as many as 57 people were killed. An Israeli army inquiry found that an intelligence failure led to the attack on the southern Lebanese village. The army said it fired missiles because it believed Hezbollah fighters were sheltered there, not civilians.

Peretz links Hezbollah, Iran

Israel's defence minister described Hezbollah as an advance fighting force for Iran. "Hezbollah is Iran's advance commando unit. In effect, it is the Iranian vanguard," Amir Peretz said in a televised address to Israeli troops. "Had these events happened a year from now, and were combined with a nuclear threat that would already be in the works, the State of Israel would have found itself in a much more complex situation," Peretz said.

Ex-spy chief: Talk to Iran

A former Israeli spymaster called for talks with Iran aimed at ending the crisis in Lebanon. Efraim Halevy, a former head of the Mossad, said that along with trying to force Hezbollah to free two soldiers abducted last month, Israel should be speaking to the militia's sponsors in Iran. The remarks were unlikely to be taken seriously by Israeli officials, who have publicly ruled out negotiations on the hostages, or with Iran, whose president calls for the Jewish state's destruction.

UJC sets fundraising goal

The United Jewish Communities wants to raise at least $300 million (US) for Israel. The efforts by the umbrella group for North American Jewish federations, which have been ongoing for several weeks, have garnered $84 million so far, a spokesperson said. The revamped Israel Emergency Campaign is meant to usher in a new wave of fundraising that will include events in Chicago, Los Angeles and New York, as well as a solidarity mission to Israel for major donors. As of last Thursday, UIA Federations Canada had sent $3.5 million to Israel from across Canada. Of that, $2.9 million was the cash portion of the $8.5 million in pledges made to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "We're committed to trying to reach the $40 million mark," said Perry Romberg, UIAFC's director of campaign and community services.

Canadian campers hang with Galilee teens in Israel

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

The Partnership 2000 program is living up to its goal of creating a "living bridge" between Israel and the Diaspora.

Young Israelis from the Galilee met last week in Israel with their counterparts from Camp Kadimah in Barss Corner, N.S., building links between themselves and the Canadian youths. That's exactly the aim of the Jewish Agency for Israel's Partnership 2000 project, which hopes to build relationships between Jewish communities in Israel and the Diaspora. In Canada, part of the goal has been to connect smaller communities in Halifax, Ottawa, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver with towns in the northern Galilee.

Some 120 young Canadians have been in Israel since early July as part of the six-week Canadian Young Judea Experience. Thirty-six of them are with the Kadimah Israel program, a bridge connecting their final year as campers at Kadimah (ages 15 and 16) with their year at the camp as counsellors-in-training (age 16 and 17).

In past years, some of that time was spent in northern Israel, where Atlantic Canadian United Israel Appeal dollars have been of great assistance. But this year, due to ongoing Hezbollah rocket attacks on the north, the Canadians have been touring southern Israel, where the Kadimah campers, including five from the Atlantic region, met teens from the Galilee in a mifgash (encounter). Several of the Israelis have been in Canada, either at Kadimah for a summer or representing Israeli youth at various programs.

Through the efforts of Sharon Schwartzman and Nurit Biderman, Israelis who are working with Partnership 2000, 17 young Israelis were brought from northern to southern Israel to spend a week with the Canadians.

"Some of the [Israeli] kids were at Camp Kadimah with us," said Aubrey Cohen, 16, of Toronto, by telephone from Israel. "It was great seeing them again, and to meet new people. For them to make the trip from the north makes it that much more exciting."

Schwartzman and Biderman "located families in bomb shelters or in a refugee status away from their homes, then found the kids," said Lorne Klemensberg, director of Israel Programs for Canada Israel Experience. "There were so many issues for the youths, damage to their areas, having to leave home quickly and it's certainly a time the families want to be together."

He said "that we still wanted to continue the [Partnership 2000] 'Living Bridge' project with what's been going on" and that the teens' parents were overjoyed to have their children included in the Kadimah experience.

Klemensberg said both groups of kids are "having an amazing time. For a week, at least, the Israelis can forget about the war."

Toronto's Meredith Bacal, 17, who's attended Camp Kadimah for five years, said the Canadian group was in Tiberias when they were moved to Jerusalem as the conflict escalated.

Canadians from Nova Scotia's Camp Kadimah spent a week with teens from the Galilee as part of their time in Israel this summer.

"We were concerned, but where we are now, we're sheltered and protected. We certainly know what's going on, but [trip leaders] tell us what's appropriate. My mom has said I can come home any time, that she'd book the ticket, but I feel completely safe."

Prior to arriving in Israel, the Canadians spent four days in Poland learning about the Holocaust. They were slated to return to Canada Aug. 10.

World Jewish Congress drops suit against critic

By URIEL HEILMAN
JTA

JERUSALEM — A long, ugly and public brouhaha at the World Jewish Congress seems to have reached a quiet end, with the termination of a lawsuit brought by the group and its longtime leader against the chief critic of the WJC's financial management.

The withdrawal of the defamation suit against Isi Leibler by Rabbi Israel Singer, now chairman of the WJC's policy council, ends a two-year saga that brought into public view a spat between two Jewish communal leaders, exposed financial mismanagement at the WJC and tarnished the reputation of the 70-year-old organization.

The WJC announced in an internal newsletter last week that its steering committee "is withdrawing its lawsuit against Isi Leibler without prejudice and takes Leibler at his word that he will cease his 'war' and other agitation against the organization and its leadership."

The move came days after the Executive Council of Australian Jewry, an Australian group that is affiliated with the WJC, announced it was quitting the international organization. That followed a warning by the Australians several weeks ago that they would quit the organization unless WJC leaders in New York dropped the lawsuit by July 25.

Leibler, a former senior vice-president of the WJC who is a native of Australia, said he feels vindicated – as he did when the New York state attorney general's report on the WJC came out six months ago.

That report found that the WJC lacked "appropriate financial controls" and made "inappropriate disbursements" to top WJC officials, including $300,000 (US) to Rabbi Singer. But it did not find any criminal misconduct.

In an interview with JTA, Leibler suggested that the filing of the defamation lawsuit against him by WJC leaders in New York – WJC president Edgar Bronfman, Rabbi Singer, and WJC secretary-general Stephen Herbits – was a case of hubris gone overboard.

"Arrogance and rage led them into this irrational libel suit, which simply drew attention to everything and made this whole scandal continue," Leibler said. "I just hope the World Jewish Congress has learned a lesson, and I hope they find new leaders and implement the reforms of the attorney general."

Before the release of the attorney general's report, Rabbi Singer had accused Leibler of using "McCarthyite tactics in a situation where he had no substance." Reached by phone last week, Rabbi Singer declined to comment.

The lawsuit against Leibler – whose 12-page memo two years ago set off the controversy with questions about the group's governance and financial management – was dropped without fanfare.

Other WJC officials in New York declined to discuss the matter with JTA. A statement by Herbits suggested the organization wants to shift its focus away from internecine bickering toward matters of greater substance to the Jewish people.

"At this time of increased peril to Israel and the Jewish people, it is time to focus on the organization's critical work on behalf of Jews and Jewish communities around the world," Herbits said in the statement. "Jewish communities around the world are united by their support for Israel, the commitment to seeing the safe return of their soldiers and the fight against terrorism. That is our united focus. Anything else is secondary."

Grahame Leonard, president of the Australian Jewish organization, which had withdrawn from the WJC, said Australian Jewry would not be so quick to return to the WJC.

"I'm more than happy at the decision" to drop the lawsuit against Leibler, Leonard said, "but it does not mean we will automatically return to the fold. We made it very clear that we stay out until we are sure there is fair and proper governance in place and that the WJC is being run in a manner fitting to such an important body. I am looking forward to hearing from them."

TORONTONIAN'S PORTRAITS OF JAPANESE VILLAGERS ON EXHIBIT

Toronto artist Vivian Reiss was the only representational painter invited to participate in the 2006 Echigo-Tsumari Art Triennial in Japan this summer. "Satoyama Storehouse," her series of portraits of villagers in Hachi, Japan, went on view July 28. The entire rural village (population 140) attended the opening to see a unique and unexpected reflection of themselves.

Reiss, who has been living in the Hachi community and immersing herself in the culture, also has a solo exhibit of portraiture of Canadians in the arts currently on view in Tokyo. Subjects include dancer Peggy Baker, restaurateur-chef Jamie Kennedy, concert pianist Eve Egoyan and fashion maven Jeanne Beker.

After their display in Japan, both sets of portraits are scheduled for exhibit at Toronto's Reiss Gallery in late fall. For a sneak preview, visit the website www.msnusers.com/satoya-mastorhouse/shoebox.msnw.

Bookstore Imbroglio: The scene, a gathering at a major bookstore in Kitchener in 2004. Toronto author Howard Rotberg had just started reading from his first novel, The Second Catastrophe – a book highly supportive of Israel – when all hell broke loose.

The source of the trouble was two men, a self-described Iraqi Kurd and a Palestinian, who disrupted the event with anti-Israel rants and an anti-Semitic epithet. After the shouting had died down, the bookstore compounded Rotberg's sense of injury by blaming him as well as the provocateurs for the incident, then pulling his book from the shelf.

He supplied affidavits from witnesses to confirm his version of events, but still his book was "banned" (Rotberg's term). "Suddenly, I was in an Orwellian world where the victim of racism was now the racist," he later wrote.

The good news is that the book chain has apparently relented and put the novel back in stock. Rotberg reports that the store's main Toronto branch (at Bloor and Bay streets) recently ordered 30 copies. While he said he had no idea whether the order was by accident or design, he's happy the public will finally have a "window of opportunity" to buy the book.

"With Canadian public opinion split equally about our government making moderately pro-Israel noises, it would be nice to encourage [the bookstore] to carry a pro-Israel book," he said.

THROW A BAR MITZVAH—OR BUSINESS LUNCH—THAT ROCKS!

Whether it's a bar mitzvah, bat mitzvah, bubbie's birthday or a business banquet, the Toronto Hard Rock is where they'll always treat you like a rock star.

After all, points out the Cafe's event manager Marcelo DeOliveira, it was a Hard Rock crew that provided backstage catering for last year's Live8 concert, as well as its illustrious predecessor, Live Aid, two decades prior.

With 14,000 square feet over two levels, including a separate nightclub and streetside patio, the Hard Rock in Toronto offers a wide variety of configurations for a wide variety of events, from family celebrations to Fortune 500 conferences, breakfast through late-night.

Says DeOliveira: "We've hosted countless bar and bat mitzvahs, corporate receptions, product launches, press conferences and weddings. We've put on events for 50 guests and for 500, hosting everyone from Deloitte & Touche to the big music company BMG. And people love the place. It's a very special environment."

As if to make his point, DeOliveira walks a visitor past some of the priceless rock memorabilia hanging on the wall. There's Bob Dylan's autographed guitar from the cover of a 1984 live album and a handmade mariachi suit he wore on tour. There's a pair of sketches by John Lennon, a fur-trimmed purple jacket that belonged to Prince, and an outrageous pair of platform shoes from the closet of Stanley Eisen—better known as Paul Stanley of Kiss. That's not to mention the beautiful custom instrument once owned by Canadian guitar virtuoso, Alex Lifeson, of Rush.

DeOliveira explains that his staff will design exactly the experience a guest is looking for. "You can do a sit-down dinner or a buffet—for instance, our bar and bat mitzvah buffet includes, among other things, lox canapes, spanikopita, caesar salad, roasted chicken and lasagna. We have great sound, great lighting and video monitors throughout the Cafe. We can set up for dancing or karaoke. We can even put together really fun loot bags from our Rock Shop. Whatever you need. Because to us—whether you're a certified public accountant or a certified 13-year-old—you're a rock star."

'Canada's Steven Spielberg' profiled by CBC-TV

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Robert Lantos, the son of Hungarian Holocaust survivors, is Canada's answer to Hollywood's Steven Spielberg.

In terms of box-office receipts, visibility and clout, Lantos is hardly a match for Spielberg, the most successful director of his generation.

But in Canada, Lantos is king, a homegrown movie mogul who has produced a succession of fine films, notably Sunshine and Exotica, and high-profile television shows.

Sometimes referred to as "the godfather of Canadian cinema," Lantos has lived life to the fullest as he has struggled to escape the ghosts of the past.

Not bad for a guy whose father was a forced labourer during the Nazi occupation of Hungary and who fought off anti-Semitic taunts in a Uruguayan high school.

The subject of Peter Gentile's absorbing CBC-TV documentary, The Outsider: The Life & Times of Robert Lantos, which will be aired on Aug. 14 at 8 p.m., Lantos has come a long way since his birth in Budapest after World War II.

Lantos' parents, Laszlo and Agnes, regarded their son as a harbinger of hope. But life was hard in postwar Hungary. Laszlo's trucking business was expropriated by the Communist government, and in 1956, the Soviet army invaded Hungary, prompting the family to flee to South America.

He and his parents remained in Uruguay, supposedly a land of milk and honey compared to Hungary, for only a few years. But for Lantos, the object of anti-Jewish jeers from his fellow students, Uruguay seemed anything but congenial.

Due, perhaps, to these incidents and the Holocaust, Lantos' parents did not raise him as a Jew. Today, however, he has returned to his Jewish roots. Two weeks ago, as Israeli soldiers fought Hezbollah guerrillas in southern Lebanon, he appeared at an Israel solidarity rally in Toronto

In 1963, after immigrating to Canada, the Lantos family settled in Montreal, a melting pot of Quebecois and new immigrants like themselves. Only at this point, when Lantos is about to enter McGill University as a major in literature and cinema, does the documentary begin to concentrate on the trajectory of his career as a budding mogul.

Along with his friend and future business partner, Victor Loewy, Lantos brought the New York Erotic Film Festival to the staid McGill Film Society. Buoyed by his success, Lantos formed a movie distribution company and then produced a racy film, In Praise of Older Women, that established him as an up-and-coming force in the industry.

Temporarily blocked by the Ontario Censor Board as obscene, In Praise of Older Women was a turning point in his life. Hollywood beckoned and offered Lantos jobs. But he chose to stay in Canada, where he felt he had a future.

Robert Lantos

The Canadian film industry was tailor-made for an outsider like Lantos. As he puts it, "When films first began, it was something that drew only outsiders and immigrants because it was a new field wide open to all, as opposed to having an establishment and kind of clubby atmosphere in which only insiders were welcome."

Riding high after his success with In Praise of Older Women, Lantos churned out a series of forgettable tax-shelter films and created Alliance Entertainment, for which he produced prize-winning films like Black Robe and television shows such as Night Heat.

Under the strain of a heavy work load, his marriage to the actress Jennifer Dale floundered, but it produced two children, Ari and Sabrina, who appear to be close to him.

Gentile suggests that Lantos is a hard-nosed character. "Robert is a really tough business guy, fair but tough," says an associate, one of several acquaintances and friends who appear in The Outsider.

Lantos, who models himself after the legendary Hungarian filmmaker Alexander Korda and essentially regards himself as a storyteller, agrees with the assessment that he is no soft touch when it comes to business. His late father taught him to be hard, cynical, suspicious and constantly on guard. But to the people he loves, he is supposedly gentle, generous and loyal.

Judging by his comments, Lantos regards Sunshine – a film about Hungarian Jews – as his most personal film and Joshua Then and Now as one of his favourites. But as the actor Jeremy Irons observes, Lantos is fiercely protective of all his films.

Class Environmental Assessment Study

Earl Bales Park Area Stormwater Management Plan

Notice of Study Completion

The City of Toronto has completed its Class Environmental Assessment (EA) study to identify a preferred method(s) for managing stormwater runoff in the Earl Bales Park drainage area. Opportunities for increasing stormwater source controls are limited because most of the catchment area already meets the City's enhanced targets, while conveyance controls were limited by the clay soils. The components of the preferred alternative include the construction of a large stormwater pond in the valley of Earl Bales Park to meet provincial water quality objectives for urban stormwater runoff, various ravine restoration measures, water substitution for golf course irrigation and snowmaking, and preservation of local terrestrial habitats.

The project was undertaken in accordance with the requirements for Schedule 'B' projects under the Municipal Class Environmental Assessment (June 2000). A Study Report has been prepared which describes the problem, the assessment of alternatives and the preferred alternative as well as the public consultation process and its results. This Notice places the report on public record for a 30-day review period. Subject to comments received as a result of this Notice, the City of Toronto intends to proceed with this project. The Study Report is available for review at the following locations:

North York Central Library

Tel: 416-395-7873

Urban Affairs Library
Metro Hall, Main Floor
55 John Street
Tel: 416-397-7241

Please call to confirm hours of operation.

Interested parties should provide written comments within 30 calendar days from the date of this Notice. Comments should be addressed to:

Ms. Josie Giordano, Public Consultation Coordinator, City of Toronto,
Metro Hall, 55 John Street, 19th Floor, Toronto, ON M5V 3C6
Tel: 416-338-2859
Fax: 416-392-2974
TTY: 416-397-0831
E-mail: jgiorda@toronto.ca

If concerns arise regarding this project, which cannot be resolved in discussions with the City of Toronto, a person or party may request that the Minister of the Environment make an order for the project to comply with Part II of the Environmental Assessment Act (referred to as a Part II Order) which addresses individual environmental assessments. The Minister must receive requests for a Part II Order by August 28, 2006.

Please send requests to: The Honourable Laurel C. Broten, Minister of the Environment, 12th Floor, 135 St. Clair Avenue West, Toronto, Ontario, M4V 1P5, Tel: 416-314-6790, or Fax: 416-314-7337. A copy of the request for a Part II Order must also be sent to the City of Toronto at the address listed above. If there is no request for a Part II Order received by August 28, 2006, the City will proceed with the implementation of the preferred solution as presented in the Study Report.

Hollywood quiet on Gibson's anti-Semitic outburst

By TOM TUGEND
JTA

LOS ANGELES — Hollywood's top guns have answered actor-director Mel Gibson's vicious anti-Semitic slurs – with deafening silence.

Gibson, director of the controversial The Passion of the Christ, was pulled over in the early hours of July 28 while speeding along the Pacific Coast Highway in Malibu, Calif. He was booked on suspicion of drunk driving.

In the original report filed by the arresting officer, Gibson was described as belligerent and cursing the "F-----g Jews. The Jews are responsible for all the wars in the world."

Mel Gibson

He then asked Los Angeles County Sheriff's Deputy James Mee, "Are you a Jew?"

In an apology a few days later to "everyone in the Jewish community," Gibson admitted to the anti-Semitic slur and asked to meet with Jewish leaders "with whom I can have a one-on-one discussion to discern the appropriate path for healing."

Gibson added that "there is no excuse, nor should there be any tolerance, for anyone who thinks or expresses any kind of anti-Semitic remark. Please know from my heart that I am not an anti-Semite. I am not a bigot. Hatred of any kind goes against my faith."

Prior to Gibson's statement, attempts by JTA to elicit reactions from some 15 leading Jewish producers, directors, actors and writers proved fruitless. A remarkably large number were said to be on vacation or out of the country, while others did not return messages.

> 'Everyone takes it for granted that Gibson is an anti-Semite'

Even Alan Nierob, a Jewish man who is Gibson's official spokesperson, was said to be on a two-week vacation at the height of his employer's crisis.

Well-connected entertainment industry journalists ran into the same reticence. Michael Speier, managing editor of the trade publication Variety, explained the reluctance to speak out in this way: "In Hollywood, you can never help yourself by saying something critical on the record. You don't want to piss anyone off because you never know when you might need him later on. Who knows, in a few years Gibson might be a changed man and give $10 million to the Anti-Defamation League."

Bernie Brillstein, a veteran talent agent and manager, said, "Hollywood is a small company town and you figure everyone is entitled to his position. Anyway, everybody takes it for granted that Gibson is an anti-Semite, so people say, 'Well, he did it again.'"

However, he added, "if Gibson's statement, if true, had been anti-gay or anti-black, there would be an uprising in Hollywood like you've never seen before."

Jewish defence organizations, usually quick to respond to anti-Semitic slurs, were initially a bit muted. But Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League and a fierce critic of Gibson's 2004 film The Passion of the Christ, said, "We would hope that Hollywood now would realize the bigot in their midst and that they will distance themselves from this anti-Semite."

After Gibson's specific apology to the Jewish community, Foxman said it "sounds sincere" and that after Gibson's "rehabilitation for alcohol abuse, we will be ready and willing to help him with his second rehabilitation to combat this disease of prejudice."

David Harris, executive director of the American Jewish Committee, also welcomed the apology and said "we look forward" to "Gibson matching his contrition with his own deeds."

The one exception to the general silence in Hollywood was talent agent Ari Emanuel, the model for agent Ari Gold in the HBO series Entourage and brother of Congressman Rahm Emanuel.

In a widely circulated statement to The Huffington Post blog, www.Huffingtonpost.com, Emanuel said, "At a time of escalating tensions in the world, the entertainment industry cannot idly stand by and allow Mel Gibson to get away with such tragically inflammatory statements. When The Passion of the Christ came out, Gibson was quoted as categorically denying anti-Semitism attributed to him.

"Now we know the truth… People in the entertainment community, whether Jew or gentile, need to demonstrate that they understand how much is at stake in this by professionally shunning Mel Gibson and refusing to work with him, even if it means a sacrifice to their bottom line. There are times in history when standing up against bigotry and racism is more important than money."

While many in Hollywood have privately praised Emanuel's gutsiness, hardly any were willing to emulate him. It has been left largely to some outspoken bloggers to hold Gibson to account.

After scoring Hollywood executives and talent for lack of moral courage and putting dollars ahead of principle, commentator and author Arianna Huffington urged Disney studios to scrap plans to distribute Gibson's next film, Apocalypto, or to show his miniseries on the Holocaust on ABC-TV.

ABC, which is owned by Disney, announced it was going ahead with the film but cancelling the Holocaust series, ostensibly because it had yet to see a script.

As to Gibson's future, Huffington said, "it depends on how much pressure Hollywood people will exert in this case," she said.

Such pressure will have to come mainly from the public, said Meyer Gottlieb, president of Samuel Goldwyn Films.

"Personally, and as a child survivor of the Holocaust, I find Gibson's statement despicable and unforgivable. But the public generally forgives a celebrity if he shows contrition and apologizes for his trespasses," Gottlieb said.

The day after his arrest, Gibson issued a written apology, blaming his heavy drinking and history of alcoholism for acting "like a person completely out of control." He added: "I said things that I do not believe to be true and which are despicable. I am deeply ashamed of everything I said."

Some observers have wondered whether Gibson was so drunk when he was pulled over that he had no idea what he was saying. A field test showed a blood-alcohol level of 0.12 per cent, while the legal limit for driving in California is 0.08 per cent.

Gibson entered an alcohol rehabilitation centre late last month and was not available for comment. He is scheduled to appear in court Sept. 28 on the drunk driving charges.

Unfinished ballet tackles the Holocaust

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

The Holocaust has been the inspiration for many creative pursuits. Movies, plays and songs have kept the Jewish people's darkest days in the public consciousness.

One arena where the Holocaust hasn't made its mark is in ballet. Donna Greenberg, artistic director of Ballet Espressivo is hoping to change that.

"It's important to use art to understand the events of human history," Greenberg said over the phone from her Toronto home. "When we see dancers not speaking, expressing pain with their bodies and joy when they experience something wonderful, it's very inspiring."

Greenberg, who lost family in the Holocaust, is tackling the story of Mordechai Anielewicz, a courageous resistance fighter who led the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, in an original dance aptly named, Uprising.

In seven excerpts, which will be performed during the Toronto International Dance Festival, Greenberg explores the Nazis' brutality and the way Jews survived through love, resistance and perseverance. It's a story that Greenberg wasn't sure she should tackle.

"I saw Schindler's List and The Pianist and I was really inspired," said the Toronto-born dancer. "But I was afraid I couldn't handle it right. I didn't know if I could be objective enough about this subject. Edmund Fairfax [a ballet scholar] said, 'If you feel that deeply about this story, then go explore it and don't be afraid of feeling these things.'"

Once Greenberg started researching the project, she knew she'd be able to pull it off. Her research included a lot of reading, talking to survivors and attending conferences. "People have sent me letters and poetry," she said. "They've been very generous with their time and memoirs, and I've been immersing myself in this for the last nine months."

But not all her research involved talking to people or reading books. She was also forced to look into her own life. Her grandfather moved to Canada in the 1920s, well before the war, but his family wasn't so lucky. Greenberg lost great-grandparents, great-aunts and many cousins. It was a tragedy her grandfather rarely spoke about.

"He wouldn't talk about these things at all," she said. "He'd get extremely upset when I tried to talk about it, and that bothered me. That made me think about all the people I'd met who have these kinds of stories. How free are they to talk about these things? [Working on the ballet] did help me feel a lot more comfortable dealing with some of these feelings."

Greenberg's passion about her project is evident, so it's surprising to find out that the ballet's not yet completed and, as of now, she's not sure when it will get done.

"The reason is economic," she said. "I don't have the money to finish it. I have to pay the dancers, and it takes a lot of time to go in and work on something."

One way to make money, Greenberg said, is to solicit donations, which is why Ballet Espressivo – the ballet company this veteran dancer started three years ago – recently became a charity. "I've been trying really hard to fundraise. I hope when people see the excerpts they'll be moved."

Uprising* explores the Nazi brutality and Jewish survival through love and resistance.

If audience reaction is any indication, donations should soon be pouring in. Greenberg already showed her excerpts once before and the response, she said, was very encouraging. "There are people who have seen the excerpts and it had a very powerful effect on them. I was really shocked at how powerful it was. If they feel that way, just from seeing excerpts, then when we finish it, it'll be fantastic."

Greenberg's ultimate goal isn't to just put on a good show, though. She hopes to provide a new way to learn about the Holocaust. "History is very alive to me. It should be brought forward and cleaned up, like an old building, but keep the old building shining through. Give a new face to old things and you'll see things in a different light."

Uprising will be performed at various times throughout the Toronto International Dance Festival from Aug. 11 to 19 at The Distillery Historic District. Call 416-214-5854 or visit www.tidf.org for more information.

It will also be performed at the Ashkenaz Festival at Harbourfront on Sept. 3 at 8 p.m.

Survivors recall Night of Broken Glass

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Acclaimed Churchill biographer and Holocaust scholar Sir Martin Gilbert documents the events leading up to the destruction of Europe's Jewish community in his latest book Kristallnacht, Prelude to Destruction (Harper Collins).

With his typical academic brilliance, Gilbert examines the terrifying events of Nov. 10, 1938, Kristallnacht, and how it marked the beginning of the end for Germany's Jews.

He uses two main sources: newspaper accounts from the western media of the time, and interviews with witnesses who survived that black day.

Kristallnacht was a cleverly orchestrated campaign against Germany's Jews initiated by Nazi propaganda minister Joseph Goebbels in retaliation for the assassination of a German diplomat in Paris by a young Jew.

In the early hours of Nov. 10, three days after the assassination, Nazi stormtroopers and youths rampaged through Jewish neighbourhoods throughout Germany, destroying ancient synagogues and Jewish property. Around 30,000 Jews were also rounded up and sent to concentration camps.

Gilbert examines the unprecedented government-sanctioned destruction that took place throughout Germany and annexed Austria.

Eyewitnesses who were children at the time recall how Jewish shops were broken into, how synagogue fires burned out of control and how they were awakened by the unmistakable sounds of the Gestapo racing up the stairs to arrest their fathers.

Unlike the Holocaust itself, Kristallnacht was widely reported in the western press. As the Times in Britain commented in the next day's paper: "No foreign propaganda bent upon blackening Germany before the world could outdo the tale of burnings and beatings, of blackguards' assaults on defenceless and innocent people, which disgraced the country yesterday."

After Kristallnacht, any hope German Jews had that Nazi anti-Semitism would blow over was shattered like the glass on their streets.

Emigration was their final hope. According to Gilbert, during the 10 months between Kristallnacht and the outbreak of the war, 120,000 German Jews emigrated, compared to 150,000 in the five previous years. But the Nazis' increasingly tough exit visa requirements and the unwillingness of western governments to open their borders sealed the majority's fate.

Fewer than 10,000 German Jews survived the war. Half that number survived in hiding, while the other half survived as a result of the Rosenstrasse protest (Jewish men married to German women were released from captivity after their wives staged a protest).

Kristallnacht is a welcome addition to the well-documented and painstakingly researched historical record of the systematic eradication of Germany's Jews.

Love of the land brings together a Jew and a Palestinian Arab

The Lemon Tree: An Arab, a Jew and the Heart of the Middle East* by Sandy Tolan, Bloomsbury.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Shortly after the 1967 Six Day War, three Palestinian men rang Dalia Eshkenazi's doorbell in Ramla, a town in Israel about midway between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. The unexpected callers were Bashir Khairi and his cousins, Yasser and Ghiath.

"This was my father's house," said one of them. "And I lived here, too."

He then asked if he could see the house. Dalia, having always wondered who the original occupants had been, invited them in. This was the start of an unusual friendship between Dalia, an Israeli patriot whose Bulgarian parents survived the Holocaust, and Bashir, a Palestinian nationalist whose ancestors were originally Moroccan Arabs.

Sandy Tolan

The story of their friendship, a microcosm of Israel's perpetual conflict with the Palestinians, is the subject of Sandy Tolan's The Lemon Tree: An Arab, a Jew, and the Heart of the Middle East, a poignant book that inspires both hope and despair at a time when a deep sense of gloom has descended on the region yet again.

Tolan, a skilled American journalist, fleshes out his meandering narrative with accounts of the Khairi and Eshkenazi family history and with highlights of Dalia's relationship with Bashir, all set against the backdrop of fast-moving and jolting events in Palestine.

The Khairis arrived in Ramla in the 16th century and, as land owners, prospered. The clash pitting Zionism against Palestinian nationalism affected them, but never more so than when the United Nations passed a seminal resolution partitioning Palestine into separate Arab and Jewish states. Under the plan, Ramla was to be part of a Palestinian Arab state, but when fighting escalated, the strategically located town became a flashpoint in the struggle.

Bashir and his siblings were sent to the West Bank town of Ramallah, but other Palestinians in Ramla were expelled by Israeli forces, as Yitzhak Rabin acknowledged in his memoirs.

The Khairis assumed that they would soon return to their home, but this was not to be. Tolan, a diligent researcher, quotes David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, as telling his cabinet that Palestinian refugees would be barred from returning.

Bashir's parents, Ahmad and Zakia, eventually got the message and gave up their dream to go back to Ramla. Hoping that they would have better prospects elsewhere, they went to the Gaza Strip toward the close of 1948. Having come into an inheritance, they moved back to Ramallah in 1957.

Just as the Khairis had been dealt a bad hand, so the Eshkenazis were tossed around by the whims of turbulence.

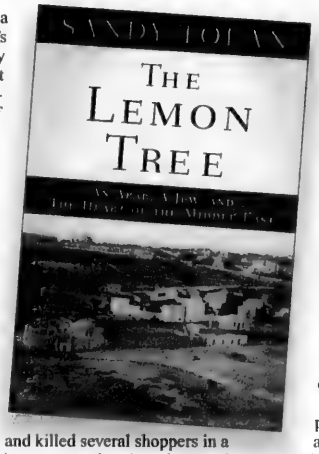
Virtually disenfranchised by the fascist, pro-Nazi government in wartime Bulgaria, Moshe and Solia Eshkenazi immigrated to Israel shortly after its emergence as a sovereign Jewish state, like many Bulgarian Jews.

Their daughter, Dalia, whose name had been Daizy, was born in Sofia, Bulgaria's capital, on Dec. 2, 1947. Not too long afterward, she and her parents found themselves in Israel. They settled in Ramla in November 1948, when it was still much of a ghost town and the embers of Israel's War of Independence still glowed.

Like all new immigrants, they were free to enter an abandoned Arab house, inspect it and claim it. Moshe and Solia chose a stone building with a garden and a lemon tree that had belonged to the Khairis.

As a child, Dalia asked her parents who had previously lived in their home, and she was always told it had been an Arab house. At school, she was taught that the Palestinian inhabitants of Ramla had left voluntarily.

When the Six Day War broke out, Dalia was an officer in the army, while Bashir was a lawyer in Ramallah. Bashir's decision to visit Ramla in July 1967 was anything but unusual, Tolan writes. Hundreds, perhaps thousands of Palestinians made pilgrimages to childhood homes in Israel in the immediate aftermath of that war.



Two months after dropping in on Dalia in Ramla and inviting her to visit him in Ramallah, Bashir was arrested, charged with being a leader of the nascent Palestinian movement resisting Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip. He spent 100 days in prison.

In 1969, after Palestinian terrorists detonated a bomb and killed several shoppers in a Jerusalem supermarket, Bashir was arrested again and accused of being a member of an outlawed organization, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine.

He denied any connection to the bombing, or membership in the PFLP, but was sentenced to 15 years in prison for complicity in the attack. Feeling betrayed by Bashir, Dalia, now an English teacher in a Ramla high school, cut all contact with him, and grew cynical about the future of Jews and Arabs living side by side in a spirit of coexistence.

Prior to these events, Dalia and Bashir had talked about the Arab-Israeli dispute, but their discussions had seemed like a dialogue of the deaf.

Dalia understood the Palestinian longing to return to their homes in what was now Israel, but Bashir could not understand how that could be equated with the wish of Jews to settle in their ancestral homeland. Nor did Bashir think that Jews who had arrived in Palestine after the 1917 Balfour Declaration had a right to live in Israel.

"You are living in a place that does not belong to you, Dalia," Bashir said. "Well, you realize it's also my country," Dalia countered. "No, it's not," Bashir retorted. "You stole it from us."

This exchange, as quoted by Tolan, gives a reader a flavour of the yawning gap in their respective views. Nevertheless, Bashir considered Dalia an open-minded person, "a lonely candle in a darkened room."

In 1985, following her father's death, Dalia inherited the house in Ramla. Her mother had passed away eight years earlier. Upon Bashir's release from prison, Dalia's husband, Yehezkel Landau, informed him through an intermediary that Dalia wished to meet him and discuss the future of the house, based on the claims of their families.

Dalia offered to pay reparations for the loss of the property, but Bashir rejected her offer. They finally agreed that the house would be turned into a kindergarten for Israeli-Arab children and a place where Jews and Arabs could meet in friendly encounters. It was called the Open House and inaugurated in 1991.

In the meantime, Bashir was arrested once more, charged with inciting disturbances in Gaza and the West Bank, and exiled to Lebanon. Bashir settled in Tunis but returned to Ramallah in 2001.

He and Dalia resumed their dialogue. She talked about resolving the conflict through a two-state solution, but Bashir demanded a one-state solution – a single, secular, democratic state, as outlined in the PLO's 1965 charter.

It's clear that there is little common ground between Dalia and Bashir. But what separates them also connects them, this land that means so much to Jews and Palestinians alike.

Oh baby! Let's eat!

By NORENE GILLETZ

My youngest grandchild, Sammy, turned one year old on July 4 and is now busy exploring the wonderful world of food. I guess it's all in the family. His father, my son Doug Gilletz, was professionally trained as a chef and enjoys cooking delicious dishes for his delicious little son. No jars or bottles of processed baby food for Sammy – although he did enjoy his chocolate birthday cake, happily shoving it into his mouth with his chubby little hands!

You can imagine how thrilled I was to receive a copy of Super Foods for Babies and Children by Annabel Karmel (Atria Books). Karmel, the mother of three, is the author of 14 best-selling books on healthy food for children.

Super Foods is an excellent resource, with more than 130 kid-friendly recipes plus terrific tips on nutrition for each stage of your child's development. The pictures are whimsical and provide visual aids to enticing eats. Karmel knows what children should eat – and what they will eat. http://www.annabelkarmel.com.

Eating by colour encourages parents to use foods in tempting combinations. Karmel provides easy instructions for creating balanced meals, with menu charts to help you plan ahead, suggestions for healthy convenience foods to keep on hand and information on allergies and common childhood complaints.

Super Foods for Babies and Children will guide you through your child's first five years, from first foods for your baby to delicious meals for fussy toddlers. There are creative lunch-box ideas for schoolchildren, snack suggestions, scrumptious family meal ideas, plus tips on getting kids into the kitchen to help with meal preparation. Almost all of the recipes can be used or adapted easily by the kosher cook.

Recipes include Tomato Sauce with Hidden Vegetables, Spinach and Ricotta Cannelloni, Salmon Teriyaki with Noodles and Rabbit Muffins – fun foods that will appeal to kids of all ages. This book reminds me of the Joy of Cooking, but with a focus on feeding kids fantastic food.

I'm not really sure if I want to pass this cookbook on to my son Doug. He'll just have to drive down the 401 from Montreal to Toronto with his wife and Sammy to enjoy some of the healthy, fun dishes in Super Foods! I think that's a super idea, don't you?

BAKED SWEET POTATO AND CARROT PUREE

From six months. Baking sweet potatoes in the oven enhances their naturally sweet taste, so this is a good puree to make if you are making a roast for the rest of the family, as you can just pop the sweet potato into the oven to cook alongside. It is also very tasty without the added carrot.

1 medium sweet potato
2 medium carrots, peeled and sliced
2 to 3 tbsp. of your baby's usual milk

Preheat the oven to 375. Wash and dry the sweet potato and prick all over with a fork. Bake in the oven until tender (about 45 minutes). Meanwhile, steam or boil the carrots until tender (about 20 minutes). When the sweet potato is soft, allow it to cool a little, then cut it in half and scoop out the flesh. Puree together with the cooked carrot and the milk.

Alternatively, you can cook the sweet potato in a microwave. Pierce several holes in the potato with a fork. Place on at least two layers of microwave-safe paper towels. Microwave on high for 5 minutes, turning halfway through the cooking time. Let stand for 5 minutes. Peel and puree with the carrot and a little of your baby's usual milk. Makes 4 portions.

Tip: Sweet potato comes in two varieties – orange-fleshed and creamy-fleshed. Both have red skins and both are good sources of potassium, vitamin C and fibre. However, I prefer to use the orange-fleshed variety, which is also an excellent source of beta-carotene. This helps to prevent certain types of cancer and mops up free radicals.

FINGER-PICKING CHICKEN BALLS

1 tbsp. light olive oil
1 medium onion, finely chopped
1/2 cup grated carrot
1 large Granny Smith apple, peeled and grated
2 5-ounce boneless, skinless chicken breasts, cut into chunks
1 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley
1 tsp. chopped fresh thyme or 1/2 tsp. dried (optional)
1/2 cup fresh white bread crumbs
1 chicken bouillon cube, crumbled
salt and freshly ground black pepper
all-purpose flour for coating
vegetable oil for frying

Heat the olive oil in a pan and saute half the onion and the grated carrot for 3 minutes, stirring occasionally. Using your hands, squeeze out a little excess liquid from the grated apple. Mix together the grated apple, chicken and sauteed onion and carrot along with the raw chopped onion, parsley, thyme, bread crumbs and bouillon cube and chop for a few seconds in a food processor. Season with a little salt and pepper.

With your hands, form the mixture into about 20 balls, roll them in flour and fry in a little oil until lightly golden and cooked through (4 to 5 minutes). Makes 20 balls.

Tip: Chicken is high in protein, low in fat and low in cholesterol. Our bodies require a certain amount of protein each day and the body does not store protein, so we need to replenish it each day. Protein provides the building blocks of all cells.

MINI-VEGETABLE BURGERS

These tasty mini-burgers in a crispy coating are bursting with fresh vegetables and flavoured with Gruyère cheese.

2 medium potatoes (do not peel)
2 tbsp. butter
1 small onion, chopped
1/2 cup chopped broccoli florets
1/2 cup grated carrot
1/2 cup washed and finely chopped white part of a leek
1 cup chopped button mushrooms
1 cup frozen or canned corn
1 tsp. soy sauce
1/4 cup grated Gruyère cheese
1 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley
cayenne pepper
salt and freshly ground black pepper
seasoned all-purpose flour (flour mixed with a little salt and pepper)
2 eggs, lightly beaten
1 cup bread crumbs
vegetable oil for frying
15 mini buns
lettuce
ketchup

Cook the potatoes in a pan of boiling water for 25 to 30 minutes, then peel and grate. Meanwhile, melt the butter and sauté the onion for about 3 minutes. Add the broccoli, carrot, leek and mushrooms, and sauté for 5 minutes. Add the grated potato, corn, soy sauce, cheese, parsley, a pinch of cayenne pepper, and salt and pepper to taste. Form the mixture into 15 mini burgers, coat with flour, dip in the beaten egg, and then dip in the bread crumbs. Dip in the egg once again and then coat with another layer of bread crumbs to make a crispy coating for the burgers. Sauté in a small amount of oil in a skillet until crisp and golden on both sides. Serve on their own or in mini buns with a little lettuce and ketchup. Makes 15 mini burgers.

Tip: Onions and leeks have a protective action on the circulatory system that helps to prevent blood clots. With children eating more and more junk food, fatty deposits in the arteries can now be found in even the youngest of children, and in later life these deposits may lead to heart disease, as will arterial blood clots. When fat deposits and blood clots break loose and clog the arteries, the result is a heart attack or stroke.

MIXED BERRY AND WHITE CHOCOLATE CHEESECAKE

Crumb Crust:
8 oz. graham crackers (2 1/2 cups crumbs)
1 stick butter, melted (1/2 cup) vegetable oil for greasing pan
Cheesecake:
5 oz. white chocolate
10 oz. cream cheese, at room temperature
1 tsp. pure vanilla extract or 1 vanilla bean
1 cup heavy cream (35%)
Topping:
14 oz. mixed summer berries, such as strawberries, blackberries, raspberries, blueberries and red currants
2 tbsp. seedless raspberry jam
2 oz. white chocolate

To make the crust, put the graham crackers in a plastic bag and crush them with a rolling pin, then mix with the melted butter. Press them into the bottom of a lightly oiled 8-in. loose-bottomed tart pan or springform pan (this can be done with a potato masher). Place in the refrigerator to chill.

Melt the white chocolate in a heatproof bowl over a pan of simmering water. Remove the bowl from the pan and beat in the cream cheese. Add the vanilla to the cream or, if using a vanilla bean, split it lengthwise with a sharp knife and scrape the seeds into the cream.

Whip the cream until it forms fairly stiff peaks and gently fold in the cream cheese and white chocolate mixture. Pour on top of the crust and put in the refrigerator for at least 2 hours to set.

Once the cake is set, carefully remove from the pan. Arrange the berries on top of the cake. Heat the jam with 2 teaspoons of water and strain through a sieve. Allow to cool for about 1 minute and gently brush over the fruits. Melt the white chocolate and drizzle over the top of the fruits with a teaspoon. Makes 8 portions.

Tip: Summer berries are packed with vitamin C, which helps to strengthen the immune system and fight infection. Vitamin C also aids in the absorption of iron.

CBC broadcaster lands top gigs

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Talking to Elliotte Friedman, you wouldn't know that CBC Sports is under pressure.

Sure, the national public broadcaster lost anchor Brian Williams to CTV, and yes, its National Hockey League and Canadian Football League television contracts expire at the end of this year. But the fresh-faced smiling attitude of 35-year-old Friedman is cool and calm, exuding a friendly warmth that says, "I'm just enjoying the time I'm here."

Elliotte Friedman

To Friedman, here is in Toronto, Canada's sports capital. Here is also CBC Sports, reporting for Hockey Night in Canada and anchoring the CFL on CBC. These flagship shows are the major leagues for Canadian sports reporters, no doubt making Friedman the envy of his peers. After all, he not only enjoys his day job, but his eyes practically twinkle when he discusses what motivates him to get up in the morning.

"Sports is one of the last unscripted forms of entertainment out there," he said in an interview at a downtown restaurant. "Even now, after 13 years in the business, I've seen the craziest and strangest things that can happen."

Forget CBC's future, focus on the present. That works as Friedman's motto, and it comes from a reporter who earned his chops in a highly competitive industry. He's nabbed exclusive interviews with a fuming Carlos Delgado, traded respectful barbs with former Toronto Maple Leafs coach Pat Quinn and engaged Philadelphia Flyers general manager Bobby Clarke in such a snappy interview that American broadcasters aired the footage.

How does he earn respect? "You have to ask questions the subject has never heard," Friedman said between sips of beer. "You have to give them something they want to answer."

Friedman's talent for sports journalism didn't come without effort, or passion. As a student at Toronto's York Mills Collegiate Institute, his name was synonymous with sports ("But more for watching them than playing them," Friedman is quick to add).

At the University of Western Ontario, he volunteered for the student paper as sports editor and finally as editor-in-chief. "I was shy and not very confident at first," Friedman admits. "But I learned I was good at something that I enjoyed doing, and I walked into locker rooms and asked tough questions with tact."

After graduation, Friedman left the world of print journalism to work at the Fan 590 radio station, where he still banters as a weekly panelist. Back in the mid-1990s, he mainly covered Toronto Raptors basketball games, also winning acclaim as 1996's Telemedia Reporter of the Year.

His biggest media transition came when he moved from radio to television, reporting on various sports for The Score network (previously known as Headline Sports). His cherubic face and measured voice appeared everywhere – six Stanley Cup finals, four Grey Cup championships, two World Series and one Olympic Games. To the casual observer, he didn't stand out like a Don Cherry would. But on The Score, his zeal for sports was infectious, and his broadcasts always included thorough research and punchy quotes.

"Athletes were willing to do interviews with me, because they felt they could say what they wanted and we would let them," Friedman said. "The Score was the kind of place that said, 'OK, we have seven minutes of footage and that's too long, but it's good stuff so we'll run the whole thing'."

At The Score, Friedman learned how to write lean scripts for TV – a medium he described as "the hardest to write for, compared to print" – and how to look sharp for the cameras.

"When I was 26, a guy in a business suit said I'm a great reporter but I would never make it on air. 'You're not good looking enough,' he told me."

Friedman half-laughs, then adds: "That's good because I remembered that, even when I was at The Score doing live interviews."

Apparently, CBC thought Friedman looked good enough to work on the country's most storied sports program. At the end of 2003, CBC Sports hired him to package the "headliner" feature before the telecast of Hockey Night in Canada. He also interviews players during intermission, and reports with mid-game updates.

Now anchoring the CFL on CBC, Friedman decides what topic to discuss at halftime and can touch a commentator's knee off camera in order to end a conversation. While the job is different from his hockey work, Friedman looks forward to his CFL stints.

"The CFL is a goofy league in a good way," he said. "Reporters can get execs on the phone without too much hassle, and the weirdest things happen in a game. I like that the league doesn't take itself too seriously."

Neither does Friedman, so the match is practically made in heaven. Friedman is so easygoing that he doesn't put too much stock in the problematic future of CBC Sports. "I'm happy where I am right now, and that's all that matters," he said.

"My contract isn't up until August 2008, so I'm not going anywhere."

Sports not immune to effects of Lebanon crisis

Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM —Israel's ongoing conflict with Hezbollah is being felt in the world of sports.

UEFA, the governing body for European soccer, has told Israeli clubs Hapoel Tel Aviv and Bnei Yehuda they will have to play their UEFA Cup games outside Israel.

And in Scotland, the Scottish Cricket Union cancelled Israel's European Championship game with Jersey after the Union received threats against the Israeli team on tour in Glasgow. The Championships are sponsored by the International Cricket Council.

UEFA chief executive Lars-Christer Olsson rejected an appeal by the Israel Football Association (IFA) to permit the games in Israel, saying the Israeli clubs must find alternative venues outside of the country due to the security situation.

Hapoel were due to host Slovenian side Domzale on Aug. 8 with Bnei Yehuda hosting Lokomotiv Sofia two days later, both at Bloomfield Stadium in Tel Aviv.

In Scotland, meanwhile, Glasgow police approved a Muslim demonstration at a Glasgow cricket club field for approximately 2,000 people. Days later Scottish cricket officials received anonymous telephone calls saying the safety of the Israeli players at the ground could not be guaranteed, according to Israel Cricket Association president Stanley Perlman.

"The Scottish Cricket Union [SCU] has found itself in a situation in which the local cricket clubs are not prepared to host the Israeli teams for fear of a Muslim backlash," Perlman said.

Better to laugh

ARTS IN FOCUS
By Oren Shefa

There's nothing funny about war. It's ugly, brutal and a horrific reality of today's troubled world. Israel is currently in the midst of a two-front assault on its democratic right to exist. International condemnation has reached levels not seen in nearly 25 years, and at home, while support for the military remains strong, faith in the government's competency and the country's direction is waning. With countless reasons to cry, it's amazing that so many Israelis are looking to humour to ease some of the tension they must live with every day.

Comedy, and especially political satire, is an ingrained part of the Israeli mentality. With the amount of drama that the country's politics breeds, it's no wonder that Israelis are generally an involved, educated and opinionated people. Being so in tune with what's going on in the world means that Israelis have a real appreciation for the kind of sophisticated humour that political satire is notorious for. They love a good joke, even if at times it might flirt with being grossly inappropriate.

As bombs began dropping in northern Israel by the hundreds, leftist radio and TV personalities Shai and Dror were quick to respond to the crisis. Contacting a fast food restaurant in Beirut, they ordered kosher hamburgers to be delivered by Katyusha rockets to the northern Israel border town of Kiryat Shmona.

Making light of a volatile situation while bombs rain down on innocent civilians is something that only a battle-hardened people can have the stomach for. Consider that even five years after 9/11, finding humour in a plane hijacking would be in extremely poor taste and very painful to many Americans.

Another incredibly popular show currently on Israeli television is Keshet-TV's Eretz Nehederet (This Wonderful Land). This satirical news program takes aim at some of the most topical issues in politics, sport and entertainment.

Recently, as the Israeli military called up reservists to return to service as operations in Lebanon intensified, the cast and crew of Eretz Nehederet were called back from hiatus and into the studio to record an "emergency" broadcast of the show, which aired July 28.

One highlight of the special edition revolved around the Israel Defence Forces' objective of killing Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah. An actor portraying Israel Defence Forces Chief of Staff Dan Halutz sat in the studio assuring the public that Nasrallah is as good as dead and that nothing has been heard from him in days. "Nasrallah" then enters the studio surrounded by dancing virgins, contradicting the statement. An IDF spokesperson, sitting beside Halutz, refuses to admit Israeli failure by suggesting that Nasrallah's presence in the studio could have been pre-recorded.

The jibes, like the bombs flying over the unstable region, land on both sides of the border.

In Israel, terrorism is a daily reality. True, the escalation in violence is cause for great concern, especially if Hezbollah is able to fulfil its promises to reach further and further into Israel with longer-range weapons, but for many, the idea of brooding over worst-case scenarios is counterproductive.

Israelis have always found a way to carry on in the best way they can. With one eye on the skies, they continue to go to work, spend time with family and friends, and enjoy life as much as possible. Being able to find a way to laugh is just another measure of normalcy that keeps Israelis from allowing what they can't control to overtake them.

Oriental Express Beef Lettuce Wraps

1-1/2 lbs. ground beef
1/2 cup hoisin sauce
1/2 cup Asian peanut sauce
1 medium cucumber, seeded; chopped
1/4 cup torn fresh mint leaves
salt and pepper
12 large lettuce leaves (iceberg or romaine)
fresh mint leaves to garnish

Brown ground beef in large nonstick skillet over medium heat 8-10 minutes or until beef is not pink, breaking up into small crumbles. Pour off drippings. Stir in hoisin sauce and peanut sauce; heat through. Just before serving, add cucumber and torn mint to beef mixture; toss gently. Season with salt and pepper. Serve in lettuce leaves. Garnish with mint. Serves 4.

As bombs fall, peace calls

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

War stinks!

Ever so slightly, for a brief moment on the night of July 28, I felt like the world was out of control.

My mind, which has a propensity to respond anxiously to events, began to spin while I considered that day's attack on the Jewish federation building in Seattle. I reasoned that such an attack would likely be the model for others, possibly, and God forbid, one here in Toronto, based on our government's strong support for Israel and for the war against terror.

In a tizzy for another second, I reasoned that terror attacks in North America could encourage anti-Semitism throughout the Diaspora, a classic condition whereby the victim is blamed, as is common with Israel.

Rational once again, I purposely stopped the "flight or fight" chemicals that were surging through me, determining instead that we're a different sort of nation. Our culture is predicated on co-existence, and we need to be strong.

War, when it comes, as it has once again with the Jewish war against Hezbollah and terrorism, washes away our sense of security and the belief that we are citizens of a sane world. War stinks, as it takes that comforting illusion away from us and causes us to feel dirty and base as we witness bloody violence and the destruction of objects and property made by creative builders and students. War is shamefully ugly, and shockingly appalling to our senses.

Similarly, war reminds us that it's incumbent upon the Jewish People to be eternally vigilant of the evil that prowls around our block.

War stinks. It does many things to us of a negative nature, but its insidiousness also reminds us that the alternative is peace. Those who have gone through war know this well. The late Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin voiced the belief that having known war, it is paramount that Israel pursue peace.

In this column, my goal is not to criticize or undermine Israel's operation against Hezbollah, which is tantamount to taking action against a psychotic neighbour who is intent on burning down your house and killing your children.

Not at all.

My hope is that the world community might finally wake up to the devastation of war, and to our collective potential for goodness, by opening another front – that being the wholehearted pursuit of peace.

We must do so, because hate is vile. It is humanly debilitating. This is so painfully clear to all of us, having just lived through the most violent century in history and witnessing the murder of hundreds of millions of people in World War I, World War II, Stalinist Russia, Maoist China, Cambodia, Yugoslavia, Rwanda, the Congo, Sudan, Somalia, South America. The list goes on.

Israel must fight until it has achieved its goal of eradicating the threat of those intent on wiping it out. But the smells of more burning bodies, be they in Israel or in Lebanon, and the images of mass destruction must also act as an urgent push for a movement that encourages all people of reason to draw upon the positive and peaceful components of their respective ideologies and invest heavily in achieving a world where coexistence and understanding is a reality.

Eli Wiesel refers to himself as a weeping optimist – a person who cries at the inhumanity of man against man, yet retains an affirmative view of our potential to become better at the job of living and cultivating righteousness.

We should consider his position, a healthy one, rather than choosing to be laughing pessimists, as this has only brought sorrow and grief to millions of people throughout history.

For a moment, I thought the world was out of control. People of the world, it's time that we choose peace once and for all.

Fragile ceasefire takes hold

By YAAKOV KATZ
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — A ceasefire took effect in Lebanon on Monday, as Israel ordered its air force, navy, artillery and other units to halt offensive operations there.

Since fighting erupted over a month ago, 166 Israelis had been killed – 114 Israel Defence Forces soldiers and 52 civilians.

While the ceasefire agreement was "fragile," the IDF planned to uphold its part in the agreement and to suspend all offensives against Hezbollah Monday morning, a high-ranking officer in the Northern Command told the Jerusalem Post Sunday night.

On Sunday, the IDF finished taking up positions along the Litani River in preparation for the ceasefire. IDF troops operating in Lebanon, the officer said, would halt their attacks on Hezbollah strongholds in nearby villages but would maintain their positions and would be ready to "jump into any village or city, including Tyre, if necessary."

If Hezbollah fired Katyusha rockets into Israel after the ceasefire went into effect, the IDF would feel it could bomb targets throughout Lebanon, including Beirut, the high-ranking officer said. "If Hezbollah breaks the ceasefire, we will see ourselves allowed to respond," the officer said.

Despite the ceasefire, the Home Front Command insisted that northern residents remain vigilant and continue to abide by the current guidelines.

Two hours before the ceasefire went into effect, the Israel Air Force dropped leaflets on central Beirut Monday, warning it will retaliate for any attack launched against it from Lebanon.

Addressed to Lebanese citizens, one leaflet said Hezbollah serves the interests of its Iranian and Syrian patrons and has "brought destruction, displacement and death.

"Will you be able to pay this price again?" it asked.

"The Israel Defence Forces will return and act with the required force against any terrorist act that is launched from Lebanon against the State of Israel," it said.

The IDF held its fire Monday morning in order to allow the Lebanese government – for the first time since the conflict with Hezbollah began last month – to take control of southern Lebanon.

Red Cross asked to check soldiers' fate

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A Canadian senator and a U.S. congressman are asking international relief organizations to inquire into the fate of three Israeli soldiers kidnapped by Islamic terrorist groups.

Senator Jerry Grafstein has asked the Canadian Red Cross (CRC) to urge the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) to look into the well-being of the three Israeli soldiers, Yair Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, captured by Hezbollah, and Gilad Shalit, captured by Hamas. Meanwhile, south of the border, Congressman Alcee Hastings was making a similar request of the American Red Cross.

Within two days of his letter to CRC secretary general Pierre Duplessis, Grafstein was told in an e-mail reply that the CRC will take "appropriate measures" with the ICRC.

But, the CRC cautioned, any ICRC activities would likely remain confidential given the ongoing conflict in the Middle East.

Grafstein had written to the CRC asking it "actively urge the ICRC to visit the Israeli soldiers kidnapped by Hamas and Hezbollah in order to verify that they are being treated in a humane fashion in accordance with the Geneva Conventions."

Though non-state actors, Hamas and Hezbollah are required to comply with international legal norms in dealing with prisoners, Grafstein wrote. "The terrorist organizations, Hamas and Hezbollah, who both form part of their respective governments,

The News in Brief

CANADA

Over $1 Million Raised

OTTAWA — Ottawa's Jewish federation said its Israel Crisis Campaign has raised more than $1 million. The money will help rebuild northern Israeli communities and help residents move to safety.

WORLD

Jews Back Lieberman

HARTFORD — Jews in Connecticut gave U.S. Senator Joseph Lieberman more than 60 per cent of their vote in his unsuccessful bid to gain the Democratic nomination. A CBS/New York Times poll showed Lieberman won 61 per cent of the Jewish vote in last week's primary, while his challenger, Ned Lamont, won 39 per cent. Overall, Lamont bested Lieberman 52 per cent to 48 per cent. Lamont challenged Lieberman for backing the Iraq war and for his closeness to U.S. President George W. Bush. Lieberman, who as the Democrats' vice-presidential candidate in 2000 was the first Jew on a viable presidential ticket, will run as an independent in this fall's election.

Arab Men Arrested

CLEVELAND — Two men were arrested in Ohio on charges of laundering money for Hezbollah. Police apprehended Ali Houssaiky and Osama Abulhassan, 20, of Dearborn, Mich., on Aug. 8 for a traffic violation in Marietta, Ohio, and found $11,000 in cash, 12 cellphones, airline passenger lists and other information on airport security. The men, who also were found with a map marking Wal-Mart stores from Ohio to South Carolina, admitted to buying hundreds of phones and reselling them in Dearborn, a Detroit suburb with a large Arab population that's been a focus of investigations into fundraising for Hezbollah and Hamas.

U.K. Jews OK: Police

LONDON — Police told British Jews that they face no specific threat after a plot to bomb 10 transatlantic flights from London was thwarted last week. Anglo Jews have already been experiencing increased tension since the Israel-Hezbollah war last month, with more than 90 anti-Semitic incidents reported in July.

Writer Attacks Israel

OSLO — A popular Norwegian novelist published a viciously anti-Israel broadside in one of Norway's largest newspapers. Jostein Gaarder, author of Sophie's World and The Solitaire Mystery, wrote in Aftenposten that Israel is "history" and added that "we do not recognize the State of Israel. Not today, not as of this writing, not in the hour of grief and wrath. If the entire Israeli nation should fall to its own devices and parts of the population have to flee the occupied areas into another diaspora, then we say: may the surroundings stay calm and show them mercy." After the article proved controversial, Gaarder reportedly said he could have expressed himself with more precision.

Fund Donates

LOS ANGELES — A foundation started by Steven Spielberg will donate $1 million (US) to Israeli relief efforts. The Righteous Persons Foundation will give $250,000 to the Jewish Federation of Los Angeles Israel Crisis Fund and will give to the New Israel Fund and other groups assisting residents of northern Israel.

Museum Gets Money

BERLIN — Germany will contribute $6.4 million (US) for a museum on the site of the Warsaw Ghetto that traces the history of Polish Jewry. The German Finance Ministry will transfer half the money this year and the rest in 2007, it said last month. The museum will cost $44.6 million.

Ex-chief Rabbi Dies

GENEVA — Alexander Safran, the former chief rabbi of Romania who tried to prevent Romania's pro-Nazi regime from deporting Jews to concentration camps in World War II, died July 27 in Geneva at 95. He was later chief rabbi of Geneva and a professor of philosophy.

Jewish Youth Beaten Up In France

PARIS — French police are holding three young men suspected of attacking a 16-year-old Jewish boy.

According to witnesses, several groups of teenagers were hanging out in a parking lot near the northern Alps town of Annecy Lake, about 20 miles south of Geneva, early in the morning of Aug. 6 after attending a fireworks show.

Hearing a young girl call her friend "Abraham," four young men of North African origin allegedly approached, said, "You're Jewish?" and then beat up the boy, kicking him in the stomach and jaw. The Jewish teen, who is Venezuelan, was taken to hospital, treated and released. When interrogated by police, the four young men denied beating the teen up because he was Jewish. One was released, while the other three were being held pending a hearing.

David Gamrasni, president of the local chapter of the Jewish group CRIF, told the journal Liberation that such incidents are common in that part of France.

Issue today is Israel's existence: Krauthammer

UJA campaign launch moved up because of crisis

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Israel's defensive operations against Hezbollah are part of a wider struggle that threatens the free world in a way not seen in more than 60 years, syndicated columnist Charles Krauthammer told a major UJA fundraising event in Toronto last week.

Israel is fighting not only for itself but for "the good and the right, the just and the true… for Canadians, Americans, members of western civilization, and people who find themselves, without having invited it, in a struggle against forces of evil, death and destruction unlike any seen since Nazi Germany," Krauthammer told UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Israel Emergency Campaign launch 2007, held at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel. "That's why Israel has the support of great nations like the United States, Canada, Australia and Britain, and a precious few others."

The emotional event, attended by more than 2,500 people, also marked the start of this year's UJA campaign, which was rescheduled to take place Aug. 8, a month earlier than planned, because of the crisis in Israel.

It included an address by Yair Goldwasser, brother of kidnapped IDF soldier Ehud Goldwasser; a performance by Israeli singer Liel, 17, who said she wants to use her music "to promote peace and send a message of a better world;" a video address by Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert; and remarks by Israel's consul general in Toronto, Ya'acov Brosh.

Organizers of the emergency campaign aim to raise $20 million over and above the regular campaign, which last year raised $58 million, said Ariella Rohringer, who is co-chairing Campaign 2007 with Fred Waks.

Waks announced at the event that $9 million had been raised for the emergency campaign in just two weeks.

Krauthammer, a Pulitzer prize-winning columnist for the Washington Post who also writes every month in Time magazine, said the current situation feels like the 1930s, because "we live in a deeply Orwellian moral universe where black is white and white is black, where right is wrong and wrong is right, and the aggressor like Hezbollah is not just excused but extolled."

Acknowledging that many people are suffering in Lebanon, Krauthammer noted that "it was the Shiites of Lebanon who started this war with premeditation and deliberation.

"Has anyone spoken out for the suffering of the Jews, or the reconstruction of northern Israel which has been attacked in a way that has not happened since the Blitz in London in 1940?" he asked.

There is not a country in the world that would have responded to the kind of aggression Israel has faced with the restraint Israel has shown, said Krauthammer, who outlined a "radical asymmetry" between Israel and Hezbollah.

"Hezbollah fights in a way designed to maximize civilian casualties on both sides," he said, citing its "wanton" rocket attacks, hiding among UN personnel, and use of human shields in urban areas – a "universally recognized war crime."

Israel fights in a way designed to minimize civilian casualties, he said, citing precision weapons and advance warnings to civilians, even though the latter enable Hezbollah to escape, and result in deaths of Israeli soldiers.

"Yet which country is attacked by that disgraceful secretary general of the United Nations, Kofi Annan? We know the answer to that."

Israel at War

War and peace

As Jews the world over are riveted to the events of the war Iran and Syria have been waging on Israel through their deputized Hezbollah army and to the long, sorrowful list of the dead, there is a sense that history is turning on itself.

Israel's past is once again its present.

The fact that Israel was not able to prevent rockets from slamming into its cities, towns and villages daily, or eliminate all the Hezbollah gunmen, or assassinate Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah even after four weeks of fighting, will undoubtedly feed the fiendish annihilationist fantasies of its enemies, among whom are a large cadre of Palestinian fundamentalists led by Hamas and Islamic Jihad and genocidal Islamists led by Osama bin Laden, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Nasrallah.

But the fact that Israel was not able to prevent rockets from slamming into its cities, towns and villages daily, or eliminate all the Hezbollah gunmen, or assassinate Hassan Nasrallah even after four weeks of fighting has also reinstilled a sense of existential vulnerability among Israelis.

It should by now be clearer than ever that Israel has been fighting for the right simply to lead a free, peaceful, sovereign life as a western, Jewish state in the Middle East. The fighting by the Hezbollah axis was not about "resistance" or "liberation," their phony claims about the "occupied" Sheba Farms (Har Dov) notwithstanding.

There is no doubt that Israel's implacable foes are already plotting their next campaign of blood-letting and murder against the Jewish state. And there is equally no doubt that Israel's foes are also the foes of the West, though, sad to say, many are the governments and the people of the West who still do not see, let alone understand, this truth.

The UN Security Council debates the language of a ceasefire resolution without any reference to the reasons that the war erupted.

The UN Human Rights Council approves a resolution, by a vote of 27-11, that condemns Israel for massive bombardment of Lebanese civilian populations and orders a commission to travel to the war-torn area to investigate whether Israel committed war crimes. Canada, thankfully, opposed the resolution.

Since the resolution makes no mention of Hezbollah, it is questionable whether the investigators will deign to look upon the destruction in the villages, towns and cities in Israel where Katyusha and other rockets landed and killed scores of innocents.

To the arsenal of rockets, missiles, terrorists, suicide bombers and, God forbid, even worse, Israel's enemies have also re-mobilized language. In a stark re-enactment of the many surreal, morally inverted debates that have been held over the years in the United Nations and its related forums, Israel once again stands accused for defending its existence. Indeed its very existence is once again delegitimized and challenged.

We have seen it before. The past has rolled back on us.

But even in the thickness of the dark clouds that seem to have returned to the Jewish horizon, it is important to be reminded that there is still a unique, resilient, unimaginably strong vibrancy to life in the tiny Jewish country that fiercely defends its right to exist, the proof of which is ubiquitous.

For example, during the height of the fighting some days ago, I telephoned Eva Etzioni-Halevy, professor emeritus of political sociology at Bar-Ilan University in Tel Aviv, and a newly emerging author.

I had just finished reading The Song of Hannah and was so impressed with the force of its courage and imaginative leaps that I wanted to speak with its author.

An observant woman, Etzioni-Halevy decided to write a book about the two wives of Elkanah, the father of Samuel, one of the prophets of our Bible.

In fact, the title of the book derives from the Bible, from the story we read during Rosh Hashanah. Hannah is Samuel's mother. Her heart-rending outpourings concerning her childless condition before her son is born form the centrepiece of the Haftarah reading.

But Etzioni-Halevy imagines herself as both Hannah and Elkanah's other wife, Peninah, and describes the lives they might have lived in pre-Davidic Israel.

"The book was written from a feminine but not a feminist perspective," she told me.

It is daringly sensual.

"I wrote a 'racy' book based on the Bible. It has many suggestive passages that are authentic to the times of the Bible and to human nature. Human nature is much the same today as it was then. In that way, we are very close to the people of The Book. Even our prophets were human beings. The essential message is one of tolerance for human beings. No one is perfect."

Etzioni-Halevy has imagined a complicated, but ultimately loving relationship between Hannah and Peninah. The book was thought-provoking and enjoyable both as a distraction from the war Israel has been forced to wage and as an affirmation of the creative life force that infuses Israel, the tiny and only Jewish state on earth.

Israel at War

Politicians criticized for joining anti-Israel rally

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Israeli officials sharply criticized Quebec provincial and federal politicians who participated in a huge rally in Montreal Aug. 6 protesting Israel's military action in Lebanon.

Consul General Marc Attali told a fundraiser for the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research it is "sad and cynical to see provincial and federal politicians trying to make political gains on the back of Israel… Where were they when Israel suffered casualties from suicide bombers?"

He said it is "ironic" that these politicians don't also speak out for Israel's right to defend itself. "When they call for peace, they exclude Israel because we do not deserve it."

At the same time, he thanked Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Foreign Minister Peter Mackay for "standing alongside Israel in its war against terrorism and for the values we share with this country," drawing applause from the audience that included Liberal MP Irwin Cotler.

Bloc Québécois leader Gilles Duceppe, Parti Québécois leader Andre Boisclair and federal Liberal MP Denis Coderre, a former cabinet minister, addressed the rally of 15,000, according to the police estimate.

The rally was organized by a coalition of some 60 Lebanese, Arab and Muslim groups, as well as labour, human rights and political organizations. The BQ, PQ and federal Liberal party, as well as Québec Solidaire, the left-wing, sovereigntist party launched in February, also signed on to a statement issued by the coalition before the rally.

It described Lebanon as a "martyr country," called for an immediate halt to Israel's "murderous offensive" and denounced "the unconditional alignment" of the Harper government with the policies of the Bush administration in the United States. No mention was made in the statement of Hezbollah, or of what Israel has sustained, other than: "There are Israeli civilians who have also paid the cost of this war."

Premier Jean Charest waded into the issue two days before the rally when he told reporters that he favoured an immediate and unconditional ceasefire between Israel and Hezbollah.

Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker also criticized the Quebec politicians at a press conference on Parliament Hill.

"We're seeing the leaders of opposition parties marching in Montreal under Hezbollah flags – Hezbollah, which is a terrorist organization that's been outlawed by Canadian law," Baker is quoted in the Ottawa Citizen.

"Any opposition party that expresses surprise at the fact that Canada, a democratic country, is supporting the right of another democratic country to defend itself really doesn't understand where they're coming from."

Yellow Hezbollah flags and T-shirts, as well as chants in support of the group, were seen and heard among the sea of demonstrators, as well as placards that made analogies between Israel and the Nazis. David Ouellette posted a photo on his pro-Israel website, Judeoscope, of what he says was a defaced prayer shawl. What can be made out is a fringed cloth with a denunciation of Zionism written on it. Boisclair is standing right in front of it, apparently unaware.

While displays of this nature were a relatively minor facet of the demonstration, most media reports described the rally as strongly anti-Israel in tone and condemnatory of Harper for following U.S. policy.

Marc Gold, the national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, was more muted than the Israeli officials in his reaction to the politicians' participation. "I find it disappointing that our political leaders, however unwittingly, became involved in such a one-sided expression of anti-Israel sentiment."

Gold thinks there were many people of "goodwill" at the rally who had gone believing it was "for justice and peace," as publicized, and not an exercise in Israel-bashing and support for terrorism.

The Quebec-Israel Committee (QIC) placed a full-page ad in Montreal dailies the day before the rally, addressed to Coderre, Duceppe and Boisclair, as well as Françoise David, co-founder of Quebec Solidaire with Amir Khadir, and Henri Masse, president of the Quebec Federation of Labour. It asked them to "respect the memory of all innocent Israeli, Lebanese and Palestinian victims, and refrain from using this human tragedy for purely electoral and political purposes."

It urged them to call for a "real peace initiative" and not an unconditional ceasefire, which the QIC says would allow Hezbollah to prepare for further aggression against Israel.

Duceppe and Coderre did call for the disarming of Hezbollah as part of a ceasefire agreement, which prompted booing.

Gold added that it is "very sad that the innocent victims [in the conflict] have become victims a second time for political and partisan purposes."

He does not believe the rally organizers' position is representative of Quebecers' views, pointing to a number of letters to the editor in La Presse expressing concern about the rally.

But Gold agreed that the Quebec Jewish community is in a distinct situation in advocating for Israel, compared to the rest of Canada and North America. Polls consistently show a lower level of support in the province for the Harper government's stance on the conflict. Quebec is home to the largest Lebanese community in Canada (about double the size of the Jewish community), which included the eight local members of the Al-Akhrass family killed by Israeli shelling while they were vacationing in southern Lebanon last month.

Cotler, who left last Thursday on a private "fact-finding mission" to Israel and the Palestinian Authority, said he had a "good talk" with Coderre, "an old and good friend.

"He went into it as a peace rally. He supports Israel's right to live in peace and security, as well as Lebanon's. He regards Hezbollah as a terrorist organization and in no way countenances support for it."

Cotler gave credit to Harper for "coming out early and clearly" in support of Israel's right to security, "a cornerstone of Canadian foreign policy and a principle endorsed by successive governments." He admitted the Liberals, who have 11 candidates vying for its leadership, have not been able to enunciate that principle as forthrightly, but hopes the party will be able to do so when a leader is elected in December.

The rally has increased the unease of some ordinary Montreal Jews. "What is Quebec society coming to when our politicians and population are supporting a terrorist group – which our Canadian government deems terrorist – along with people sporting posters saying Hezbollah has put the first nail in Israel's coffin?" asked Chantal Clabrough, 29. "I no longer feel like Quebec society is where I want to live and raise a family."

Meanwhile, the Hillel Jewish student society is preparing for what staff member Yacov Fruchter expects will be "a great deal of activism on campus." It called a meeting of students last week to discuss strategy for Israel advocacy.

"We hope everything will remain peaceful. And everyone will feel safe and comfortable [this semester]," he said.

Concordia University and the University of Montreal are fast-tracking the applications of Lebanese students who want to study abroad.

Israel rally kicks off Winnipeg CJA campaign

$142,000 contributed to crisis fund immediately after rally

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Jewish community kicked off its annual Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) campaign a month earlier than usual with a standing-room-only rally for Israel.

"Our CJA mandate is to strengthen our Jewish community at home and abroad," Ted Lyons, president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, told more than 750 people Aug. 6 at the Rady Jewish Community Centre. "Israel is in crisis and needs our help now. That's why we decided to start our CJA campaign early. This way, we are not going to be calling on people twice within a short time for donations."

CJA campaign director Elaine Goldstine said the community's goal is to raise $1.5 million for Israel on top of this year's overall campaign goal of $5 million. She said community members contributed $142,000 to the Israel crisis fund immediately after the rally.

The event was notable for the increased security outside and at the entrance to the Asper Jewish Community Campus, which houses the Rady Centre. The road in front was blocked off to traffic, while Winnipeg police officers were in evidence and security guards manned the front door (as opposed to their usual position at a desk inside). However, there were no incidents.

Lyons began his remarks by introducing politicians, representatives of Jewish organizations and Christian religious leaders in attendance. He also read letters of support from a Pentecostal congregation in Red Lake, Ont., and from federal Justice Minister Vic Toews.

In his letter, Toews reiterated the Harper Government's strong support for Israel and expressed hope that the end of the conflict would result in a durable and lasting peace.

Lyons then presented a letter to Joy Smith, the Conservative MP for Winnipeg-St. Paul (encompassing the areas of West Kildonan and Garden City, which have substantial numbers of Jewish voters) to present to Prime Minister Stephen Harper. In the letter, community leaders expressed gratitude to Harper for his solid support of Israel during the conflict, as well as regret at the loss of civilian lives in both Israel and Lebanon and the hope for neighbourly relations between the two countries in the future.

Winnipegger Joy Smith spoke of her recent visit to Israel – she returned just before the conflict began – and how impressed she was with the country and its people.

"The extremists cannot be allowed to provoke a wider conflict," she said. "Our government stands for the principles of democracy, freedom, human rights and the rule of law. We also recognize Israel's right to defend itself."

Yossi Olmert

Smith also commented on the government's evacuation of more than 13,000 Lebanese Canadians from the war-torn region, noting that it has been the largest such operation in Canadian history. She also thanked Israel for "facilitating the safe passage of the evacuees."

Dave Chomiak, Manitoba's minister of science and technology, who also represents the Garden City area in north Winnipeg, spoke for the provincial government.

"You hear so much distortion and bias," said Chomiak, who has visited Israel twice as part of community-organized missions. "Seeing Israel first-hand gives you a different perspective."

He recalled visiting a trauma ward at a Jerusalem hospital where people of all faiths and backgrounds were treated. He also had an opportunity to visit Metulla in the north.

"Looking across the border into Lebanon, I noticed how few Lebanese flags I saw flying," he recalled. "Most of the flags that I saw were Hezbollah flags. For the past six years [since Israel's withdrawal from southern Lebanon], the world has waited for someone, anyone, to remove Hezbollah and its rockets from Israel's border. No one stepped forward to do it."

The guest speaker on the evening was Yossi Olmert, the brother of Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert who is an academic, lecturer, journalist and a former political aide to Yitzhak Shamir when he was Israel's prime minister. In a speech punctuated by ovations, Olmert pointed out that terror attacks have killed about 1,300 Israelis over the past six years, and he praised the strong support that the United States, Canada, Germany and England have given Israel at this time.

He also vowed that Israel would emerge victorious from the present conflict. "We shall prevail," he said.

Betrayal of our values

When these words were written, the Israeli cabinet had voted to approve the ceasefire resolution passed by the United Nations Security Council. Fierce fighting however still raged between the Israel Defence Forces and Hezbollah – the westerly military vanguard of the Iranian regime. Israeli soldiers and civilians were still being killed, and various pundits and sundry other experts had launched into their respective assessments of the month-long war.

Though soon, one fears, a new firestorm of hate will be directed at the Jewish state, the dust of this war is settling.

Some of that dust has fallen in Canada and appears to have disoriented and clogged the moral compasses of a number of key public leaders. We are referring to the elected and other leading figures, such as Bloc Québécois leader Gilles Duceppe, Parti Québécois leader Andre Boisclair and former federal cabinet minister Liberal MP Denis Coderre, who joined in the blatantly pro-Hezbollah parade in Montreal on Aug. 6.

To be sure, some of the participants attended the rally, as Marc Gold, the national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee suggested, out of "goodwill, for justice and peace." But once it became clear that the event was less about a genuine pursuit of peace and more about a further attack on the legitimacy of the State of Israel, the public leaders in whom we place our trust and of whom we expect – and need – thoughtful, moral example, should have departed the scene, which was festooned with Hezbollah flags and other unmistakably anti-Israel signs, markers, and declarations.

We make no claims or demands upon our leaders' private, personal, loyalties, although we would hope they all accepted the justice of Israel's cause. But we do make claim upon the framework of values that they publicly espouse. At a minimum, those values must be consistent with democracy, freedom and respect for human rights, which it must be pointed out, are the very values that Hezbollah detests and for which it deplores the West.

As former justice minister Irwin Cotler recently pointed out, Hezbollah's covenants, charters and declarations call for the destruction of Israel and the killing of Jews wherever they may be. The group shares Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's genocidal ideology of wanting to "wipe Israel off the map."

Hezbollah considers repugnant and, if given the opportunity, would zealously endeavour to stamp out the very hallmarks of Quebec's society that our leaders hold dear and every human rights code in Canada legislates as inviolable.

Hezbollah is a terrorist organization and considered as such by Canada and other governments. That our public officials should march under Hezbollah's banner – symbolically, if not actually – demonstrates a profound failure of judgment and an alarmingly malfunctioning moral compass.

It is also an eye-opening and distressing betrayal of Canadian values.

During a state visit to Washington, Egyptian president Anwar Sadat strongly reaffirmed his commitment to peace with Israel, insisting that there will be no backing away from the peace process once Israel withdraws from the Sinai peninsula. The pull-out was due to take place in April 1982.

Israel losing public relations battle

Israel is losing the public relations battle with Hezbollah, and losing it badly. Israel has an enviable track record at winning armed conflicts, while simultaneously holding an abysmal record at managing the images. Bluntly put: given a choice between a Lebanese and an Israeli corpse, guess which one hits tomorrow's front page?

There was even a recent ABC News report that juxtaposed the humanitarian work of Hezbollah in Lebanon, with reportage on bomb shelters with a beach-front waterpark set-up in Israel for displaced Israeli refugees.

None of this is surprising given that Israel faces an additional burden that few countries confront in similar public relations campaigns – anti-Semitism. Recently, sectarian violence between Iraqi Shiites and Sunnis left more than 70 people dead in one of the bloodiest days in Iraq. But the story was buried while most media continued to beat up Israel over its "disproportionate" use of force.

Israel is facing a two-front war: one on the battlefield and one in the world's newsrooms. And it's losing on the second front because it has failed to define its latest military mission in stark, couch potato terms. The latest Middle East conflict isn't about might. It's about security – and not just Israel's, but ours as well.

We're in this mess because the West prefers to turn a blind eye to threats, and when they become major crises, it steps back and lets countries such as Israel do its dirty work. It's time we did our own dirty work by preventing armed conflict and rogue groups such as Hezbollah from developing. The gamut at our disposal is endless, from sanctions – even when they hurt the West – to increased foreign aid, to, just maybe, United Nations resolutions that are worth more than the paper they're written on.

Pacifists are 'unquestioning'

In the letter "Grieved by violence in Middle East" (CJN, Aug. 10), the writers express what appears to be a sincere desire for an immediate ceasefire and "diplomatic solutions to the current crisis, and an end to the boycott of the Palestinian authority and the occupation of Palestine."

What if, as in the case at hand, Israel's detractors do not wish to similarly consider such "diplomatic solutions"? Should Israel continue to unilaterally withdraw from territories, as it has from Gaza and Lebanon, unconcerned for its security and oblivious to the existential threats that appear to have emanated from the very two territories from which it has withdrawn? Should Israelis engage in diplomatic discussions with and among themselves, given that there are currently no genuine negotiating partners willing to accept Israel's existence or interested in such discussions? By calling for an end to the "occupation of Palestine" (as if Palestine ever existed), do these writers include a demand for withdrawal from Tiberias, Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Haifa and other Israeli cities, towns and settlements, as do Hezbollah and Hamas?

Finally, these writers claim that the supporters of the current Israeli position provide "unquestioning support for the Israeli government's" policies in Lebanon. Why is it that detractors of Israel or critics of the current military campaign invariably argue that our support is knee-jerk or "unquestioning"? Could we not have come to support Israel's position after a lengthy, reasoned and detailed analysis of the facts before us? Perhaps instead it is these pacifists who are "unquestioning" in their critique of Israeli policy?

Israelis fearful and worried

I planned a month-long vacation in Israel to rekindle my passion for the country, improve my Hebrew language skills and indulge in Israeli delicacies. Clearly, what was once a worry-free and relaxing vacation is now consumed with anxiety, fear and uncertainty.

As northern Israel finds itself being pounded by rockets, the citizens of this country are united in their fears, prayers and desire to find a permanent solution.

I am currently splitting my time between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. In contrast to the devastation and desolation that is now northern Israel, here in central Israel, the streets are filled with people, the restaurants, shops and cafés are busy and the beaches are packed (as warplanes fly overhead). Life for 55 minutes of each hour is seemingly normal. But everything stops at the top of every hour when the masses gather in front of their TVs or those of restaurants to watch the latest news update. So yes, things appear normal, but if you really look at the faces of these Israeli citizens, you see the worry and the fear. This is, however, nothing new for Israel.

History proves that Israel is no stranger to adversity and threats to its very existence. These citizens know all too well that they have no choice but to attempt to continue living normal lives as their country is pounded by rockets.

And then they knocked at my door

By EITAN BARON

It's hard to find words to describe what I've been through since Wednesday, July 12.

That day, I returned to my trailer after finishing another college exam. I turned on the television and watched special broadcasts about the war in the north on every channel. "Two kidnapped" is what the reports said, accompanied with maps pointing out where the incident had occurred. Having served on the Lebanese border for quite a long time, especially in that sector, I recognized the location immediately.

My heart started beating fast when I recalled that my brother, Yaniv, was serving in a post close to there. I tried calling him a few times, but his cellphone was off – a pretty common occurrence, I must say. My mother called me, very stressed out, asking if she should call his company commander. I said no. A little while later, I read the running news text on TV stating that Hezbollah claimed to have destroyed a tank. In case I forgot to mention it, my brother is a tank driver.

A friend then called me and asked if everything was OK with my brother. A somewhat odd question. A minor interrogation then revealed that rumours about him were circulating in our town, Maccabim. By then, I was really stressed out.

I called my mother and told her that it might be a good idea to call the company commander. My mother was actually quite calm, and said she would call later. I then tried my luck with my father, thinking that maybe he would make the call, but he wasn't amenable, either.

Then TV news channels started receiving reports about the region where the tank had been hit. I was stunned. I knew it had to be my brother's tank. It was the only tank in the region. I called my father in a panic, and he answered in a choked voice that people from the town major's headquarters had come to his office and informed him that Yaniv's tank had been hit and, according to their information, the entire crew had been seriously wounded. He also said that in 10 minutes, an Israel Defence Forces crew would come to take me home.

When they arrived, they delivered more or less the following announcement: "At 12:15 p.m., an IDF tank was hit in south Lebanon. Your brother was in the tank. To the best of our knowledge, the whole crew was seriously wounded."

I immediately asked what hospital he was in. The answer was that the crew was still in the tank, and there was a battle being fought to try to get to them. The clock on my cellphone said 16:15 p.m. I looked the town major in the eye and said: "Are you telling me that my brother is seriously wounded and he's been in a tank for the last four hours! Based on what information are you telling me that he's seriously wounded? Do you even have any contact with the crew?" The officer said the update was correct up to the last five minutes.

The ride home with the officer was very long, as you can imagine. Despite the announcement they read to me, or maybe because of it, deep inside I knew it was over and that Yaniv was no longer among the living. When I got home, I saw a group of people standing outside the house. "That's the brother" and "here's Eitan" were the murmurs I heard. Inside the house, officers clustered around me, but I had to go to the bathroom. While I was in the bathroom, I heard my father say in English, "He doesn't yet know that Yaniv was killed." Yes, it was now official: I had become a bereaved brother.

Yaniv Baron

The officers surrounded me as soon as I left the bathroom and started reading the announcement to me. I asked them to stop. I said that I understood and I didn't want to hear it. I sat on the sofa and started crying, together with my sister, mother, father and grandmother. The aunts and uncles were on the way. The media were already lurking outside. To their disappointment, the family decided to stay in the house and not be interviewed.

The officers stayed until midnight and then told us that the extraction of the bodies would only take place in the morning. They were true to their word. In the morning, they told us that a body had been extracted in one piece. At my father's request, they brought us the newspaper. Yaniv's picture on the front page was enough to send us all into hysteria.

In the meantime, the mayor arrived at the house. After he heard that we wanted Yaniv to be buried in our town, he made a call to the Defence Ministry, requesting an as yet non-existent military plot. The construction equipment arrived at the cemetery at 10 o'clock on Thursday morning, and within two days a military plot was ready.

My grandparents from Canada (my mother is from Montreal), an uncle from New York and an uncle from Hong Kong sent word that they would come to the funeral that had been set for Sunday.

On Thursday afternoon, the town major informed us that the body they had retrieved had been identified as Yaniv's. It was not an easy moment: on the one hand, at least we had a body to bury; on the other, we had a body to bury. Putting up the obituaries was another breaking point for us.

On Sunday at around a quarter to five, two minibuses arrived to take the family to the cemetery. The whole concept of the funeral did not make sense – a grandfather should not bury a grandson, a father should not say Kaddish for his son, a brother and a sister should not have to bid their 19-year-old brother farewell forever. The drive was slow, the pain was at a peak. We didn't know what to expect – how many people be there, how the place would look, and, above all, how would we deal with the funeral?

If I thought the drive was hard, when we got to the cemetery, I was close to hysteria. The minibus parked in front of the command car containing the casket was draped in the Israeli flag. On the right, thousands of people stood in absolute silence on the hill where Yaniv was about to be buried. My sister didn't want to get out of the mini-bus. Understandable. Finally she was persuaded, and we were greeted by senior officers from the Armored Corps.

We went to the command car, I kissed the casket, and when we were done, soldiers came and lifted the casket onto their shoulders. We followed the casket to our seating area, in front of the hole that had been dug for the casket. The entire hill was covered with a green carpet (the kind used in minigolf) and above there was an enormous awning. After several prayers, the casket was lowered deep into the hole and sacks of sand were poured over it. My father delivered a eulogy that brought tears to everyone's eyes. The eulogies given by Yaniv's two best friends were also painful.

With a Boeing flying above, as if on cue, and a three-gun salute, the funeral ended.

The shivah brought out the best in everybody – friends, neighbours, the town. From morning till night, people never stopped coming in. People came to comfort and left comforted. A few women (or "the generals," as I dubbed them) took command of the house and saw to everything. The rest of the visitors did not come empty-handed – pastries, fruit, homemade cakes, drinks and big pots full of food.

The support was awe-inspiring. The soldiers from Yaniv's battalion could not make it, since the fighting continues to this moment, but Yaniv's former commanders and basic-training buddies came. The personal affairs and education NCOs, the company commander, the Armored Corps adjutant, the battalion commander, the Armored Corps chief casualties officer, the commander of the 7th Brigade, the Armored Corps chief officer, the division commander and Israel's president, Moshe Katsav), his wife and his military secretary all came.

While it's true that I would gladly have forgone all of these visits, it's comforting to know that everyone appreciates what my brother did. The battalion commander, who witnessed the event, told us that after the kidnapping of the soldiers Yair Goldwasser and Eldad Regev was announced, Yaniv's crew ran to their tank and climbed in, despite the fact that their post was under heavy shelling. They were familiar with the procedure and, without giving it a second thought, started off. As they entered Lebanese territory, they managed to hit a few Hezbollah positions. Contrary to what I first thought, the crew took a side trail, and not a main one, until they reached the bitter end.

I could write a whole book about this, but I think I'll stop here. I'll just say that there's a sort of emptiness inside me. The pain is indescribable and the longing is constant. Everything in life suddenly takes on a different proportion and nothing seems to matter. I know nothing will be the same again, and I don't have a clue how to go on from here.

I remember what a rotten brother I was when we were young, and even though I tried making amends in recent years, the guilt still lingers. I'm sure I'll write about Yaniv again. Right now I can't. The IDF representatives deserve a lot of praise. We mentioned this to every Armored Corps officer who came, and we also said so to the president. But with all their good will, my wish to each and every one of you is that those angels of death never knock at your door.

Opinions

Trickle-down hatred

Though there have been some notable exceptions, media coverage in general has tended, as usual, to cast Israel in a less-than-favourable light since the war with Hezbollah began on July 12.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Doctored photographs, staged television footage, fictional eyewitness accounts, exaggerated casualty figures, and accusations of "disproportional responses," "massacres" and "war crimes" have been among the more common distortions and abominations that have embellished newspaper and television reports across the globe.

And inasmuch as it's relatively easy to tune out CNN International, or the BBC, or ignore print reporting by Reuters, it's more difficult to deal with the trickle-down falsehoods that have become the stuff of local newspaper columns and talk shows on regional television and radio stations across Canada – and that have provided focus and substance to groups and individuals who gleefully embrace their twisted messages to heap contempt not only on Israel itself, but also, at times, on those among us who passionately support that embattled state and what it stands for.

So, when the director of a centre for Islamic studies from north of Toronto goes on television in Burlington and demonizes Israel in the most menacing of tones, we need to take note. And when one of the founders of a "centre for peace studies" promotes a preposterous misinterpretation of current events when appearing in a televised debate in Hamilton, we should also be duly concerned.

But what's perhaps even more ominous than the persisting media assaults on Israel is the enduring impact that is possible if we see much more of the incitement that has characterized local "vigils" and so-called "peace rallies" by Arab groups in recent weeks.

At one such event on Aug. 4 – in the council chambers of Hamilton City Hall, no less – an audience of some 300 people were treated to a menu of the most egregious vilifications of Israel, courtesy of a hodgepodge of groups that included the Muslim Association of Hamilton, the Canadian Arab Federation, the Canadian Peace Alliance, the Hamilton District Labour Council and several others.

Those in attendance were told (via accompanying PowerPoint illustrations) that "the destruction of Lebanon was similar to the Nazi bombing of England in 1941," that "millions of [Israeli] landmines are killing Lebanese every day," that Israel's "checklist" highlights the "killing of children" and, as a separate item, "more children" and, eerily, that "the Hamilton Jewish Federation endorsed the killing [of Lebanese] at their rally [the previous week]." One diatribe followed another, with most expressing histrionic fervour and stunning acrimony.

And this was in a city, remember, where a much-touted dialogue between Jews, Arabs, and Muslims was supposed to be building bridges and promoting mutual respect and understanding among the participating communities.

Miscellany from the war zone

Life on a postage stamp: When you live in a postage stamp-sized country like Israel, your sense of distance adjusts proportionally. A 50-minute drive from Jerusalem to Tel Aviv, a short commute for an urban Canadian, acquires the dignity of a "trip." Some of my own neighbours, if you can believe it, have never made it "all the way south" to Eilat.

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

Indeed, a delusionary inner geography is what makes life possible in this impossible country. We simply wouldn't be able to cope emotionally with a clear awareness that Iran, bent on annihilating us as soon as it gets the bomb, is in reality no further away than double the distance between Montreal and Toronto. And so we preserve our sanity by avoiding maps and shoving such direct and immediate threats well over our mental horizons.

The same rule applies internally. Which is how we in Jerusalem, as I write, are living more or less normally while rockets rain down on the north of the country. The epithet "north of the country" is our way of dealing with it. In fact the north is no more to the north than Peterborough is to the east of Toronto, or Ottawa is to the west of Montreal. It's on our doorstep, a smidgen short of two hours away. Imagine how Montrealers would function if Ottawa, just down the road, came under attack from extremists, firing from city limits, who were ideologically committed to destroying all of Canada.

And so, for now, cafes are hopping, shoppers are shopping, building sites are building, summer camps are rollicking and museums are exhibiting in the capital. The absurd disparities of our little land were driven home this morning as I watched an inspector tag an illegally parked vehicle outside my window while the distraught driver looked on in helpless dismay. At the very same moment, my TV was showing the eerie, desolate streets of Nahariyah, way up "in the north," where there were no cars, car owners or inspectors – the sirens were wailing and everybody, inspectors and drivers alike, were cowering deep underground in shelters, comforting one another and worrying about their very survival.

It may well be that the most democratic thing about Israel is that everybody gets a turn at having the chance to suffer an untimely death. It's a great societal leveller. Once, big, bad Jerusalem was full of suicide bombings and nobody dared come here. Remember? Then Sderot, Ashkelon and their surroundings found themselves under Qassam assault and nobody dares go there. Now, for the past few weeks, tranquil Galilee and Golan have also joined the list of forbidden zones. And if Mr. Nasrallah keeps his promise and launches long-range rockets, the last exempt piece of populated Israel, Tel Aviv and the centre, will lose its immunity.

In short, Jerusalem has again become the darling of Israel. Refugees from the "north" are migrating in and taking up lodgings. Just like the "good ol' days" of the first Gulf War. And for this we owe our heartfelt gratitude to the very large local Muslim population, and for their revering Jerusalem as the third-holiest city in the Islamic world. Nasrallah wouldn't be so stupid as to target Al-Quds, would he?

So where can I go during school vacation? "Sorry, Yoel," we tell our perplexed 16-year-old. "You're staying right here close to Mama and Papa. Maybe Tel Aviv for the day, but that's it! And keep your cellphone on if you go!"

"You see," we explain, "you can't go north because of rockets from Lebanon, and you can't go south because of rockets from Gaza, and you can't go west to Ashkelon beach because of rockets there, too, and not east to the Dead Sea, either, because it's a living hell there in summertime. Did we miss a direction, honey?"

Yoel shrugs his shoulders, shuffles into his room, goes online, and takes his summer vacation in that tranquil and boundless universe of virtual reality.

Etcetera: And wouldn't you know it: the hotels are suddenly like morgues again. At the height of tourist season, practically no English is to be heard in the streets.

It's déjà vu.

Human rights NGOs give Hezbollah a hand

Israel's war against the Iranian-supplied Hezbollah terror organization includes a political front that is as important and complex as the military front. In this political battlefield, journalists, diplomats (particularly UN officials) and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) play a central role. False reports of Israeli "atrocities," reporters with anti-Israeli agendas, and doctored photos - as in the case of a Reuters picture that was altered by a freelance photographer to darken and expand the smoke billowing from the scene of an aerial bombardment, and of another to which the freelancer added two flares to the picture of an Israeli jet – have grossly distorted the reality of this war. If there is any sanity and morality left in the world, this over-the-top Israel-bashing will produce a backlash that will result in some very serious investigations.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Unfortunately, among the most ignominious demonizers, the officials of self-proclaimed human rights organizations are the most immune to requirements for accountability. Very powerful NGOs such as Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International have issued some 25 condemnations of Israel between them, based primarily on biased misinterpretations of international law and unverifiable claims of Lebanese "eyewitnesses." But without the equivalent of independent mechanism for evaluation, such as public editors in the most influential newspapers or oversight groups in government, NGO officials can literally get away with being accomplices to murder – particularly of Israelis.

In this process, we can start with New York-based Human Rights Watch (HRW), with its annual budget of more than $50 million (US). HRW has been publishing condemnations of Israel for many years, including during the height of the Palestinian terror campaign, and the pattern is being repeated in this war. Between July 13 and Aug 7, it published 19 statements on Lebanon and Israel, 16 of which were directed at Israel, often referring to alleged "war crimes." The others that focused primarily on Hezbollah (and one directed at Syria and Iran) were fig leafs that were not accompanied by press conferences or media appearances.

These reports systematically erased Syrian and Iranian involvement, including the weapons these governments have delivered to Hezbollah. In op-ed pieces and media interviews, Peter Bouckaert, HRW's "emergencies director," repeatedly relied on Lebanese eyewitnesses to charge Israel with deliberate attacks against civilians. He erased thousands of missiles and the well-entrenched Hezbollah operatives from the picture. Bouckaert's "witnesses" from Qana – a Shia stronghold – didn't tell him what so many other Lebanese have seen and described, as published in detailed reports based on many reliable sources. If there are no missiles, launchers and terrorists in the vicinity of the houses, schools, mosques and hospitals in this narrow strip of Lebanon, including Qana, then what are the sources of the attacks that are killing dozens of Israelis in cities and towns a few kilometres away?

HRW, while quick to condemn Israel for defending itself against terror, reacts angrily and often absurdly to analysis of its biases. In response to detailed criticism of an HRW report, executive director Kenneth Roth wrote that "Israel could have maintained the moral high ground if it had responded to Hezbollah rocket attacks by targeting only Hezbollah military forces." Roth, who has no knowledge of military issues, did not suggest that military forces might exist in the context of asymmetric terror warfare waged by Hezbollah, Hamas, and Al Qaeda. Furthermore, his acid comment that "An eye for an eye may have been the morality of some more primitive moment" suggests much deeper reasons for his animosity toward Israel.

HRW is far from the only NGO active in this political warfare, and others who have issued similar, if less frequent, statements include Amnesty International, Christian Aid-UK, Oxfam, and the Geneva-based International Commission of Jurists. All, to varying degrees, are helping to promote the demonization of Israel using the rhetoric rather than the substance of human rights and international law.

Their "reports" and analyses are repeated, usually without question, in the media and by politicians around the world. The cumulative effect is to delegitimize Israeli self-defence. But slowly, just as the biased journalists who gave credence to false reports of Israeli "massacres" have been unmasked, and the phony photos exposed, prejudiced NGO officials responsible for abusing human rights are also being uncovered. The damage they have done will be hard to repair – but at least they can be stopped from doing more.

The Kirshner File

U.S. backed Israel in war with Hezbollah

Whatever the outcome of the war in Lebanon, the United States proved yet again that it is Israel's best friend.

Until this week's United Nations ceasefire, the United States supported Israel's basic strategy and provided Israel with valued diplomatic cover as it waged an exceedingly difficult campaign to dislodge Hezbollah from southern Lebanon.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

From day one, the United States, Israel's chief ally, stood steadfastly with Israel – even as its Arab and European allies cried foul – and portrayed the war as part of a larger confrontation pitting the forces of freedom against the forces of terror and radical Islam in the Middle East.

During the first phase of the war, which was triggered by Hezbollah aggression, Israel bombed Beirut airport and imposed an air and sea blockade on Lebanon. Alarmed by Israel's fierce response, the European Union criticized Israel for using "disproportionate" force. George W. Bush, the U.S. president, could have rebuked Israel, but instead he declared, "Israel has a right to defend itself."

On this vital matter, Bush was absolutely consistent. Two years ago, he raised the point that Israel, like any other sovereign country, has a right to self-defence. As he put it, "The Israeli people have always had enemies at their borders and terrorists close at hand. Again and again, Israel has defended itself with skill and heroism."

As a result, Bush – one of the most pro-Israel of presidents – backed Israel politically and militarily, even as he and his secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, urged Israel to exercise restraint and consider a diplomatic solution to a thorny problem.

• John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador, vetoed a UN Security Council resolution accusing Israel of disproportionate force. The measure, introduced by Qatar, called on Israel to halt its operations, release Palestinian prisoners, replace power-plant equipment and restore fuel supplies.

• Bush replenished Israel's supply of laser-guided bombs, knowing full well that they would be deployed against Hezbollah, especially in southern Beirut, where Hezbollah has its headquarters. During the first weeks of the war, Israeli aircraft bombed the bunker where Hassan Nasrallah, Hezbollah's general secretary, was supposedly in hiding.

• By a wide margin, the U.S. Congress expressed "strong support" for Israel and condemned Hezbollah.

• The United States supported Israel's rejection of a United Nations request for a 72-hour truce so that Lebanese civilians could be evacuated from the war zone and emergency supplies could be delivered. Israel's contention was that a humanitarian corridor had already been opened, and the United States concurred.

Israel and the United States, however, were not always been on the same page.

After 28 Lebanese civilians in Qana were killed in an Israeli air strike, Washington pressured Israel to observe a 48-hour bombing pause. Israel agreed in principle, but continued bombing Hezbollah positions anyway.

Israel and the United States were also at odds over the timing of a ceasefire. Concerned that the war could have unintended and catastrophic consequences, the Bush administration appears to have convinced Israel to delay a ground invasion of Lebanon so that diplomacy could gain some traction.

Despite these blips, Israel was pleased with U.S. policy and, in particular, with Bush's castigation of Hezbollah. In a blunt and unadorned observation, Bush accused Hezbollah – which targeted U.S. marines and diplomats in Lebanon in the early 1980s – of causing the war. As he commented on July 31, "The crisis began with Hezbollah's unprovoked attacks against Israel."

Much to Israel's further satisfaction, Bush said that the two implicit backers of the war, Iran and Syria, should be held accountable for having armed and encouraged Hezbollah.

In retrospect, the United States was far more supportive of Israel during this war than in the last one in Lebanon.

The Reagan administration tolerated Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon, but as the war dragged on and more Lebanese civilians were killed, the United States grew impatient with Israel's tactics, postponed the delivery of F-15 jets to the Israeli air force and stumbled into a brief war of words with Israel.

Twenty-four years on, Washington displayed more understanding of Israel's war aims, compared to the hard line Bush took toward Israel when its dispute with the Palestinians suddenly escalated in the spring of 2001. After Palestinian Qassam rockets crashed into the town of Sderot, in the western Negev, Israel launched a series of pinprick incursions into the Gaza Strip. The United States vocally objected to these raids, and the then-Israeli prime minister, Ariel Sharon, who now lies comatose after suffering a massive stroke last January, was not amused.

But since then, Israel's relationship with the United States has markedly improved. Indeed, Bush has gone out of his way to say that Israel's security is a major reason why he is trying to block Iran from acquiring a nuclear arsenal, and has promised to come to Israel's aid should it be attacked by Iran.

Best of all, Israel's overall strategic ties with the United States are strong. Last November, after patching up a dispute over Israeli arms sales to China, Washington ended a year-long freeze on Israeli participation in the Joint Strike Fighter (JSF) project. The JSF fighter jet is slated to replace some of the finest aircraft in the United States' arsenal, the F-15 and the F-16.

In keeping with its general pro-Israel stance, the United States did not waver from its belief that a truce in Lebanon should be sustainable and permanent so that fighting does not resume in the future.

Washington insisted that a ceasefire should ensure that a muscular peacekeeping force is dispatched to augment the United Nations Interim Force In Lebanon (UNIFIL) currently in place, that peacekeepers will be stationed along Lebanon's border with Syria (a conduit for Iranian short-range and long-range rockets flowing into Lebanon), and that Hezbollah will pull out of southern Lebanon.

Israel, whose military performance in this 34-day war was less than decisive, ultimately agreed that a truce was necessary. Amir Pertez, the Israeli defence minister, said that its relatively limited operations in Lebanon – which cost Israel the lives of 114 soldiers since July 12 – were intended to promote diplomacy.

He made this comment as the Israeli government, in a seemingly last minute decision, widenened the ground war in a bid to disable Hezbollah's military infrastructure up to the Litani River, and as the Lebanese government demanded an immediate end to the fighting and a prompt Israeli withdrawal from southern Lebanon.

Lebanon, caught yet again in the crossfire between Israel and Hezbollah, demanded a truce so that the humanitarian crisis did not spin out of control completely. More than 1,000 Lebanese civilians were killed, hundreds of thousands weredisplaced, and property damage hit the $2 billion (US) mark.

Such was Lebanon's plight that its prime minister, Fouad Siniora, offered to send 15,000 Lebanese army troops to patrol the border after Israel's pullout from southern Lebanon.

Siniora's offer, nevertheless, was surprising, since he and his predecessors had refused to take responsibility for policing the border area and disarming Hezbollah under the provisions of UN Security Council Resolution 1559.

Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, described Lebanon's proposal as "interesting," but he was in no hurry to accept it, given the widespread perception that the Lebanese army is weak and barely capable of keeping Hezbollah – a potent force in Lebanon – sufficiently far away from the border. Olmert's bottom line was that Israel would not withdraw until Hezbollah was battered and bloodied, a robust international peacekeeping force was inserted in the area, Hezbollah was disarmed and Israel's two kidnapped soldiers – Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev – were released from captivity.

Israel had to settle for less when the ceasefire, drafted by the United States and France and ushered in by Resolution 1701, came into effect on Monday, Aug. 14.

The truce, accepted by all parties concerned, ended the war and allowed Israel to remain in southern Lebanon until 15,000 Lebanese troops and an equal number of international peacekeepers arrive to fill the vacuum. But Israel's two captives were not immediately returned, and Hezbollah remained armed to the teeth.

On the last two days of the war, when Israel pushed to the Litani River, the Israeli army and Hezbollah were locked in fierce fighting. During the battles, Israel lost 31 soldiers, including the son of novelist David Grossman, and a helicopter was downed by an anti-tank missile.

During the final 24 hours, Hezbollah managed to fire about 250 rockets into the Galilee, killing a civilian and proving that Israel's offensive had not impaired Hezbollah's ability to hurt Israel. Hezbollah remained standing, and this may haunt Israel in the years ahead.

Eilat/Eilot welcomes northern neighbours into their homes

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Since the ongoing barrage of rocket attacks began falling on northern Israel, life has been at a standstill for more than one million Israeli residents, many of whom have been forced to spend far too much time in bomb shelters to escape the carnage.

To give these beleaguered families a temporary respite from the ongoing danger and stress, the southern region of Eilat/Eilot has opened its doors – and its hearts.

More than 50,000 people from the north have been staying in Eilat, UJA Federation's twinned community along with the surrounding Eilot area, since the beginning of the war, some at hotels at reduced rates or for free, some with Eilat families, and some at an absorption centre that was opened specially for guests from the north.

Meanwhile, the population of the Eilot region has jumped by 50% to 4,500 people currently playing host to some 1,500 residents from the north at homes, youth clubs, and several kibbutzim.

"Immediately upon the falling of the first rockets, Eilat mayor Meir Yitzhak Halevy established a headquarters to organize local host families who have welcomed with open arms these strangers into their homes," says Hagit Shilo, The Jewish Agency for Israel's (JAFI) regional manager. "The people here are thrilled to have the chance to help."

Many of the children temporarily living in the Eilat/Eilot region spend their mornings and early afternoons in special summer camps. Later in the day they participate in organized trips to various attractions, including Eilat's famous underwater observatory, beaches, theatres, and sporting activities.

Social workers and volunteers also work with the children from the north, helping them – often through art therapy – to deal with their fears. Eight teachers from UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education arrived in Eilat on August 10 to spend time with the kids and their families.

"We do worry about these people – especially the children – because eventually they're going to have to go home once this war stops," says Shilo. "We worry because for many of them expecting to return to their homes in the north, they may not have a home to return to. But, for now, you can see the relief on these kids' faces – they are smiling, having fun, and living as young kids should live."

Emotional satellite feed from Israel overcame all hurdles

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

It was a crazy idea conceived of at an equally crazy time. Hook up a live satellite feed from the Israel-Lebanon border back to Toronto, so that community members could connect with soldiers at the front lines during the July 26 UJA Federation Stand with Israel Rally. In addition to time differences, a dangerous war zone and the need for IDF permission, the task was daunting, but if pulled off, would offer rally participants a unique and moving experience not to be forgotten.

Sharon Shwartzman, director of public relations at the UIA Federations Canada (UIAC) office in Israel, began the logistical nightmare of putting the live feed idea together by first contacting high ranking army officials who could assist with the request. With additional help from Yossi Tanuri, UIAC's director general, an artillery unit near Kiryat Shmona was found.

"This unit had been in a fierce battle only seven hours before our feed went live," Shwartzman said. "And yet, once we got there, they were so helpful in getting us set up, placing cameras, doing what they could, It was unbelievable. The soldiers were so overwhelmed when they saw the images of all the people assembled in Toronto. It was at that moment that they realized they weren't just protecting Israelis but that they were protecting Jews all over the world."

One of the most emotional moments of the satellite broadcast was when a commander named Guy Markizano spoke to his brother, Motti, who sat in the Toronto audience fighting back tears. The two brothers sent each other words of comfort and love. "Take care of yourself," Motti said in Hebrew, "I love you."

"The entire thing was just so surreal," said Mendy Maierovitz, who was in northern Israel for the broadcast on a UJA Federation solidarity mission. "We were in the middle of nowhere, at three o'clock in the morning, making pizza for the soldiers, with artillery going off every 30 seconds," he continued. "And Guy, just couldn't believe that he was actually going to see and speak to his brother. You could see the bond between those brothers when they did, and that bond can never be broken."

Former Torontonian waits with anguish while son-in-law fights in Lebanon

By PENNY MOR

Penny Mor, born Penny Carr 56 years ago, was raised in Toronto's Bathurst Manor before moving to northern Israel 35 years ago. Her son-in-law, Shmulik, a reserve soldier with the IDF, was recently called into active duty in Lebanon. This is Penny's account of what life is like today on Kibbutz Sarid.

It's been around a month now since all this madness began in my beautiful Israel. How it all started is already becoming hazy in my mind. I suppose I was naïve when the three Israeli soldiers were kidnapped. Many of us thought, okay, it's time that we finally show Hezbollah – once and for all – that they're not going to bully us any more.

This is not what it was supposed to be like here. When I fell in love with my husband Ariel and decided to make my future here, life was simple. You worked on the kibbutz and the rest was taken care of for you. Our kibbutz was a wonderful place for the children to grow up on, and a secure and wonderful life for its many members.

My 31-year-old son-in-law, Shmulik, who is married to my wonderful daughter Yonat, was recently called up to serve in Lebanon. Despite the 'in-law', Shmulik is very much my son. I have friends here who have seen their children or husbands called up to serve, and some of them have lost complete control of their emotions, living in fear - day after day - that they will hear the news we all dread. I empathized with them as much as possible, but not until Shmulik was called up, did I really understand that sense of constant panic; the constant ache that tears at my heart and my soul.

Now, whenever I hear about one of our soldiers being killed or seriously wounded, I feel ill; I become practically paralyzed each time.

It's ironic that I got the news of Shmulik's call-up at a time of near tragedy, a time when you say to yourself, "it just can't get any worse than this!"

Yonat, me and Noa, her three-year-old daughter, were in a car accident. Fortunately, only the car was injured. When Shmulik, who was at the Lebanese-Israeli border, heard about the accident, he drove three hours to make sure that we were really okay. That's also when he told me the news that his unit was entering Lebanon at 4:00 p.m. that afternoon. I felt that although we had just survived a car crash, G-d was still punishing us. Yonat – who is always quite calm and level-headed – became understandably upset and emotional. Eventually she began to settle down and realized that there was nothing any of us could do; Shmulik was an Israeli who was ready and willing to fight for his country.

For weeks now, I've gone to bed with the news and wake up with the news again. I see pictures of mothers crying and screaming as the carnage continues. I see pictures daily of soldiers – some as young as 18 – dying for their country. I think about their parents and families as they mourn the loss of their beloved children thrust into role of protector. I think about the injured – both physically and emotionally – whose lives are changed forever. But mostly, I think of Shmulik and pray that one day soon he returns to the loving embrace of my daughter and granddaughter. I pray for the days that once were here on our kibbutz. I pray for my home, Israel.

Israel Emergency Campaign reaches $10 million mark

IEC officially launched last week

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

After just two weeks, UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 (IEC) is closing in on $10 million on top of $18 million for the annual campaign.

The goal of the campaign is 20 million additional dollars for Israel's immediate and long-term humanitarian needs, over and above the regular campaign total.

Chaired by Ariella Rohringer and Fred Waks, the campaign, which was officially launched last week in front of more than 2,500 supporters at Toronto's Fairmont Royal York Hotel, featured Pulitzer-Prize winning author and political commentator Charles Krauthammer.

The campaign launch was chaired by Harley Mintz and Bonnie Bloomberg.

"We are launching this campaign with a promise to Israel that has never been broken," said Rohringer. "Our community has always been with you. We are with you today. We will never leave you. You can count on us."

"Glued to the news, we see the images, the missiles, the fires, the destruction and the death," said Waks. "We also see media distortions which equate Israel and Hezbollah and ignore the torment suffered by every Israeli. We know that Israel has few friends in the world, but we also know, as evidenced by tonight's turnout, that we have the power and passion to take action; to help redress the suffering and the anguish, to make a difference for the people of Israel."

Israel's emergency needs

Funds raised through the UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign will be designated for Israel's immediate and long-term emergency needs including:

- Moving children in danger to safer areas of the country
- Medical and psychological support for new immigrants, the elderly, and those with special needs
- Essential supplies for Israel's isolated and elderly residents
- Temporary housing for the uprooted
- Finding new jobs for the newly unemployed
- Rebuilding towns and cities ravaged by terrorist attacks

There for Israel

For Toronto's Jonathan Rotchitin, 14 and his brother Steven, 17 – the plight facing Israel today was the only motivation required for the boys to attend their first UJA Federation Campaign Launch.

"We're here to support Israel, and coming out to an event like this, which people in Israel will know about, is very important," said Jonathan. "No matter what Israel has to face, they're always strong and ready to protect all of us; the least we can do is help them when they're going through a bad time."

Gil Blutrich, Chair, The Israeli Forum

"Raising money is very important, but for my brother and me, coming to this campaign launch and other pro-Israel community events, is a way that we – as young people – can show our love and gratitude for Israel," added Steven.

Jay Wolkin, 23 and Vivian Masters 22, called Israel home from January to July last year. Now, showing their support is more important than ever before.

"Whatever happens in – or to – Israel happens to all of us as Jews no matter where you're from," said Masters, who was born in England. "Being here tonight to support this Israel Emergency Campaign and to hear from the brother of the kidnapped soldier is such an important way to connect with Israel."

"Believe me, when you spend six or seven months living in Israel, making friends with Israelis, becoming part of the culture, you see what they must live with day in and day out," said Wolkin. "The more you're there, the more you realize why it's absolutely essential that we show them our unwavering support. That's why we're here tonight."

Time to stop the threat

"We have to stop once and for all, the threat from Lebanon and Hezbollah," said David Meranda, a veteran of many UJA Federation campaign launches. "This is not just Israel's problem;,it's not just our problem as Jews, it's a problem for all who value freedom and democracy. I was in Israel in July when the soldiers were kidnapped and the mood there on the street is 'enough is enough.' We must do whatever we can to help Israel and to expose the lies which are constantly being spread."

Israeli Canadians mobilize

Among thousands who are providing passionate support for Israel are Israeli Canadians living in Toronto. They're working with a new organization – The Israeli Forum – which is partnered with UJA Federation. So far, Forum members have raised $160,000 for the Israel Emergency Campaign.

"This is the first ever collective gift given by the Israeli community in Canada through UJA Federation," says Galya Sarner, who heads up UJA Federation's Israel Community Project, an initiative which fosters bonds between Israelis and other Jewish communities.

"With Israel going through this crisis, we are in a critical time and we must step up to the plate at once," says Israeli Forum Chair Gil Blutrich. "Our goal is to show that Toronto's Israeli community is strong, vibrant, and stands as one with the Jewish community, and is ready to do whatever is necessary whenever our Israel needs us."

Canadian Jews send eight ambulances to Israel

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel sent eight ambulances to Israel by El Al cargo planes after learning that a Magen David Adom ambulance station in northern Israel was hit by a rocket as a result of the current war with Hezbollah.

Iris Ehrent, administrative director of Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel (CMDA), said that when she received word that many of their supplies had to be replaced, "we had to pull together all our resources and send whatever it was we had on hand."

For security reasons, Ehrent said she could not specify the extent of the damage.

Along with medical supplies, CMDA sent eight fully equipped MDA ambulances to Ben-Gurion Airport, which were immediately put into service and sent to MDA stations in northern Israel.

Ehrent explained that four of the ambulances were purchased by Canadian donors prior to the conflict, but after receiving the MDA report about one of their stations being hit, CMDA raised the funds required to buy four more in one week.

"All of this was done in one week – that's how fast the community has responded," Ehrent said, adding that she is appreciative of the private donors and organizations that helped raise funds.

"But," she said, "it is very important to stress to the community that the only organization in Canada authorized by the government of Israel to raise funds for Magen David Adom is the Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel.

"We do not send funds to Israel. We purchase the supplies for them and send the supplies. We have strict instructions about what the funds can be collected for, and it is strictly for medical supplies and equipment," Ehrent said.

The ambulances, which cost between $85,000 and $105,000 each, come fully equipped, and they are shipped ready to use as soon as they land in Israel, she said.

Although Ehrent is grateful for the generosity of the Canadian community, both Jewish and non-Jewish, she explained how important it is for her organization to continue to supply MDA, Israel's national medical, emergency and blood bank service, with supplies and equipment during the war.

"Under normal circumstances, equipment that these ambulances are furnished with could last six to nine months. Right now, in view of this current situation, it lasts up to about three days. It's very evident that the urgent need to replenish these quickly dwindling supplies is overwhelming," Ehrent said.

According to the MDA daily report dated Aug. 10, MDA personnel treated 2,225 casualties, and there have been 110 Israeli fatalities.

"It is their lifeline. Magen David Adom in Israel is the second line of defence," she said.

Manny Tessler, who has been involved with CMDA for 10 years and has purchased three ambulances for MDA over the past three years, hopes that the efforts of this organization will lead the Jewish community by example.

"Israel is bleeding, and anything we can do for Israel is greatly appreciated," Tessler said. "[The ambulances] will help a lot of people."

Israeli singer Liel performs at UJA campaign

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

Liel Kolet, a 17-year-old Israeli singer who is on her way to stardom, cancelled performances in Europe and Mexico after the Israeli/Hezbollah war flared up in order to be with her family.

Liel, who's known by her first name, was to originally perform on Sept 6, for the campaign, which was moved forward because of Israel's urgent need for support.

Liel, who has been compared to Ofra Haza, sang five songs at the event, including Send Me an Angel, which will soon be released as a single in Europe.

"It's very important to me [to support this event] also because I live in Israel," said Liel, who lives in the north of Israel on Kibbutz Kinneret. "It's a war and everything all around is bad – the bombs, the shelters, so it's very close to my heart."

For the past two weeks, Liel has been spending much of her time in a bomb shelter, as Hezbollah rockets continue to shell the northern part of Israel, 15 minutes from where she lives.

Liel Kolet

"The north of Israel is really terrible. Many cities are ruined from bombs, and all the time people have to be in shelters and they can't go out. Many people are also moving to Tel Aviv or cities far away from all of it. It's very difficult," she said to The CJN.

"I came here [Toronto] not only to perform but to say that the money that they are raising is very important. The situations in the shelters are very, very bad. In Israel, the heat is terrible, especially in the summer, and the people there don't have air-conditioning or fresh air. Sometimes they don't have beds to sleep on, and that's why it's important to raise money – to improve the shelters."

Liel has spent much of her time singing and playing guitar for the children in the bomb shelter, "trying to help them cope," she said. "Music always warms your heart."

More than 2,500 people attended the UJA Emergency Campaign Launch.

Two days following the event, Liel was back in Israel, performing at the Send Me An Angel fundraising event in Tel Aviv. The event raised money for essential supplies for people living in bomb shelters in the north of Israel.

Liel will return to Toronto on Nov. 11, when she will perform a concert for the Save A Child's Heart organization.

Journalist slams Oslo peace process as a 'lie and a deception'

Historically, Krauthammer said, Israel has never had designs on enemy territory. It has accepted every resolution and has acted only to secure a peaceful frontier, he added.

The world did not understand that Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon was "a defensive occupation" resulting from cross-border attacks, he said. All Israel seeks is peace, he added.

Krauthammer slammed the Oslo peace process as a "lie and a deception" that had nothing to do with land occupation or settlements. Not only did the Palestinians not accept Israel's "astonishingly generous" offer at Camp David in 2000, but they never made a counter-offer, he said.

Yair Goldwasser

"The issue today, as always, is Israel's existence," he added.

After Israel left Gaza last year, the Gazans built rockets instead of roads and courthouses, Krauthammer said. Israel left Lebanon in 2000, he noted.

Hezbollah is "the proxy of the Iranian revolution, [whose goal] is to defeat the West, to restore the ancient glories of Islam and to subjugate those who will not accept Islam voluntarily," he said. "They call America the great Satan and they believe that is not hyperbole… The threat is global."

The Arab-Israeli conflict has evolved from a nationalist conflict to a religious one, Krauthammer said. Religious wars are far more deeply rooted and dangerous, he added.

"This is indeed a very brutal war," the Israeli prime minister said in his video address. "We are going to win this war. It's not going to be easy, but we'd rather pay this price now than wait and face more devastating and destructive wars."

Olmert told the audience that Israel relies on them "to share some of the burdens." After the war, he said, thousands of properties will have to be rebuilt and people who have been relocated from northern cities such as Haifa, Afula and Akko will have to be brought back.

Goldwasser said his hometown of Nahariya has suffered more than 500 Katyusha attacks and has gone from a "lovely little fisherman's town" to a ghost town.

More than one million people have left their homes in the north, especially those who wanted to protect their children, he said. Goldwasser said it's "an honourable reason" to leave.

He said he was speechless over the strength and support he felt from the Toronto Jewish community, and that he would relay that support back to Israel. His 31-year-old brother, who has been studying for a second degree at the Technion Institute in Haifa, is an "amazing person," he said.

Brosh said Israel never wanted the current war, but saw no other choice. "If we take into consideration the provocation [by] Hezbollah over the last six years, including kidnapping of Israeli soldiers, the infrastructure they built in… south Lebanon, including dozens of kilometres of underground bunkers… weapons they've accumulated, and if we take seriously their declaration to destroy Israel to ashes, then we have no choice but to defend ourselves. We would like to reach a ceasefire, but a real ceasefire… and bring back home, safe and healthy, the kidnapped soldiers."

Israel: it's ours

By RABBI HOWARD MORRISON

Ten people, a small but hardy group, represented our synagogue, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda, for 12 days in Israel last month. In Jewish tradition, the number 10 represents a quorum, a symbolic paradigm of an entire community, and while a traditional minyan comprises 10 adults, the "Beth Emeth 10" was a multi-generational congregation, with an eight-year-old, an 11-year-old, an 18-year-old, a 27-year-old, a couple in their 40s, a couple in their 50s, a single man in his 50s, and a senior citizen.

Our tour of Israel began July 5 in Tel Aviv. On July 7, we travelled north through Caesarea to spend Shabbat at Kibbutz Lavi just outside of Tiberias. We spent most of Sunday in the north, stopping in Safed, the Golan Heights, and the Canada Centre near the Lebanese border. We then spent most of July 10 and 11 in and around Haifa. We spent the rest of our tour, which ended July 17, in and around Jerusalem.

Our "northern exposure" was filled with peace, warmth and joy. Our guide at the Canada Centre, a woman who lived as close as one could to the Lebanese border, told us how privileged she felt to live in Israel. Any measure of sacrifice was well worth the gift of living in our homeland, she said. Little did I know when she said these heartfelt words to us on July 9 that she would probably be among those sleeping in bomb shelters a few nights later as missiles from inside Lebanon landed in areas that we had just visited.

For our seven first-timers in Israel, every experience was filled with awe and excitement. For the three of us who had been to Israel many times before, many unplanned reunions took place on the streets of Jerusalem and elsewhere with longtime friends who just happened to be there at the same time.

While our trip went exactly as planned, the last five days differed from the week that preceded them. Traditionally, the Fast of the 17th of Tammuz, which fell on July 13, marks the beginning of the three weeks of sadness, which recall the events leading up to and including the destruction of the First and Second temples in Jerusalem. This year, however, a new sadness began to emerge on the 17th of Tammuz. On the previous day, Hezbollah kidnapped two Israeli soldiers and murdered eight others along the Lebanese border.

We marvelled at the calm of Israelis. In Jerusalem, people continued to mob cafes and shops along Ben Yehuda and Emek Refaim streets. On July 14, Machane Yehuda was packed with people buying breads, cakes, fruits and vegetables for Shabbat.

Back on July 5, we were part of one of Israel's best summers for tourism in many years. But by July 17, we feared that this might become one of Israel's worst summers for tourism. A number of teen tour groups that we had met cut their trips short and quickly arranged for flights back to North America. One particular group had arrived in our hotel in Jerusalem just hours before Shabbat. The teens weren't allowed to leave the hotel until they departed for their flight soon after Shabbat ended. For these young people, their whole experience of Jerusalem consisted of less than 48 hours in a hotel.

Our "Beth Emeth 10" thought we might be one of Israel's last synagogue-based tour groups this summer. On July 16, the last full day of our tour, our guide told us that the group he was going to begin leading on the following day had cancelled its trip to Israel.

My family and I stayed for an additional week in Jerusalem, through July 23. During that time, I was comforted to encounter teen tour groups from the National Federation of Temple Youth, Ramah Seminar and Young Judea that were staying for the complete duration of their planned trips to Israel by changing their itineraries so that they stayed in safe regions of the country. I was proud to meet a number of teens from Ontario who were part of these groups.

The Beth Emeth group felt ambivalent about leaving Israel on July 17. But our pre-arranged tour was complete, and it was time for most of the group to return to daily life in the Diaspora. Yet everyone felt awkward about leaving Israel at a time when their physical presence gave a spiritual boost to Israelis who have grown accustomed to living amid horror and uncertainty.

Last spring, I thought of canceling this summer's Beth Emeth trip to Israel. Our group was small, but given the sad and tragic developments that took place during our stay in Israel, we felt privileged to have been in Israel, on our land, with our people, identifying with shared challenges, hopes and dreams.

The wrong kind of education

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

The late Abdul Rantisi, the former head of – now what are they exactly? Oh yes, they're the organization that distributes hot lunches and medical care, also known as – Hamas, was a physician specializing in pediatrics. Khaleed Meshal, who now heads that same social service agency, holds a bachelor of science degree from the University of Kuwait and taught physics for several years in that same country. Meshal is celebrating his silver wedding anniversary this year and is the proud father of four boys and three girls. Hassan Nasrallah, he of the Gandhi-like movement in Lebanon that's launching rockets into northern Israel, began teaching Islamic history and mores to large groups of followers in Lebanon at the tender age of 19.

And, of course, that ultimate man of faith, Osama bin Laden, received a degree in management and economics at King Abdul Aziz University in Jedda, Saudi Arabia. Bin Laden, currently living in a cave as a lifestyle choice, has idealistically chosen to forego working for his family's $5.5-billion-a-year global corporation and has consecrated himself to the virtues of family life by having an estimated 15 children by three or four wives.

So, as is evidenced by the above, one can have all of the facts and still know nothing. Many of the leading terrorists in the world today are educated family men, some of them with impressive means. There is no necessary correlation – none – between wealth and morality, education and morality, family status and morality, lineage and morality, popularity and morality, charisma and morality, and even professions of religious faith and morality. Indeed, it's the last one that may be the most dangerous seducer of morality.

When I hear people talk about terrorists as if they grew up in a trailer park with a seventh grade education, I shake my head and wonder whether we really understand just how co-opted the western world has become by Islamist hypocrisy. It's precisely through the use and exploitation of fundamental western values of higher education, technology, media and democratic speech that Nasrallah and the gang are able to spread their vision of love and global harmony.

All education, as Allan Bloom once taught, is a reflection of the values that a society wishes to imbue in its citizens. In democracies, we teach tolerance for a multitude of values. If you grew up in ancient Sparta, you were taught the code of military sacrifice. In tyrannies such as North Korea, the multicultural mosaic is hardly the order of business. Allegiance to the leader is the primary pedagogic principle. Many of us equate education with refinement, with sophistication, rational decision-making and ethical instincts, but our current struggles with evil forces throughout the world show otherwise.

Education is not a neutral activity. Authorities can educate according to whatever agenda they desire. In the current Arab world, with precious few exceptions and with the assistance of the BBC and the United Nations, hatred of Israel – blind, seething, immoral, irrational hatred – is the educational order of the day. No cease-fires, road maps or peace plans can undo educational poison. The only antidote is re-education, an infinitely slow and painful path, but one that must begin in the Muslim world immediately.

Jewish Life

Suite Française by Irene Nemirovsky, Random House.

Suite Française is a masterpiece

Books
Bernard Baskin

This remarkable novel bears a surprising history. In 1942, the author, widely admired in France for her nine novels, was arrested as a Jew and deported to Auschwitz, where she quickly succumbed to typhus.

For some months she had worked feverishly on Suite Française, a book that was to encompass five segments and run to about 1,000 pages. She managed to complete only two sections before her arrest. Her two daughters, aged 5 and 13, went into hiding, carrying with them a small suitcase with the uncompleted manuscript.

For 64 years it remained unread, regarded as a personal memoir of limited interest. When it was finally published, it was acclaimed a literary masterpiece – rich in narrative, often stunningly beautiful in invoking subtle emotions and a frank, often brutal, depiction of a variety of Parisian individuals and families as they fled, panic-stricken, from the advancing German army.

In the novel's first segment, A Storm in June, Nemirovsky is unsparing in her excoriation of the cruelty, stupidity, prejudices and hypocrisy of most of the refugees as they ruthlessly manoeuvre to save their own skins. Her cross-section of types concentrates on three families but also includes aristocrats, clerks, merchants, artists and soldiers.

There is both satire and bleak humour in her limning of one-time respected and privileged members of society, reduced to clinging to useless material possessions and desperately attempting to maintain absurd middle-class values in a vortex of tumult and chaos.

Only one couple, the unassuming, middle-aged Michauds, act with a measure of kindness and dignity.

The book's second portion, Dolce, is set in a small village in the French countryside almost a year later, after the armistice. Here the tone is more muted and even tranquil. Billeted in the home of a sensitive French woman is a cultured and handsome German officer. Their secret love affair adumbrates the complex relationship between villagers and occupiers and the theme of collaboration.

The author is eloquent in describing the beauty of the countryside in its different seasons and moods. "The breath of wind that moved [the cherry trees] was still chilly on this day in May; the flowers gently resisted, curling up with a kind of trembling grace and turning their pale stamens towards the ground. The sun shone through them, revealing a pattern of interlacing delicate blue veins, visible through the opaque petals; this added something alive to the flower's fragility, to its ethereal quality, something almost human, in a way that human can mean fragility and endurance both at the same time."

The German regiment arranges a party for the villagers and themselves and the author describes the scene this way: "Little by little, darkness spread across the lawns; they could still make out the gold decorations on the uniforms, the Germans' blond hair, the musicians' brass instruments on the terrace, but they had lost their glow. All the light of the day, fleeing the earth, seemed for one brief moment to take refuge in the sky; pink clouds spiralled round the full moon that was as green as pistachio sorbet and as clear as glass; it was reflected in the lake. Exquisite perfumes filled the air: grass, fresh hay, wild strawberries. The music kept playing."

How rare to find a book that is both emotionally fulfilling and a piercingly true evocation of historical events.

Blogging during the bombing

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

By now, most people are familiar with major Israeli media providing wall-to-wall coverage of the bombing of northern Israel and fighting in Lebanon. The major players include the Jerusalem Post, Ha'aretz, Kol Israel and others in both Hebrew and English. You can find excellent lists at Mondo Times [http://tinyurl.com/mqhfd], Golsrael [www.goisrael.co.il/] and Abyz NewsLinks [www.abyznewslinks.com/israel.htm].

But today I want to focus on the very personal and raw writing that you will find on the blogs of Israelis who are living through the bombing.

No report on blogging can be comprehensive. Since I first wrote about Israeli bloggers three years ago, their numbers have mushroomed – as has blogging in general. A recent report by the blogging search site, Technorati [www.technorati.com], said there are about 1.6 million posts per day, or 18.6 posts per second. And since the start of the Israel-Hezbollah conflict, average activity has jumped to 2.5 million posts per day. [http://tinyurl.com/oqkwn]

Here's a sampling of some of the blogs you will probably agree with some, others will get you angry – but hopefully all of them give insight to the lives of ordinary Israelis.

"When I told all my friends back in the States that I was moving to Israel, they looked at me like I was crazy. Now I get e-mails asking me when am I going to come home. I am home." [http://sabraheart.blogspot.com]

"This war is making me ill. The Lebanese civilians dying makes me ill. The rockets on Israeli schools, hospitals and apartment buildings make me ill… The fact that it is Israeli weapons that have killed so many innocent people – even though we have no choice – makes me ill.

The fact that there are some Israelis – including, apparently, some army spokespeople – who don't understand that just because you warn people to leave an area, doesn't mean they all can, makes me ill." [www.chayyeisarah.blogspot.com]

"A country should not risk the lives of its own soldiers in order to protect the enemy's civilians. Unfortunately, Israel has often endangered its own soldiers in war for the fear that using superior firepower may cause civilian deaths among those who indiscriminately kill our civilians without batting an eyelid." [http://cosmicx.blogspot.com]

Joke. "Two men are sitting in a barber shop in Nazareth. One asks the other, 'Hey, what's the forecast for today?'

"'I heard 26 in Carmiel, 30 in Haifa, 29 in Tiberias and 23 in Safed.'

"'So I guess I don't need to bring a jacket to work today, huh?'

"'Who's talking about the weather?'

"Not amused? Tell me about it." [http://3asl.blogspot.com/]

"My wife ran into a bunch of people today from our village. One lady said she had put the kids outside in a little swimming pool when she heard a missile incoming. She grabbed the kids and ran inside and the boom was so loud she was sure it had hit the house. It had actually hit the neighbour's house." [http://rockofgalilee.blogspot.com/]

I came across that last blog in a very good listing of Israeli and Lebanese blogs at CBC.ca. [http://tinyurl.com/pwtof] On a related note, Sarah Ellison points out in the Wall Street Journal that bloggers from Lebanon and Israel are not only voicing their opinions but engaging with bloggers on the other side of the border. [http://tinyurl.com/mooup]

Some of the other blogs I find myself returning to include Israelity [www.israelity.com], Israellycool [www.israellycool.com/blog] and Yaakov Kirschen's Dry Bones Blog. Perhaps most amusing – and depressing – are reprints of some of Kirschen's vintage cartoons. [http://drybonesblog.blogspot.com]

Although many residents of the north have decided to seek refuge further south, others haven't budged. Carmia, a contributor to the Kishkushim blog, lives in Haifa and wasn't going to let the situation stop her from hunting for a new apartment. "My boyfriend and I decided to look for apartments anyway, even though there had been a few sirens earlier in the day. Around 7 p.m., after we had just arrived at the first apartment in Stella Maris (the same street where Haifa's first-ever Katyusha had landed), the sirens sounded again. The woman whose apartment we were looking at didn't have a 'mamad' (a 'safe room') so she told us, 'Get into the shower – and take a look at the bathroom while you're there.'" [http://kishkushim.blogspot.com/] No word yet on whether they rented the apartment.

Israel hasn't used 'disproportionate' force, Brosh says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel's Consul General Ya'acov Brosh, left, and federal Finance Minister Jim Flaherty at the launch of the Israel Emergency Campaign in Toronto last week.

Israel has neither used disproportionate force nor ignored the suffering of Lebanese civilians in its armed current conflict with Hezbollah, Israel's consul general in Toronto said last week.

At a press conference designed to highlight Israel's side of the story, Ya'acov Brosh dismissed claims that Israel has reacted too harshly and made no genuine efforts to minimize civilian casualties in Lebanon.

Reacting to allegations that Israel has used disproportionate means to combat Hezbollah, he posed several pointed questions.

"Is it proportionate that hundreds of thousands of Israelis are displaced in their own country?" he asked.

"Is the desire of terror organizations and the countries who back them to destroy Israel proportionate?

"Is it proportionate that Israelis are being kidnapped from their own country?

"Is it proportionate that airfields, ports and highways of Beirut and Lebanon are used to amass missiles and weaponry against Israel?"

Israel did not seek out this war, Brosh said, but the Israeli government has an obligation to protect its citizens and ensure their safety.

"This war is not about territory, but about a state, a democracy, that wants to survive," he said.

In a reference to Israel's military confrontations with Hezbollah in Lebanon and Hamas in the Gaza Strip, Brosh said, "Israel is once again, after 58 years of existence, attacked on two fronts. The enemy this time is different in character from previous ones, declaring clearly that its utmost objective is to totally obliterate the State of Israel and not accept Israel's existence in any part of the Middle East. Any negotiation with Israel is not an option for them."

Accusing Hezbollah and Hamas of deliberately operating from civilian areas, Brosh particularly singled out Hezbollah, saying it "fights behind the skirts of women and the diapers of babies."

Nonetheless, he acknowledged that Hezbollah has exhibited well-honed military skills.

Brosh strongly criticized Syria and Iran for extending assistance to Hezbollah, which, he said, has purposely targeted Israeli civilians in a multitude of rocket barrages. As he put it, "Hezbollah is doing its utmost to kill civilians."

On the day he spoke, Hezbollah fired 165 Katyusha rockets into Israel, killing an Israeli Arab woman and her five-year-old son in the Galilee village of Dir el-Assad.

Brosh said Israel has done all it can to avoid hitting innocent civilians in Lebanon. Israel has warned them to leave places scheduled to be bombed and has only targeted sites with suspected rocket launchers, he added.

In a scathing critique of the Lebanese government, Brosh said that since Israel's withdrawal from south Lebanon in May 2000, "Lebanon has refused to adhere to international demands and the demands of the United Nations Security Council to deploy its own army along the international border with Israel.

"Instead, Lebanon has enabled Hezbollah to build bunkers, tunnels and underground cities reaching depths of 100 to 150 feet to amass an enormous cache of sophisticated weaponry for the purpose of attacking Israel."

Israel's two major objectives in the war are the release of its two abducted soldiers and the removal of Hezbollah's missile threat, he said.

But quoting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Brosh said the war will neither be "easy" nor "short."

Referring to the possibility that a truce may soon halt hostilities, he added, "We hope that a ceasefire will be achieved, but it has to be a real ceasefire, with an effective international force on the border."

Brosh presided over a sometimes graphic slide show that underlined three salient points: Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon was certified by the United Nations; Hezbollah touched off the current fighting by crossing into Israel and kidnapping and killing Israeli soldiers; and the Israeli homefront has taken a big hit during the conflict.

Thanking the Canadian government for its "steadfast support," Brosh said that Canada and Israel share common values and are both committed to combatting terrorism.

עצות ירושלמיות לתל אביב

"כשמגייסים אותך למילואים -לא מדברים על הסדרה החדשה של האחים ברבש.

מוֹנָחִי

Camp raises funds to bring Israeli kids to Canada

Special ceremony held upon arrival

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Camp Torolago and One Family Fund have teamed up to bring 25 Israeli kids out of the war-torn country and give them a memorable summer.

When the Hezbollah-Israel war began last month, Jack Benaim, the owner of Camp Torolago, a Jewish overnight camp, decided he needed to do something for the Israeli victims.

"When the war broke out, it was at the height of busy season for camps and I was sitting, watching the news and thinking, what can I do to make an effect?" Benaim said.

He decided to call on the community to help raise enough money to fly as many Israeli children from northern Israel as he could to his camp near Belleville in eastern Ontario.

"I started hitting the phones and raising money to get the flights in," he said, adding that he called Chantal Belzberg, who along with her husband, Marc, is the founder of One Family Fund in Israel, a non-profit organization that assists Israeli terror victims.

"I asked her for a sample of children... who have already had their families torn apart by Palestinian terror, and are now having Katyusha rockets rained down on their homes," Benaim said.

While not all of the 25 campers, age 12 to 17, are victims of Palestinian terror, all of them do live in northern Israeli towns that have been under attack since July 12.

"There are some kids who came directly from their bomb shelters in Kiryat Shmona to the camp."

He said that in four days, from July 24 to 28, he, with the help of One Family Fund, managed to raise $55,000 through the Estrella Benaim Camping Assistance Program, which Benaim had founded to raise money for families who need financial assistance to send their kids to camp.

"Last year, we brought six Israeli kids who were directly affected by terrorist attacks, and [earlier this year] we tried to raise money but couldn't do it. But when the war started... people started opening up their pockets," Benaim said.

And for this, campers Haim Katav, 17, from Haifa, and Tanir Ezra, 15, from Kiryat Bialik, a Haifa suburb, are thankful.

"In Israel the situation is bad. There are a lot of alarms, but people get used to that," Katav said.

"I stayed in Haifa for two weeks. The first week of the war, I was in Kfar Saba. For the other two weeks, I was in Haifa and I kept hearing alarms," he added.

"Before the war started, I was in the rocket zone," Ezra said. "Every half-hour, there was a siren and we had to run to the shelters. So I stayed there for a week, and then I went to Tel Aviv where my grandmother lives and I stayed there until I came to Canada."

Both said they are worried about their families who are still in northern Israel, but they have faith that everything is going to be all right.

In the meantime, Katav and Ezra are enjoying their three-week Canadian vacation that began on Aug. 7 and ends on Aug 27.

Benaim said his staff and campers were so determined to make the Israelis feel welcome upon their arrival, they planned a special ceremony.

"When the bus came, all the kids rushed to the main field. They were singing Am Yisrael Chai and Od Yavoh Shalom Aleinu. All the kids lined up along the doorway with their hands up, pretty much making a tunnel, and they all came under while we were all yelling and screaming. We had the Israeli flag flying and we all sang Hatikva together," Benaim said.

"The camp is like a big family. Everyone gets to do the things they want to do, everyone is having fun and there are no sad faces," said Katav, who acts as one of the translators for some of the other 25 Israeli kids who don't speak English as well as he does.

"It's fun," Ezra added. "There are a lot of funny people. They're nice. They treat us like family."

As though an escape from the barrage of rockets being rained down on their towns isn't enough of a reason to reach out to these kids, both Katav and Ezra, as well as many other campers, are also victims of Palestinian terror.

Three years ago, Katav's sister, who was 20 at the time, was killed by a suicide bomber in Haifa. And Ezra's father was murdered by a sniper, at the barrier in Ofra, an Israeli settlement in eastern Israel.

"All of these kids had been victims of terror prior to coming to Canada, and that's why they were chosen. They have had really unfortunate circumstances that have thrown them together," said Colin Lewis, president of One Family Fund Canada, the organization that handled the logistics involved in bringing the Israelis to Camp Torolago.

"I personally visited the camp last year, and I was so moved by the experience the [Israelis] were having and the impact they were having on the Canadian kids as well. I visited Israel and I saw several Israeli kids months after they had been to Canada and they were so high on the experience and so appreciative of what we had done for them."

Now that Camp Torolago has helped bring Israeli kids to his camp for the past two summers, Benaim hopes to make this an annual endeavour.

"We feel it is a wonderful opportunity to take the kids away from the trauma they are exposed to in Israel and bring them to a totally different experience where they can go canoeing and water-skiing – things our kids take for granted every summer," Lewis said.

"Unfortunately, there is far more need than the supply. Whatever money we raise here and whatever numbers of kids we can help, it's never enough."

University guide aims to give students a head start

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Adam Paulin and business partner Alex Kagan, both recent university graduates, are determined to help high school students make a smoother transition to higher education than they did.

With their 40-page, self-published guide, called Fresh Perspectives: A University Survival Guide, Paulin said their goal is to help first-year students negotiate the many differences between high school and university.

Paulin, a 22-year-old graduate of the University of Western Ontario's business program, said a post-secondary education can affect students in many different ways.

For instance, Kagan, also a UWO business grad, had a difficult time adjusting to the university social scene, while Paulin was unprepared when it came to mid-term exams.

Adam Paulin

He said he had very little experience with multiple choice tests, and he wasn't able to fully adjust until he was well into his second semester.

Paulin added that if he could offer his advice to first-year students, based on his experience, he would warn them about mid-terms.

"I would say, start preparing because you don't realize – it comes so fast. That was my problem. Other people experienced social issues, or living with a roommate, but for me, it was the shocker of these huge 500-person exams, and not knowing how to do multiple choice," Paulin recalled.

"I spent the whole second semester learning how to do that. I was fortunate to be able to pull everything together, but it was just dreadful."

Paulin said the guide tells high school graduates everything they should expect as post-secondary students.

"[The guide] has so much value because it'll tell people, you're going to be living with a roommate – be prepared, or you're going to be eating cafeteria food for a year – be prepared," he said, adding that his favourite section of the guide is "Lunch Ladies Aren't Nutritionists."

And the best way to get prepared, Paulin said, is to arm yourself with information that can be found in the guide.

He said that although the high school curriculum concentrates on preparing students for university-level work, many students enter post-secondary institutions without adequate knowledge about time management, lecture comprehension, and, more importantly, what to expect in terms of living conditions, diet, social scenes involving drugs and alcohol, and dealing with the pressures and dangers of becoming sexually active.

Paulin said that while there are similar guides in the United States, he is unaware of anything that compares to his product in Canada. He added that what separates his guidebook from others on the market is that the guide is written for students, by students.

He said that he and Kagan travelled to schools across the country to speak to students about the problems they faced and the ways they dealt with them.

"[The guide] is not preaching to them, saying this is what you have to do and this is how you have to do it, but it tells them that these are the best techniques. These are the facts."

Although many students were hired as writers to work with senior editor Annie Roper on the project, doctors and professors also contributed information about the realities of binge drinking, drug abuse, sexually transmitted diseases, as well as tips on how to stay organized, take good notes and prepare for exams.

"There is a lot more fact than just opinion in the book. We found people who were willing to tell their stories, but also combined it with the facts," Paulin said.

He said that last year, he and Kagan sold the guide to two private high schools in Toronto, Upper Canada College and Bishop Strachan School, to distribute to their graduating students, and to date, they have sold about 1,500 copies.

Paulin added that the schools' administration saw value in the guide, because it might help their students who enter college and university make it to graduation.

"When you look at [the fact that] 15 to 20 per cent of kids aren't graduating… high schools want to maintain a good record," he said.

While their efforts are focused on distributing the guide to high schools, Paulin said he hopes Fresh Perspectives will eventually offer an annual edition and become a Canada-wide success. He also hopes to establish an online help desk.

"We're the starting point. We want students to realize that there are situations and important issues and that if certain situations arise they'll have more information to help them," he said, adding that the book has been endorsed by the Kids Help Phone, Parent Action on Drugs and the Drug and Alcohol Treatment Infoline.

Sabra Montrealer enlists in IDF

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — This coming year might have been a typical one for Noam Mendelson.

The 18-year-old Montrealer could have been hanging out with friends, continuing his studies or just doing the stuff young people his age like to do.

Instead, for the next six to nine months, Mendelson will be training for the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) and considering the real possibility that he could be assigned to a combat unit if the war against Hezbollah rages on.

"For now, I'm staying calm," laughed Mendelson during a telephone interview from Israel. "But I'm sure I'll feel differently if it's still going on [when training is over]."

Mendelson said he has had absolutely no second thoughts about serving in the Israeli army, despite the fact that he volunteered long before the latest conflagration began.

Born in Israel, Mendelson has dual citizenship and was part of group of 30 Canadians from eastern Canada and the United States who left Aug. 9 for Israel as immigrant participants in the Friends of Israeli Scouts (Tzofim).

The group was part of the Garin Tzabar program, which allows Israeli-born young people, the children of Israelis, and army-aged olim living abroad to move to Israel and prepare for the army together on a kibbutz, and to polish their Hebrew at an ulpan before being individually assigned to their duties.

Mendelson said three other members of his group were also born in Israel, but he is the only Montrealer.

Because he's a sabra, Mendelson is obliged to stay in the army for an entire three-year stint. Olim who are not Israeli-born have the choice of serving for less time and are not assigned to intelligence units, Mendelson said.

Not surprisingly, his decision to join the IDF at this time has made Mendelson's family and friends worried about his safety.

His father, Mark –who is executive director of the Jewish National Fund in Montreal and an IDF veteran himself – as well as his mother Edna, director of the Jewish Rehabilitation Hospital Foundation, and sister his Omer have all voiced concerns, but they're letting him follow his heart, he said.

Ironically, Mendelson said he came to Canada from Israel as a baby partly because his family wanted to avoid the possibility of him being drafted into the IDF when he came of age.

Surprisingly, though, he didn't go back until the 2005 March of the Living trip that marked the 60th anniversary of the end of World War II. That trip had a "huge impact" on Mendelson, a graduate of Jewish People's Schools and Peretz Schools, and Bialik High School. A second trip, with birthright israel this past January, "just confirmed that I really wanted to go," Mendelson said. He then joined the Friends of Israel Scouts program to be part of a group going together and to facilitate his transition into the IDF. Despite his desire to serve in the Israeli army, Mendelson is not immune to the anxiety that comes with knowing that he might be less than a year away from being in a combat unit, although he could be assigned elsewhere.

"Hopefully, there will be a resolution [to the conflict] by then," he said. On the other hand, he sees himself as an Israeli with a duty to perform. After his stint is finished, he hopes to return to Canada and pursue business studies at university as a mature student. But right now, he said, "this is the time Israel needs me."

Olive oil must be prepared carefully

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Ask Tovah Grafstein what she knows about olive oil and you'll likely learn something new.

First, the 18-year-old daughter of Neil and Rachel Grafstein of Grafstein Wines who was recently home for a break from her year-long studies in Israel, will tell you her favourite salad dressing recipe.

"Depending on your taste, take a mixture of balsamic vinegar and olive oil, and add oregano, pepper and Italian seasoning. That's it."

Extra-virgin olive oil (EVOO) is completely pure, she says, and in production, it is never heated over 27 degrees C. "Just like wine, the temperature is monitored throughout the process. If it is heated above that temperature or made with two different types of olives, it cannot be called extra-virgin.

"Also, EVOO has an oleic acid count of no higher than 0.8 per cent."

Next, she'll tell you that because of the similarities in growing conditions, olives and wine grapes are closely related. "The difference, though, is that mostly, wine grapes aren't eaten."

Grafstein, who along with her father, recently took an olive oil workshop run by the Italian Trade Commission, says there are three locations in Israel where both wine grapes and olives are grown.

"Mount Tabor in the lower Galilee; Kibbutz Tzora, about half an hour outside of Jerusalem; and the Shilo settlement in [the West Bank] all grow [both crops] next to each other.

"The utmost care is taken in producing both grapes and wine, and to ensure a high turnover, they're produced every two years," Grafstein says.

As an importer of pure Israeli olive oil to Canada, Grafstein says the key factors in producing both wine and grapes are the climate – the Mediterranean climate is perfect – the temperature during production and the handling of produce until the final product is ready.

"When you use the choicest grapes and choicest olives, you get a product that is pure, clean and smooth."

At the workshop, which was led by olive oil expert Fabrizio Vignolini, they enjoyed a tasting similar to a wine tasting, she says.

"We swirled it around in our mouths, we sniffed it and we took notice of the colour, aroma and after-taste.

"[Olives can be] sweet, herbal, fruity, peppery, or taste like almonds or apples, but it's always a good thing for one to be a little bitter. That's the sign of a well-grown olive."

The versatility of olive oil is amazing, she says. "Use a minimal amount when cooking, and add a little more when the food is done. Keeping the oil uncooked preserves its natural state, chemical balance and robust flavour."

Grafstein says she grills a red pepper by cutting it in quarters, placing it skin side down and drizzling it with balsamic vinegar and olive oil.

For more information call Grafstein Wines at 416-256-0440.

Lebanon reportage distorts big picture

Canadian media coverage of the Israel-Hezbollah conflict remains substantially divided in perspective between sensational daily news items and editorials and commentary that focus on the deeper story. While the reportage largely depicts the war as a humanitarian disaster that's been inflicted on the people of Lebanon by Israel, analyses mostly support Israel's military struggle against the heavily armed terrorist group Hezbollah, which is backed and directed by Iran and Syria, bent on causing the maximum amount of civilian casualties, and dedicated to the destruction of Israel.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

This is not simply a matter of competing narratives, but rather a function of the reporting process. In Lebanon, the media must cover the conflict under the watchful eye of Hezbollah "minders" who are experts in stage-managing events to highlight the pain of civilians at the hands of the Israel Defence Forces. There have also, for instance, been recently documented cases in which information has been deliberately manipulated, including one involving a Reuters freelancer who doctored photos in order to depict more damage to Lebanon and its civilians than actually occurred.

Not that Lebanese civilians aren't suffering, or that the media have completely ignored Hezbollah's unceasing rocket barrage on Israel's northern cities and towns. However, all too often, the media focus on isolated scenes of devastation in Lebanon, leaving the false impression that the country has been left in ruins. Typically, the camera will zoom in on one destroyed neighbourhood of Beirut (used by Hezbollah), but fail to pan back to reveal that most of the city has been left untouched.

In addition, many reporters frequently take the more sensational statements made by Hezbollah and other Lebanese officials at face value. For example, on Aug. 7, Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora claimed that Israel had carried out "a deliberate massacre" of more than 40 Lebanese civilians in the village of Hula. He later admitted that, in fact, only one civilian had been killed, yet several media outlets continued to carry Siniora's original allegation even after he corrected himself.

In "How Israel fights" (National Post, Aug. 8) Jonathan Kay writes: "By this point in the war, some readers will have heard enough about media bias. Still, I can't help but marvel at the other-worldly impression people are getting. The Israeli Air Force has flown 9,000 sorties during this war. The handful of tragic instances in which Israel has mistakenly attacked civilian targets are treated as war crimes. Meanwhile, Hezbollah has launched more than 2,000 missiles at Israel, every one of them deliberately targeting Israeli civilians... But the only time this is reported is when the rockets actually hit someone – in which case the fact is cited not as an indictment of Hezbollah's barbarism, but as testament to its strength and the purported futility of Israel's strategy."

Kay describes incidents in which Israeli special forces have put themselves at risk by attacking Hezbollah targets at close quarters, rather than bombing an entire building, in order to avoid killing civilians. Yet the emotionally laden images of human suffering send the opposite message: Israel is overreacting to Hezbollah's relatively "minor" infraction of violating Israeli territory, then kidnapping and killing Israeli soldiers.

At the same time, the deeper story is being explored in the editorial pages of almost all Canadian newspapers, and in some television and radio interviews. For example, the Aug. 7 Globe and Mail editorial, "Two crucial questions on Israel vs. its enemies," asks key rhetorical questions: "If Israel stopped attacking Hezbollah, would Hezbollah stop attack-

War postpones launch of $100M Jewish education fund

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

A $100-million endowment initiative for Jewish education that was supposed to be launched by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto in the coming months has taken a back seat to the federation's Israel Emergency Campaign.

But even when the campaign becomes a reality, parents won't see a break on day school tuition, which averages more than $11,000 this year. That's because interest from the endowment fund will be used to fund all aspects of Jewish education, and in any event would not be enough to make much of a dent in fees, said Seymour Epstein, director of the federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE).

Epstein told The CJN that a campaign to create the endowment fund is currently in the planning stages and will be launched sometime in late 2006 or early 2007. He said it had to be postponed to make way for the Israel Emergency Campaign, which began Aug. 8 and aims to help Israel's northern residents.

"Clearly, energy these days is being put into our emergency campaign because of the war in Israel," Epstein said. "At this point, [the Jewish education campaign] is all tentative."

Epstein gave few details about the proposed endowment, but he said donated funds "will be used for anything that's legitimately connected to Jewish education." That is, the money will not necessarily go to any one area or aspect of Jewish education.

"'Jewish education' means everything – the works," he said. "It means adult education, professional development, teacher training, informal education – the entire gamut."

Epstein said that where the money ends up will depend on the wishes of donors. "Each donor has a different area of concern," he said. "The donor who endows designates his or her area of concern. We can advise and suggest [where we think the money should go].

"In the end, the funds will be for all the different kinds of needs that Jewish education presents."

One such need that hits home for many parents is reducing the ever-rising cost of tuition fees at BJE schools. Tuition fees for grades 1 through 8 at Toronto's major Jewish day schools have increased by 4 to 8 per cent over last year, while Canada's inflation rate stands at 2.5 per cent. The average cost of tuition stands at more than $11,000 for the coming school year [see article below].

Across-the-board tuition reductions, however, are unlikely, Epstein said.

"Even if the entire $100 million went to an endowment fund just for the subsidy of tuition – which is only one aspect of the problem of Jewish education – it wouldn't reduce it that much," he said.

He noted that "$100 million produces $5 million a year in interest in a foundation. Five million dollars across the board would not reduce the $120 million [paid in] tuition [by parents in BJE schools]," he said.

Besides, reducing tuition is not what the endowment is for, Epstein said.

"It's for the general needs of Jewish education, part of which are tuition reductions. Jewish education has an entire world of needs."

Epstein pointed out that federation provides subsidies to families in need, not tuition reductions across the board.

"We do other kinds of funding, like project funding for informal education and supplementary education," he said.

He said that endowment campaigns to lower fees for all students only work in smaller communities "where there are [only] 1,000 students in day schools. We have 11,000 students."

He noted that it would require $22 million in interest per year to reduce tuition by $2,000 for those 11,000 students.

Speaking about federation's $7.8-million subsidy program for day school tuition, Epstein noted that it "is our largest budget piece" and that the program "is unparalleled in the Jewish world."

He admitted, though, that the program isn't enough for parents struggling to send their children to day school. "Does it reduce the tuition enough? No, it's never enough. There's always a need for more. But it does provide serious help for poor families," he said.

Epstein said federation has been providing more than $7 million for subsidies for many years.

"There are hundreds of millions of dollars that this community has given in the past 10 years just for day school subsidies. It's the highest priority of domestic fundraising," he said.

Aaron Blumenfeld, a former co-president of the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS), which lobbies for government funding of Jewish day schools, said a community endowment fund is welcome. "Any money that's raised for Jewish education is a good thing. I just hope that adequate thought is given to [fact that] tuition is high and it's becoming unaffordable for many parents."

Ira Walfish, another former OAJDS co-president, said, "The focus should be [on] reduction of tuition, period," adding that the BJE should work with schools to find creative methods to do that, because it's the only way to attract middle and lower income families – particularly non-Orthodox ones – who aren't sending their kids to Jewish day schools and are too embarrassed to ask for a subsidy.

"The heart of the problem is that three-quarters of Jewish kids are not in the [day school] system... What is wrong with this picture: [there's] $100 million coming into the system without more kids coming into the system?"

Fees rise 4 to 8 per cent at largest day schools

As kids head back to school, the parents of children in Jewish day schools are facing percentage increases in tuition fees that are greater than Canada's annual rate of inflation.

Tuition fees for grades 1 through 8 at the seven largest Jewish day schools in Toronto have risen between four and eight per cent this year. The annualized rate of inflation in June, the latest number available from the Bank of Canada, was 2.5 per cent.

Associated Hebrew Day Schools saw a five per cent rise in tuition for grades 1 through 6, from $9,800 last year to $10,250 this year. For grades 7 and 8, the increase was seven per cent, from $9,800 to $10,450.

Preschool at Associated cost $4,600 for half-day enrollment last year, while this year it's up by five per cent to $4,825. Full-day preschool tuition is also up by 5 per cent, from $9,200 to $9,650.

At Bialik Hebrew Day School, last year's tuition was $10,600, including a $1,000 building fee. This year, tuition rose to $11,000 including a $1,025 building fee, an increase of four per cent.

Grades 1 through 8 at Eitz Chaim Day School went from last year's cost of $9,900 to $10,400, an increase of five per cent.

Leo Baeck Day School's fees are $9,900 this year, eight per cent higher than last year's cost of $9,200.

For grades 1 through 3 at Netivot HaTorah Day School, fees climbed from $9,700 in 2005-06 to $10,480 for 2006-07, some eight per cent. Grades 4 through 8 also saw an eight per cent tuition fee increase for the upcoming school year, from $9,900 last year to $10,690 now.

At the Toronto Heschel School, senior kindergarten through Grade 3 will cost $13,000, four per cent more than the $12,500 it cost last year. Grades 4 and 5 will cost $13,200 in 2006-07, up four per cent from $12,700 in 2005-06, while fees for grades 6 through 8 at Heschel also grew by four per cent this year, to $13,500 from $13,000.

The United Synagogue Day School also uniformly upped its tuition by four per cent this year. Full-day senior kindergarten now costs $10,400, while last year it cost $10,000. Grade 1 is up to $10,700 over last year's $10,300, and grades 2 through 8 now cost $11,200, up from $10,800 in 2005-06.

Tuition also increased at Toronto Jewish high schools. The Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto increased its fees to $15,650, including a capital levy, from $15,150 last year, a rise of three per cent.

At the Bnei Akiva high schools, Ulpanat Orot Girls' School and Yeshivat Or Chaim, tuition rose four per cent, from $15,100 to $15,650.

The director of the UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education, Seymour Epstein, said there are two main causes for the tuition increases.

"The first is the increased demand for high quality, which is always good," Epstein said. "The second is the increase in teachers' salaries, which is determined by teachers' unions. Teacher salaries make up the lion's share in any school's budget.

"[The rise in tuition] is unfortunate because we feel for the parents who are struggling to pay these fees, and for some parents, it's a real sacrifice.

"But these costs are going up and these fees [have to] go up," he said.

Epstein said each school determines fee increases independently, and while federation has a subsidy program to help pay for tuition, "the determination of fees is really controlled by the schools, not us." — J.F.

Wiesenthal digital hate report out in French

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center (SWC) decried a 20 per cent rise in hate and terror-promotion websites at the recent Montreal release of the 2006 edition of Digital Terrorism and Hate.

It marked the first time that the annual CD, now in its eighth edition, was released in Montreal, because its content, also for the first time, is being narrated in French, as well as in Spanish.

The 2006 report puts the number of hate and terrorism sites, as well as blogs, newsgroups, chat rooms, portals and the like, at more than 6,000 worldwide.

"The bad news is that those who peddle hate are determined in their efforts to pollute the world," SWC national affairs director Leo Adler told reporters at a Montreal news conference.

But Adler told The CJN that there are "only a handful" of Canadian-based sites that he would consider problematic, a tiny number compared to other countries. He said this is because of Canada's strong anti-hate laws, as well as the co-operation of the Canadian Association of Internet Providers and the power of the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal, which can send Internet transgressors to court, where they could face jail time.

Adler cited the example of two Internet hate sites on Montreal-based servers, including one that was pro-Hezbollah, that were successfully shut down this past May.

"We would like to see some kind of regulation," Adler told The CJN. "Every other form of media requires some form of licensing. If it can be done for satellites and cable, it can be done for the Internet."

In a statement, Adler said that "looking beyond the numbers, online activities have undergone a qualitative shift that present existential threats to society.

"The Internet has become a 'virtual university' for terrorists and manuals from how to build a 'dirty bomb' and make poisons, to tutorials on how to use global positioning devices to attack a motorcade."

More than 6,000 sites worldwide

"The Internet has really become the medium to inspire, recruit, and communicate among extremists and terrorists," Adler told The CJN.

He said the SWC uses researchers all over the world who do nothing but scour websites, viewing an estimated 25,000 per month.

"When we say there are over 6,000 [hate and terror] sites, it is really just a sampling," Adler said.

He agreed that the increase in sites found does not necessarily reflect a rise in the number of people supporting such sites, but "the number is not the most important issue," he said.

"You can have hard-core militants, active proponents, all the way down to passive sympathizers, like rings in the water that get less intense from the centre after you throw a rock in," Adler said.

"The real issue is the lack of accountability and the impossibility to govern it."

One of the problems lies in the fact that hate can be posted virtually unchecked by authorities, because extremist groups can use more than one server in more than one country. In the United States, servers are virtually untouchable because of free speech laws there.

Although the nature of the Internet makes it virtually impossible to find all the extremist sites out there or shut them all down, Adler said tools do indeed exist to shut down as many as possible if, similar to Canada, nations implemented more stringent guidelines for Internet servers and providers.

"I really think it can be done," he said.

Richard Marceau, a former Bloc Québécois MP who is Jewish and a consultant for the Friends of the SWC, told reporters that "it is not a question of censorship, but responsibility." He also noted that young people are especially vulnerable because sometimes hate sites are disguised as innocuous sites for youth.

"Teachers should know that sites that might appear legitimate are not," he said.

Marceau said that "Canadian authorities certainly have shown awareness of Internet hate activities. But the increasing promotion of weapons of mass destruction requires a more robust strategy, greater resources and more timely awareness of a rapidly changing and growing threat to Canada and the world."

Oshawa councillor seeks to uncover city's Jewish past

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Oshawa city councillor Louise Parkes is determined to find out all she can about a partially abandoned Jewish summer colony in the city, but she needs help from the descendants of the people who spent the summer there.

According to the information gathered by Parkes and Oshawa tax collector Timothy Dwyre, about 20 Jewish families established a small community in Oshawa, near Whitby, off Taunton Road in Cedar Valley, at the tail end of World War II in 1944.

Despite the fact that many of the original 20 cottages are either abandoned, deteriorating or burnt out, Parkes, who is Jewish, said that while one side of the summer colony is "a little run down," there are still a few beautiful little cottages that people are living in.

"There was a report that came to council about the properties, and we had to determine whether they would be going into tax sale," which means that if none of the owners of the properties or their descendants come forward to claim the cottages, the tax collector – in this case, Dwyre – would sell the properties to pay the taxes owed to the city.

Louise Parkes

Parkes said she believes the city is interested in tearing down the whole area, adding that about two years ago, the city tore down a synagogue in the same area without bringing the issue to council.

"When I heard that, I was really, really disappointed," Parkes said.

She does not want to see the summer colony suffer the same fate as the synagogue.

"I was expecting a ghost town and I saw a vibrant community, and I would like to see it remain intact."

Parkes described what the area looks like today, and explained that the cottages were built on a creek and that the inhabitants used to dam it to create a swimming hole.

"You go down this cottage pathway and you discover this circle of homes, some of which are occupied, and then when you come around to the beach, you see two burnt-out structures in the woods… [but then] you see these pretty little cottages. There are lots of trees, pines, etc. It's a nice little area," she said.

"It's part of our history, and I think the land is valuable and to get rid of it over taxes would be a shame."

She said they are trying to get in touch with the descendants of the owners of the properties to protect their property rights.

"They may owe the city money, but they also have properties that have some value," Parkes said, adding that one of the properties sold for more than $100,000.

But more important to Parkes than settling outstanding tax payments is getting in touch with descendants who have information about the area and its history.

"I'm trying to find out the story. I want to get in touch with the people who stayed there. I'd really like to find the descendants because I think it is an important part of our history and I want to find out why the community was started and who the rabbis were – or maybe there wasn't a rabbi," Parkes said.

"I have heard now of a couple of people who went there [every summer] that I'm going to follow up on.

"People had no idea that this place even existed," she said, adding that her husband's family has owned a furniture store in Oshawa since 1934, and even as a member of the Jewish community in Oshawa, her father-in-law thought the Jewish summer colony was a summer camp.

"I guess I knew about the Jewish community in Oshawa through my husband… but I had never heard this story. And all the time that I have been here in Oshawa, I have made it my business to find out more about the Jewish community here because I think it is a large part of our Canadian history."

She said she and Dwyre suspect that the reason the summer colony was established in Oshawa was that anti-Semitism was a problem in Toronto during and after World War II, which meant Jews might not have had access to Toronto beaches.

She added that they may have eventually decided to leave the area when anti-Semitism subsided in Toronto, and they became more established and were able to buy vacation property elsewhere.

"I just want to know who they were and where they went and why they came. And I would like to know if they came because of anti-Semitism in Toronto."

If anyone has any information about the summer colony in Oshawa, please contact Louise Parkes at lparkes@oshawa.ca.

Role of multinational force in Lebanon explored

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

Avi Primor, a respected Israeli diplomat, is a former Israeli ambassador to Germany and the European Union, and a former vice-president of Tel Aviv University. He is currently director of European studies at the interdisciplinary centre of Herzliya University.

Primor, who is close to Israeli Defence Minister Amir Peretz, has, from the beginning of the war with Lebanon, been responsible for evaluating the possibility of deploying an international military force in southern Lebanon.

In an interview from his home in Tel Aviv, Primor discussed the war.

Canadian Jewish News: Could the international community force Israel to accept a ceasefire?

Primor: In the final analysis, the situation is this: no one wants war and everyone wants a ceasefire, but it depends on the conditions. If we're talking about having a ceasefire imposed on us, as Hezbollah, Iran and Syria are asking, in order to preserve the status quo ante, it's out of the question. The situation in southern Lebanon has to change drastically, completely.

At the moment, the Lebanese army is too weak to deploy troops in southern Lebanon. The other possibility is to call on a strong international force capable of fighting the Hezbollah militia and allowing the government in Beirut to impose its authority on all of southern Lebanon. If these conditions were met, then there could be a ceasefire. Meanwhile, Israel must continue to fight Hezbollah, and at the same time, prepare the ground for the deployment of an international force.

CJN: What role does Israel see for this multinational force?

Primor: This would have to be very different from other peace forces that have been sent to the Middle East. It would be an international force modelled on the multinational force that was established in Kosovo, or the one that attacked Iraq in 1991 to liberate Kuwait. It would be a combat force, not a force of observers.

A few days before her first visit to Lebanon and Israel, American Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the same thing – that any international force must have the mandate and the military potential needed to be active rather than passive like the UNIFIL (United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon) soldiers now stationed in southern Lebanon.

CJN: Is this multinational force likely to be in place soon?

Primor: No, it would take several weeks to deploy. The troops have to be organized, with the approval of their governments, once the governments have the approval of their respective parliaments. The military intervention force will also need to have a clear mandate from the United Nations.

Primor: No. This military force would not be under the direct command of the United Nations, but probably under that of NATO. The UN will only give its approval to the military force to give it international legitimacy.

CJN: Do you think the Lebanese government will agree to collaborate with this international intervention force?

Primor: It's in the Lebanese government's best interest to collaborate closely with this multinational force whose principal mandate will be to disarm Hezbollah. Without the help of the political authorities in Beirut, the military force will not be able to accomplish its objectives.

Avi Primor

CJN: What are the main countries that will provide soldiers for this international military force?

Primor: The countries Israel would like to see participate are the ones that have a stake in Lebanon. First of all, France, which has a stake in and an emotional attachment to Lebanon and a military force that can carry out this type of foreign mission. The French military has already proven itself in several countries. But France can't and doesn't want to do this work alone. It will probably receive support from other European military forces, certainly from Germany.

CJN: Is it possible that the presence of German soldiers on Israel's northern border will make Israelis uncomfortable?

Primor: Yes. The majority of Israelis would view with disfavour any deployment of German military forces along the Israeli-Lebanese border. Any accidental confrontation would have dramatic consequences for both Israel and Germany. But if there are German forces, I think they would have to take on two important tasks: helping with logistics, and stationing troops in northern Lebanon along the Syrian border to prevent the passage of Iranian arms coming to Lebanon through Syria.

CJN: Will the high number of Lebanese civilians who have died in IDF bombings of Hezbollah positions in southern Lebanon weaken the support of western governments for Israel?

Primor: I don't share that view. On the contrary, I believe it has been a very long time since Israel has had the benefit of such strong international support, including that of Europe. But that doesn't mean there aren't critics or concerns. The images that are being shown – you see them more than we Israelis do because our television stations protect us from them – are tragic images. You must understand that no sensitive human beings can remain indifferent to these images.

I attended some of the conversations that Condoleezza Rice had with top Israeli politicians during her first stop in Jerusalem. Eighty per cent of these discussions dealt with humanitarian issues in Lebanon. Nevertheless, Rice, like the Bush administration, unconditionally supports the State of Israel. She does not want a ceasefire. On the contrary, she wants Israel to continue to fight Hezbollah. There are even a fair number of Americans who are pushing us to attack Syria.

Yet the American politicians are very aware of the humanitarian crisis in Lebanon. And American public opinion, like public opinion anywhere in the world, is very sensitive to the war images coming from Lebanon. Still, the fact that European public opinion is also very sensitive to these dreadful images doesn't mean that it does not support Israel in her war, which is a just war, a war of defence against the Islamist forces that attacked us.

CJN: In an interview with the newspaper Le Monde (July 27), French President Jacques Chirac said: "In this conflict, the blame is obviously shared." Did that declaration shock Israelis?

Primor: Of course it shocked us. But you must understand that France has always been very sensitive toward Lebanon. The country is, in a way, its precious child. In addition, if France has to be at the forefront in southern Lebanon, it doesn't want to alienate a majority of Lebanese. It wants the popular support of the Lebanese people. France can't support Israel unconditionally because it would have very little credibility with the Lebanese.

I understand France's position. But I can also tell you that in private conversations we have had with French political figures, we have seen that the French position is not so black-and-white.

CJN: In this conflict, English-speaking countries, specifically the United States, Great Britain, Canada and Australia, are supporting Israel, whereas non-anglophone countries, especially in Europe, are criticizing – some vehemently – Israel's entirely legitimate response to the Hezbollah attacks. How do you explain this?

Primor: I don't know how the situation appears in Canada, but the United States and England are both in an all-out war, in Iraq and Afghanistan, against Islamist terrorist forces. These two countries, both directly affected by Islamist terrorism, are more sensitive to Israel's struggle against terrorist organizations. Europe, with the exception of England, is not present on these battlegrounds.

Primor: I think Israel's image will depend a lot on the outcome of this conflict. If this war ends with Hezbollah being significantly weakened, international law being imposed, and the restoration of the legitimacy of the government of Beirut in all of the Lebanese territory, I believe the overall result for Israel will be positive, although there will always be critics.

An existential struggle

ing Israel? The clear answer is no… If Hezbollah stopped attacking Israel, would Israel stop attacking Hezbollah? Just as clearly, the answer is yes."

The Globe continues: "If Lebanon ever managed to do what the United Nations has demanded and took control of the south away from Hezbollah, neutralizing it as a threat to Israel, the Israelis would have no motive for any kind of military action in Lebanon… It simply objects to seeing southern Lebanon turned into a launching pad for attacks on Israeli citizens by a militant group that swears to seek its destruction."

Israel rightly sees its battle with Hezbollah and its sponsor, Iran, as an existential struggle (think what might happen if Hezbollah placed non-conventional warheads on its rockets, which number in the thousands). Some journalists understand Israel's predicament, while others – sometimes within the same news outlet – do not.

Winnipeg man receives Order of Manitoba

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Philanthropist Arnold Frieman says he was honoured to have been inducted into the Order of Manitoba in mid-July, but he is somewhat mystified about who nominated him and why he was selected.

Frieman, who is president of Advance Electronics, has received numerous letters of congratulation, but says there must surely be others who are as deserving of the recognition as he is, if not more so.

On the other hand, if you ask almost any charitable or community organization in Winnipeg, you would doubtless hear that he is a very deserving member of the Order of Manitoba. That's because Frieman never says no to any community endeavour that asks for his support, whether it be a donation in cash, in product or in time. And he himself says it doesn't matter if the organization is Jewish, or non-Jewish or what ethnic group may be involved.

Frieman and Advance Electronics have supported health-care institutions, the performing arts, sporting events and organizations, the United Way and the many Jewish community and Israeli causes.

As an example of his philanthropy, he says he persuaded one of his suppliers to provide the Royal Winnipeg Ballet with a portable sound system worth $85,000 even though the ballet company said it could only afford to pay $40,000.

Frieman paid the $40,000 himself when it turned out that the ballet couldn't even afford that.

In the 1970s and '80s, he was a leader in the fight to free Soviet Jewry.

In that same period, as a member of the board of the Winnipeg Symphony Orchestra, he led a drive to raise funds (about $100,000 as it turned out) to underwrite a Beethoven series that included all of the composer's symphonies and concertos.

As well, he notes that he and his wife, Myra, were the first members of the Jewish community to help Sudanese refugees who have come to Winnipeg in recent years.

"I know what it's like to be hungry and scared," he says.

Frieman's outlook on life was shaped by his experiences during the Holocaust. He was born in Hungary in the early 1930s and lost most of his family in the Holocaust. He spent time in Bergen-Belsen and was a slave labourer before managing to escape.

After the war, the teenage orphan went to Norway where he studied electronics. Because of his experiences in the Holocaust, his initial impulse as a young man was to cut himself off from everything Jewish.

"I was consumed with rage," he says. "I had real issues with the God of the Jews because of what happened to our people in Europe."

While he did go to Israel in 1948 to help fight for the young Jewish state (he was determined not to stand passively by while another Holocaust might be happening, he says), he returned to Norway to continue his studies, after he was discharged. He came to Winnipeg after the Korean War broke out because he feared another world war and wanted to be as far away from conflict as he could get.

After a few years in Winnipeg, he found his way back to the Jewish community in a roundabout way. Through an uncle and aunt in Ireland, he was contacted by a local Jewish couple, Sam and Minnie Heft, who invited him for dinner, befriended him and treated him like a son.

Frieman considers Advance Electronics his greatest legacy and life work. He started the company in 1953 as a two-man service shop. Today, it is the most diversified electronics company in North America.

"Our business ranges from sales of $2 batteries to multi-million-dollar projects through our professional sound division," Frieman says. "We have equipped churches and synagogues, hospitals and educational institutions and the new MTS Centre [the city's two-year-old 15,000-seat hockey arena].

"Our range of products and service is unmatched," he adds. "We go to considerable expense to train our people. We have the finest technical crews available. And we do our own service work.

"The electronics business is a tough business that is getting tougher all the time," Frieman notes. "But Advance Electronics continues to grow because of our unique and comprehensive approach to the market."

Winnipegger helps to restore Polish Jewish cemetery

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Jakob Lewin was born and raised in the eastern Polish town of Losice. Having survived the Holocaust, he and three siblings settled in Winnipeg.

Now Lewin's son, Viktor, is part of a small group of children of former Losicers who are working to restore the Jewish cemetery in Losice and erect a memorial on the site to victims of the Holocaust from the town.

"Although my father died three years ago, perhaps his brothers and sister will live to see the completion of this memorial," Viktor Lewin said.

Lewin became involved in the project six years ago when he came across an Internet posting by Warren Grynberg of London, England, and Yitzhak Eisenberg, who lives in Tel Aviv, both sons of former Losicers.

"Warren and Yitzhak were looking for other descendants of Losice survivors," Lewin said. "Coincidentally, Yitzhak's family and my father's family lived in the same house in Losice."

Lewin, a retired Winnipeg Transit bus driver, and his wife, Cheryl, acquired a copy of the Losice Yizkor Book, which they proceeded to translate. They also helped establish a Losice memorial website (www.zchor.org/losice/losice.htm), which includes the first four chapters of the Yizkor Book. Lewin said the Yizkor Book is also available for viewing on the New York Public Library's website (www.nypl.org), and that a network of Losice survivors and their descendants, spanning six countries, has been established.

The centuries-old Jewish community in Losice numbered about 3,000 – half the town's population– in 1939. The number of Jews had swelled to more than 6,000 by August 1942, when the Nazis deported everyone in the town's ghetto. They also destroyed Losice's major synagogue and uprooted tombstones in its Jewish cemetery.

The gravestones, Lewin said, were taken by Jewish slave labourers to the town's Gestapo headquarters – formerly a dentist's home – where some were used to pave the yard and stacked to make walls. Others were used to fortify a Nazi bunker on the property that still exists.

The cemetery grounds, he added, were later turned into a park with a bandstand.

Lewin first travelled to Losice in August 2002 with his daughter Brianne to see the conditions there for himself.

"I have been back several times since to promote the dedication of our memorial," he said.

"Our major goal through the Losice Cemetery Restoration Project is to reclaim and restore the Jewish cemetery, thereby honouring the memory of our ancestors and the Losicers who were murdered in the Holocaust. We also want to bring attention to the integral role that Jews played in the life of Losice."

The organizers have enlisted the aid of the Poland Jewish Cemeteries Restoration Project, as well as the help of local officials. Funding has also been provided by several Jewish foundations, as well as Losice survivors and their descendants, and other generous individuals.

Winnipeg's Vaad approves new kosher butcher

Old butcher plans to serve clients without a hechsher

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Omnitsky's Kosher Foods, which lost its hechsher last month after years as the city's only remaining kosher butcher, is importing kosher meat from Toronto after Winnipeg's kashrut agency allowed a non-kosher butcher to do the same.

In a letter to customers, Omnitsky's owners Sasha (Sam) and Inna Gekht, Russian immigrants who bought the shop about five years ago, said they have decided to stay in business as a "kosher" butcher independent of Winnipeg's Vaad Ha'ir kashrut agency. Omnitsky's is now bringing in glatt kosher meat products from Shefa Meats in Toronto. The Gekhts report, and informal conversations with customers confirm, that most of their clients will continue to support the business whether or not it has the Vaad's approval.

The Vaad, however, has worked quickly to fill the void left by its removal of Omnitsky's certification. The Vaad-certified Hali Kosher Meats officially opened for business in south Winnipeg on Aug. 15. (Omnitsky's is in north Winnipeg.)

Hali is owned and operated by the Odwak family, who have been in the non-kosher meat business since 1938. The family operated a butcher shop on Main Street in the downtown area for years. In 1997, they moved the business, Norman's Meats, from the decaying downtown core to a new location in south Winnipeg.

For the time being, Hali Kosher Meats and Norman's Meats will operate out of the same location, but the Vaad's kashrut supervisor, Rabbi Mitchell Cohen, said the plan is to have Hali operating out of a separate location within three months. Since there is no more kosher shchitah in Manitoba (as of July 14), Hali will also be bringing in its meat from eastern Canada.

(The city's two shochets, one of whom has heart problems, are both in their early 80s, and the removal of Omnitsky's certification led to their retirement. In an advertisement last week in Winnipeg's Jewish Post and News, the Vaad said the longtime shochets were not nationally certified to work as slaughterers of kosher meat.)

A second south Winnipeg establishment, Desserts Plus, is also selling packaged, frozen Shefa meats and Chai chickens. Desserts Plus used to be a kosher caterer, but lost its certification a few years ago.

In their letter to customers, the Gekhts noted that their store has served Winnipeg's Jewish community and others in Western Canada for more than 84 years since opening in 1922.

"We were the only remaining kosher store west of Toronto selling fresh meat to consumers via a local supplier," they wrote. "During this period we were under the supervision of the Vaad Ha'ir of Winnipeg and fully complied with all of their rules and regulations. Since we purchased the business, we have never received a violation notice.

"The Vaad has informed us that it has embarked on an historic mission to elevate its standards of kashrut so as to better serve the kosher consumer and all of the Vaad's licence holders. As a result of its mission, the Vaad presented to Omnitsky's a 'take it or leave it,' radically different contract from our existing one, which we did not sign. Without any further notice, a representative of the Vaad walked into Omnitsky's, snatched its licence off the wall, removed its supervision and announced such to the community, in both local Jewish and general media."

It had always been the practice at Omnitsky's to kasher meat on request, but not as a matter of course. All the meat in the shop had been slaughtered by the two Vaad shochets, while the shop would complete the kashering process by salting and de-veining the meat. But for the past few years, the Vaad had been urging Omnitsky's, without success, to kasher all of its fresh meat.

In their letter, the Gekhts noted that they had been in discussions with the Vaad for several months.

"We informed the Vaad that we agreed in principle to its desire to elevate its standards but not at any cost," they wrote. "The Vaad presented us with three different contracts. Each time we believed that we had come to an understanding, we received another contract that contained new and more onerous terms. As a result, we have reached an impasse with the Vaad and we are actively searching for other alternatives."

Rabbi Cohen said that Winnipeg's Vaad has about 125 licensees across Western Canada, and he said that almost all of them – except for Omnitsky's and three or four smaller accounts – have accepted the new Vaad standards aimed at elevating Winnipeg Vaad licensees to national standards.

Gravestones excavated

In September 2003, the gravestones were excavated and the process of restoration began. To date, Lewin said, about 1,500 gravestones have been recovered. Many of them have beautiful carvings and others are painted in several colours. One is even inscribed in Ladino, indicating a connection with the Jewish emigration from Spain and Portugal.

The town has been storing the gravestones in a warehouse until the cemetery wall and gate have been rebuilt.

"We are considering a number of architectural designs, including one which would incorporate the gravestones into the structure of the wall," Lewin said. "The bandstand would be used as the base for the erection of a memorial, which would be enclosed by gates."

The restoration project co-ordinators have also established the Lewin-Grynberg Scholarship program in an effort to encourage research into Losice's Jewish history, Lewin said.

Commemoration planned to remember Jews of Lodz

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

The Polish city of Lodz is paying tribute to the prisoners of its Jewish ghetto who were killed in the Holocaust, and its mayor was in Toronto late last month to update local survivors on the project.

"By September 1939, one-third of Lodz was Jewish. Today, there are [almost] no Jews in Lodz – only 350 out of the 870,000 [people]," Jerzy Kropiwnicki, who initiated the multimillion-dollar memorial project after being elected mayor in November 2002, told an audience of ghetto survivors and their families at the Polish Consulate.

The commemoration includes a museum and memorial, as well as a park where ghetto survivors have planted trees. It also featured a 2004 ceremony to mark the 60th anniversary of the liquidation of the Lodz ghetto by the Nazis.

The mayor said that when he started to discuss the idea of a large-scale memorial and commemoration, "people warned that I would be crucified by both the Jews and the Poles."

But that hasn't been the case. "The main achievement was to get the city of Lodz to show its real heart," said Kropiwnicki, a Catholic nationalist and a one-time minister in Poland's national government.

In the end, he added, more people in Lodz volunteered to help than were needed. "We have an open city, with people participating voluntarily," he said.

The project, which is being funded by the city and private donors, began with Kropiwnicki's desire to create a physical memorial to the 90 per cent of Lodz's 200,000 Jewish ghetto prisoners who perished in the Shoah.

During a visit to Toronto in 2003, he told The CJN that he took on the project because "it's decent and the right thing to do," and because he felt it was unfair that there was no monument in Lodz to what had been a large segment of its population.

When the mayor began advocating for the memorial, it so happened that Radegast Train Station, constructed for the purpose of deporting Jews from the Lodz Ghetto to their deaths at the Chelmno nad Nerem and Auschwitz-Birkenau camps, had been unused since the Holocaust and still stood intact.

Now dubbed the Radegast Station Annihilation Monument, the original wooden station building serves as a museum and is part of a complex that took more than two years to complete and cost $1.8 million (US).

Another element of the complex is the Tunnel of the Deported, a structure that people can walk through while reading names engraved on both sides of people deported to the death camps.

"You can just say the number 200,000, but it's just a number," he said. "But if you make people walk along and read the names of all the Jews taken to the death camps, it's much more effective."

Lodz's mayor Jerzy Kropiwnicki

The city of Lodz is currently constructing a cemetery monument inscribed with the names of the death camps. "It is administered by the city museum and has already attracted many visitors, including a lot of young people," Kropiwnicki said.

Another endeavour to honour those imprisoned in the ghetto was conceived by Halina Elczewska, herself a Lodz Ghetto survivor. She proposed that each survivor could plant trees in what is now called the Survivors' Park, close to the ghetto. "The survivors were enthusiastic about something that was not mournful and was a nice place for people to come and spend time."

The mayor also spearheaded the preservation and identification of the actual buildings that comprised the Lodz ghetto, which have remained largely intact since the war.

But when the time came to create a visitors' route in the ghetto with commemorative plaques, he found himself embroiled in controversy.

"We wanted to have the plaques in German, Polish, Hebrew and English, but within one day of posting this information on our website, we had over a thousand people protesting the fact that the plaques would partially be in German," Kropiwnicki said.

"Needless to say, we did not put German on the plaques."

Many grateful Lodz ghetto survivors were in the Toronto audience, with one speaking up to say, "Thank you mayor of Lodz. On behalf of all the survivors, we thank you very much for what you're doing for us."

Max Moneta, 79, who was not in the Lodz ghetto but survived four concentration camps, praised Kropiwnicki's achievements. "We have to appreciate people that are not Jewish who are doing so much for mankind, especially for the Jewish people. There were a lot of Poles that were bad, but we can't judge the whole country," he said.

"Let's hope that our children will say, 'Never again.'"

Meanwhile, in a gesture of friendship to the Jewish people, the city of Lodz has offered to host an all-expenses paid vacation to Lodz for 15 teens from northern Israel to give them a break from the current fighting with Hezbollah, the Jerusalem Post reported .

The idea for the vacation came from Kropiwnicki himself.

The countdown has begun for Olmert

By ANSHEL PFEFFER
Jerusalem Post

Comment

No matter how you analyze UN Security Council Resolution 1701 and the cease-fire that was to take effect at 8 a.m. Monday morning, and even if you accept the government's claim that it's good for Israel, there is no way that it can be good for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

This was the war that was going to establish Olmert as a bona fide leader. For the first couple of weeks, Olmert's popularity ratings soared sky-high as the public expressed its trust in the government's decision to go after Hezbollah. There was a great deal of disappointment and skepticism regarding the Israel Defence Force's (IDF) conduct following the two kidnapping debacles at Kerem Shalom on June 25 and two weeks later at Biranit, but for once, the politicians seemed to be calling the right shots.

The war was supported by a consensus including everyone but the far-right and the far-left. The opposition, apart from the Arab parties, was at its most loyal, and the public, despite the fact that almost a quarter of its members were forced to live in mortal danger, was stoically supporting its leaders.

And the nation didn't waver, even when the war turned out to be a far cry from the quick and elegant air operation that had been envisaged at the start. There was not much of a protest, even when serious questions began to arise about the strategic wisdom directing the campaign. Israelis accepted that they had to make terrible sacrifices, even pay for their leaders' mistakes, for the greater good. That we seemed to have Uncle Sam's full support made the choice even easier.

Now the feeling is that, while the public was prepared to grin and bear it, it was the politicians, especially Olmert, who weren't able to go the extra mile. The cabinet's decision last week to extend the operation by at least two more weeks and make an all-out push for the Litani River, with the casualties that would certainly be part and parcel of it, was supported, according to all the opinion polls, by a wide majority. But the order to halt the troops pending a diplomatic solution in New York was too much for an already overpatient public.

Why did Olmert and his ministers falter at the last minute? Was he unable to withstand international pressure at the critical moment? Was the spectre of lengthening casualty lists too much for him?

The answer to these questions will probably be stuff for historians, but with the ceasefire, many Israelis, including those who sat for a month in stifling bomb shelters, reservists who dropped everything and reported to their units, and families anxiously waiting for a telephone call from their sons in Lebanon and dreaded the knock of the local IDF liaison, are feeling that their sacrifice has been betrayed.

After years of dismissing the United Nations as an ineffectual and anti-Israel organization, how can Israelis believe that of all the possibilities, that organization will be the one to make sure Hezbollah never again threatens our northern towns and villages.

Despite its failings, including the recent ones, there remains only one institution that Israelis firmly trust, and that's the IDF. Now Olmert will go down in history as the prime minister who didn't let the army finish the job.

It doesn't matter whether he was right or not to accept the UN resolution. It might well be the best deal Israel could have gotten in the circumstances, but that's not how the public perceives it. And if anyone thought the generals were going to be loyal to their political masters, all they have to do is read the headlines quoting anonymous senior officers telling the media that the government tied their hands. Everyone knows the generals made a ton of mistakes themselves, without any help from the cabinet, but ultimately, in the popularity sweepstakes, the military beats the politicians hands down, every time.

The ceasefire in the north, if it is implemented at all, also signals the end of the political ceasefire. Politicians on the right and the left are already clamouring for Olmert's head, both wings claiming, from their own point of view, that at least 120 lives have been sacrificed for no real purpose.

Of course that doesn't mean Olmert is about to commit political hara-kiri. Anyone who observed his nine years as mayor of Jerusalem knows he is quite comfortable swatting away public criticism and a hostile press. He will pay no heed to those in the media who began calling for his resignation over the weekend, and he is more than willing to take on his political rivals.

Meanwhile, his coalition seems stable. Leaders of all the parties were partners in the war decisions and they will find it hard to jump ship. It's also difficult to see who can mount a real opposition to Olmert. The left is still powerless, with scant public support. On the right, Benjamin Netanyahu has yet to regain his credibility, almost totally destroyed in the last election.

Netanyahu has acted as an admirable spokesperson for Israel, giving the government his unstinting support throughout the crisis, but his efforts were mainly targeted at the foreign audience and it is yet to be seen whether that will be enough to reduce the deeply held suspicion of him in what was formerly the Likud electoral heartland. He would be wise not to pounce too quickly and open himself to accusations of political opportunism at the expense of our soldiers. Right now, he seems to prefer a wiser, long-range strategy, and if he manages to enlist former chief of general staff Moshe Ya'alon, he will start on the long road to political recovery.

It's hard to see where Olmert goes from here. Save for a dramatic military operation – perhaps a well-deserved attack on the Iranian nuclear project – he has no way to regain his lost credibility.

Few believe that in the current public climate, especially since the settlers' share in the death-toll of the war has been so high, Olmert can go ahead with what was the main plank of his electoral platform.

Painful retreats and peace plans are only possible under popular prime ministers – Menachem Begin with the Egyptian treaty, Yitzhak Rabin at Oslo and Ariel Sharon in his disengagement from Gaza. A discredited prime minister going ahead with such a controversial plan, whatever its merits, is a recipe for chaos and even civil war. And without realignment, the entire justification for Olmert's premiership will have dissolved.

Less than six months since the election and once this war is over, Olmert's sole aim will be to survive as PM. The moment that happens to a prime minister, it's a sure sign that the countdown to his departure has begun.

'We need to stay united'

By EFFI EITAM
Jerusalem Post

Comment

Everyone knows that this ceasefire with Hezbollah doesn't mean much. It is not a true accomplishment. It won't succeed in resolving anything substantial, because it does not disarm Hezbollah and it does not guarantee that our kidnapped soldiers are coming home.

The accomplishments of the ceasefire are truly less impressive than the real accomplishments of this war: We have struck a huge blow to Hezbollah through our armed forces.

From the beginning of the war, we have stood more united behind the government than ever before. We have found support in the eyes of the whole world and we have stood united. This is not, by any means, the time to start fighting among ourselves. We need to concentrate now on two things: strengthening and supporting the IDF and the outlying communities.

On the backs of our great military and great citizens, we need to build our next steps.

On the political front, the time will come to raise grievances, but now is not that time. We can't give Hezbollah and Syria and Iran a victory by going to pieces ourselves. I will ask my friends in the Knesset not to start internal fights. We need to stay united long enough to bring our soldiers back and repair the lives of people in the north.

I have problems with the way things have been handled, but I know that now is not the time to air my grievances. Now is not the time for politicians to start attacking each other to gain more headlines.

Olmert pledges talks for soldiers' return

Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defence Minister Amir Peretz met with the families of kidnapped soldiers Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev on Sunday and broke the news to them that the ceasefire in Lebanon would be implemented without their sons returning home.

Diplomatic officials had promised the families that Israel would insist on Goldwasser and Regev returning home from Lebanon along with the rest of the IDF in any agreement to end the fighting. But Olmert said he had to make a difficult decision to allow the war to end.

"I decided that we shouldn't condition the entire ceasefire on getting the kidnapped soldiers back," Olmert told his cabinet Sunday. "We were not willing to remain in the mud of Lebanon and not allow the people in the north to return to their homes, nor were we willing to give Hezbollah the power to veto the ceasefire by refusing to release the soldiers. As difficult as it was, this is what I told the soldiers' families."

The United Nations ceasefire resolution that passed in cabinet on Sunday calls for the unconditional return of the soldiers, but not in an operative clause. Olmert said it did not matter what kind of clause it was, and the Lebanese government would be held accountable if the soldiers were not released.

The war's political casualties

By AMOTZ ASA-EL
Jerusalem Post

Opinion

Beyond the thousands who were physically hurt on both sides of the Israeli-Lebanese border, the past month's fighting has left three political casualties.

The first is Syria.

The Lebanese government's decision last week to deploy its army in the south confronts the Assad dynasty's thinly veiled violations of Lebanon's sovereignty and historic denial of Lebanon's right for independence.

The deployment has yet to happen, and once it does chances are high it will be far from perfect.

What was presented as Hezbollah's nod of approval for the United Nations' ceasefire resolution was a fig leaf for a major Syrian setback, the second phase of what began the Cedar Revolution last year, when non-Shiite Lebanon finally began disconnecting the umbilical cord Damascus had kept wrapped around Beirut's throat for decades.

The second casualty is Islamism.

The Islamist revolution, as the Hebrew University's Emmanuel Sivan demonstrated in The Crash Within Islam, began not with a Shiite desire to conquer the West, but with a largely Sunni quest to defend Muslims from the temptations of western civilization. However, as Islamism conquered Iran on the one hand, and as Europe failed to digest its Muslim minorities on the other, the movement became torn between those out to conquer the world and those who sought accommodation with it.

Back in the 1990s, after the downfall of communism, Iran tried to export its revolution by looking north and east, to the newly independent, and historically Muslim, republics of central Asia. That effort failed, at least initially, as American, Russian and Turkish influence gave rise to pragmatic, if authoritarian, regimes. It was against that backdrop that Islamist expansionism found an available niche in Lebanon, a country rich with Christian history and European flavour, and, at the same time, poorly guarded by eastern powers and Arab regimes who could be counted on to be fooled by a Lebanese Islamism disguised as an anti-Israeli rather than a pro-Iranian effort.

Now this ploy has been exposed.

Though the extent of its military setback has yet to be gauged, Hezbollah's role as an Iranian proxy out to hijack Lebanon is now universally realized. Hezbollah may survive this military bout and may even retain some of its firepower, but its revolutionary ammunition has been spent.

Paradoxically, this war should also lay to rest another revolution, one that is the very inversion of Islamism, a revolution that is led by Jewish secularists, looks west, and not only shuns its originators' expansion but in fact offers their voluntary shrinkage.

It's called convergence.

Convergence, as Prime Minister Ehud Olmert named his plan for a unilateral withdrawal from most of the West Bank and the relocation of at least 70,000 Israelis, has been presented by him as the natural continuation of disengagement, former prime minister Ariel Sharon's withdrawal last year from Gaza. It isn't.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert

For most of its supporters, disengagement was about the quest to drastically reduce the number of Palestinians under Israeli rule. This is certainly what it was for me, as I led the Jersualem Post's controversial support of the idea, along with my colleagues Bret Stephens and Calev Ben-David. This is also what I explained at the time to Olmert, and this in fact is how Sharon himself put it to me, as I tried, in vain, to explain it to now Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres.

For the majority of Israelis in the middle of the political spectrum, disengagement was Oslo's antidote, a tall partition between us and our Palestinian neighbours. For Olmert, it turned out, disengagement was something else. For him it was an instrument for fashioning himself as a visionary, a statesman who resolved the Arab-Israeli conflict. This, apparently, is what he meant by saying that convergence would turn Israel into "a country that is fun to live in."

Whatever he may have meant by "fun," Olmert would surely agree that seeing the West Bank launch, at Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, the kind of rocket attacks south Lebanon is now delivering to Haifa and the Galilee would be anything but fun. It would be a national disaster, and for him, personally, the end of his career.

Much was said this week about the political autism Olmert displayed in telling a foreign correspondent that the war in Lebanon would boost his convergence plan. One had to wonder, despite his frantic retraction of the statement that evening, how Olmert could not intuitively appreciate, or at least notice, the disproportionate share of West Bank residents among the troops he had sent to fight in Lebanon.

Yet the real problem in the relationship between Olmert's election-campaign plan and the real-life war is that he apparently fails to understand what the latter means for the former, which is that he can now forget about abandoning the West Bank unilaterally.

We, the Middle Israelis who largely voted Kadima and at any rate constituted disengagement's social and political backbone, will not be there to back it, and without us it can't happen. The way we see it, two empirical tests we made, one in Lebanon

Many Israeli Arabs on Hezbollah's side

By URIEL HEILMAN
JTA

NAZARETH, Israel — When Israel began dropping bombs on Beirut in response to Hezbollah's cross-border raid on last month, Nael Saleh said he felt upset.

Watching the news from his home in the Israeli city of Nazareth, Saleh saw the destruction in Lebanon as yet another act of "Israeli aggression."

"The Israeli government declared this war against Lebanon for no reason at all," Saleh said. "The law of the jungle is the law that is used in this era. What is forbidden for other nations is allowed for the State of Israel."

As Israel and Lebanon moved closer to a ceasefire last weekend, Saleh said he opposed any cessation of hostilities that would allow foreign troops to remain in southern Lebanon – even temporarily.

"We are against international forces in southern Lebanon because it is considered as an occupation and it is not for the protection of the Lebanese people, but encouraging the State of Israel not to implement the Geneva Accords and the UN resolutions" on eastern Jerusalem, the West Bank, Gaza Strip and the Golan Heights, he said.

Saleh is an Israeli citizen, but he is also an Arab one of approximately 1.2 million in the country out of a total population of slightly more than seven million.

Though they are Israelis, these Arabs' political leanings generally are closer to those of Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza, and Arabs elsewhere in the Middle East, than to those of Israeli Jews.

So amid the heavy fighting in Lebanon, opinions like Saleh's have become commonplace in places like Nazareth, an Arab city of some 60,000 people in northern Israel – even though Nazareth finds itself in the path of Hezbollah's Katyusha rockets.

When one direct rocket hit on the city killed a pair of Arab brothers, aged 7 and 3, on July 19, a neighbourhood sheik blamed their deaths on Israel.

The brothers' aunt reportedly said she was willing to sacrifice herself for Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah.

These sorts of expressions have prompted some Israeli Jews to label Israeli Arabs as disloyal and untrustworthy, and to implicitly justify the Arabs' second-class treatment by the Israeli government.

"Most Israeli Arabs identify with the enemy," Michael Kleiner, a former Knesset member and head of the Herut Party, told JTA. "In every battle of ours, from soccer to war, they hate us and seek our downfall and identify with the enemy."

Nowhere is Israeli Arab criticism of Israel more evident than among Israel's Arab legislators. Knesset member Azmi Bishara, of the Balad Party, said Israel is "deliberately targeting civilians in Lebanon" as part of the Jewish state's "barbaric thirst for revenge," adding, "Israel is a terrorist state."

Not all Arabs in Israel take such harsh views of their country.

"We have to hang Nasrallah – someone who led to so many deaths on both sides," said Nader Aley, a mechanic in Nazareth whose garage is adorned with an Israeli flag. Aley harshly criticized Israeli Arabs who lambaste the Israeli government at every turn. "They want the security of the state, the money of the state and the benefits of the state, but they don't have a kind word for the state," he said bitterly.

Israeli Arabs have been disproportionately affected by this war, due to their heavy concentration in the conflict zone in northern Israel.

Arabs have suffered more than one-third of the civilian deaths in northern Israel.

"It's a pity about every drop of blood that's been shed on both sides," said Yousef Farouk, a money-changer in Nazareth. "I blame both sides."

Farouk, like many Arabs in Israel, said he holds Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Nasrallah equally culpable – and he doesn't see them as that different.

In a region where every country and ethnic group has a competing narrative, Israeli Arabs tend to account for this war differently than most Israeli Jews.

Many say Israel bears the blame for turning a kidnapping incident into a war, and for starting past wars in the Middle East.

They say peace will come only if Israel withdraws from lands they say it occupies illegally: the Golan Heights, the West Bank and Shebaa Farms. Hezbollah claims Shebaa Farms, a small area occupied by Israel since the 1967 Six Day War, as Lebanon's, but the United Nations says it is part of Syria.

Female reservist killed

The conflict with Hezbollah claimed the life of its first Israeli military servicewoman. Keren Tendler, 26, was a mechanic aboard a CH-53 Sikorsky transport helicopter that Hezbollah shot down over southern Lebanon on Saturday. She was one of a handful of women mobilized for the war as reservists. Four fellow crew members died with her.

Author Grossman loses son

A son of Israeli author David Grossman was among last weekend's military fatalities in Lebanon. Sgt. Uri Grossman, 20, was killed by a Hezbollah rocket attack on his tank in southern Lebanon, the army said Sunday. David Grossman, one of Israel's most well-known left-wing writers, had no immediate comment. Last week, Grossman and fellow authors A.B. Yehoshua and Amos Oz issued a joint letter calling on the Olmert government not to expand its offensive against Hezbollah, but instead to accept a ceasefire offer made by the Lebanese government.

Israel's forests, wildlife devastated by war

By URIEL HEILMAN
JTA

JERUSALEM —Whenever this war with Hezbollah ends and the people of northern Israel finally return to their homes, they'll be going back to more than empty streets, freshly dug grave sites and a beefed-up military presence.

They also will be coming home to a radically altered physical landscape.

Devastated by fires sparked by Katyusha rockets, northern Israel has seen its forests obliterated, its grazing lands laid waste and its wildlife annihilated over the past four weeks.

The country may never look the same, experts say.

"We have very serious damage," said Moshon Gabay, spokesperson for the Israel Nature and National Parks Protection Authority. "In previous wars we did not suffer damage like this. Every Katyusha that falls starts a fire."

Firefighters struggle to save a forest in the Galilee. [Israel photo]

The green hills of the Galilee have turned orange and black, smouldering with the remains of forest fires. The sky, usually bright blue this time of year, is shrouded in thick grey smoke. The large animals and many birds that live in the area have taken flight, and countless numbers of smaller and slower animals have been killed in raging fires that have turned verdant hills to ash.

So far, officials say, more than 7,000 acres of undeveloped land have been destroyed, including about 2,500 acres of woodlands encompassing roughly 700,000 trees. Some of those trees were as old as the State of Israel.

"It's an ecological catastrophe. Animals are dying. Trees are getting burned," said Orit Hadad, an official with the Jewish National Fund in Israel; where it is known as Keren Kayemet L'Yisrael. "Even if every tree is replanted, to bring these forests back to the state they were in will take 50 to 60 years."

That means that most of the survivors of this war will not live to see the landscape return to its prewar state.

Among the hardest-hit areas have been the Naftali forest range near Kiryat Shmona, where more than three-quarters of the forest was obliterated, and the Birya Forest in the western Galilee, near Safed, where more than 600 acres have burned.

Less is known about how the animals that live in this largely rural area have fared. Firefighters have found the remains of many slow-moving animals, such as snakes and turtles, in burned areas. Larger animals that managed to escape likely will suffer from loss of food sources and a sharp reduction in available grazing lands, experts said.

"We're very aware of this problem of disruption of the food chain, even if there is not much we can do," said Michael Weinberger, a JNF forest supervisor in the central Galilee and Golan Heights.

Tourists who return to this area after the war may be startled to find Israel's most popular hiking spots, where waterfalls poured over lush ridges, virtually unrecognizable.

Last week, the fires from Katyushas reached Mount Meron, already scorched, and nearby Nahal Amud, a canyon that runs from the Upper Galilee to the Kinneret Lake and was replete with waterfalls, blooming plant life and animals ranging from gazelles to wild boars.

There is little that Israel's Nature Protection Authority, which maintains the area, can do for these lands at risk. Even after the war ends, the authority will not replant, since the areas are protected reserves or natural areas where the rule of thumb is to let nature take its course.

Even if officials tried, there would be no way to restore the variety of plant life, wildlife and woodlands native to the area.

"It all depends on the rain that will fall," Gabay said. "We let these areas repopulate naturally."

The JNF says it will try to replant as many trees as possible after the fighting is over. Each acre will cost an estimated $5,500 for the first two years to resoil, replant and treat, officials said.

For now, the focus is on putting out the fires.

Because most firefighters in northern Israel are busy trying to extinguish blazes sparked by the Katyusha rockets in urban areas where human lives are at stake, the fight against forest fires has been conducted mostly from the air.

Israel's Interior Ministry has run out of money to pay for the planes, so the JNF is picking up the tab with an emergency fund, for which it has raised nearly $4 million. The money is also going to send kids to summer camps away from rocket attacks, build security roads on the Gaza border and purchase firefighting equipment, including fire trucks, helmets, vests, goggles and a fire retardant the planes are using to douse the fires.

"We are all working 12- to 16-hour days – crews on fire trucks and on the ground," said Paul Ginsburg, JNF's head forester for Israel's northern region. "Forests that have taken 50 years to grow, that saw two generations of foresters, are burning. Everything we do is under the threat of Katyusha attacks. The work is stressful and heartbreaking."

Many more environmental threats loom, experts say. In Haifa, petrochemical plants and refineries vulnerable to Katyusha rockets pose a serious danger to area residents. If such a site is hit, it could send toxic chemicals that would contaminate the entire city.

"The concern is very problematic from an ecological point of view," said Ronit Fischer, director of the Haifa branch of the Society for the Preservation of Nature in Israel. "If something falls there, it will be a very complicated disaster."

The damage to Israel's environment has not been limited to the north.

In the area around the Gaza Strip, along Israel's southern coast, more than 15,000 trees have been destroyed as a result of Palestinian Qassam rocket attacks, according to the JNF. Additionally, the Israeli army has had to alter the natural landscape in many places to accommodate new military bases, lookouts or patrol roads.

The heaviest damage from the war has been where Hezbollah missile crews are aiming their rockets: the Galilee, a mountainous area that was covered by fir and pine trees, with abundant grazing lands and bountiful wildlife. Some Katyushas have fallen in the Golan Heights, but the damage there is small by comparison, and experts say the burned grasslands there should be able to recover by next year.

Shalom Blayer, CEO of the Golan Heights Winery, said the vineyards of northern Israel have been spared so far, though some vineyards abutting the Lebanon border have been declared no-go zones by the military.

Underscoring the vulnerable state of agriculture-based businesses in northern Israel, he said, "This is what I know for now; I can't tell you what will be five minutes from now."

In the distance, another air-raid siren roared to life.

Israel Briefs

IDF tests lifesaving bandage

The Israel Defence Forces is currently trying out, but not yet using in the field, a $100 (US) bandage that has been found to stop hemorrhages in about a minute. U.S. Army experience has shown that the HemCon Bandage can save the lives of many wounded soldiers, a large number of whom die from uncontrolled hemorrhaging before they can be evacuated. The HemCon Bandage contains positively charged molecules of chitosan – a natural polymer derived from the exoskeletons of crab, shrimp and other crustaceans – that attract negatively charged red blood cells. While an ordinary gauze or tourniquet often has little effect in halting spurting wounds, the HemCon bandage triggers an adherent clot that halts the bleeding. "You can have a hole in your heart, and 60 seconds later it's sealed," says Kenton Gregory, who invented the bandage five years ago in Oregon.

Israel can't host games

Israel was barred from holding international soccer games because of the rockets landing in northern Israel. UEFA, the governing body for European soccer, said that all games scheduled to be played in Israel will be played abroad until further notice. The ban means that Maccabi Haifa will have to find an alternate site for its Champions League match Aug. 22 against Liverpool.

Give Lebanese army chance: former security adviser

Israel should consider the deployment of the Lebanese Army in south Lebanon as a way out of the current crisis, former National Security Council head Giora Eiland. Eiland, who served as head of the NSC during the period of disengagement from Gaza, also said that he did not think Israel and the Palestinians could ever reach a political agreement based on a two-state solution inside the current boundaries. "There is no real political solution between Israel and the Palestinians that can be achieved in the foreseeable future, or ever."

Venezuela's Chavez to break ties as verbal war escalates with Israel

By LARRY LUXNER
JTA

WASHINGTON — Last month, shortly after Iran's president again declared that Israel should be wiped off the map and that the Holocaust was mostly Zionist propaganda, Venezuela's president embraced Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in Tehran, calling him a "true friend and brother."

Earlier this month, Hugo Chavez equated Israel's aerial bombardment of Lebanon with Nazi war crimes and recalled his ambassador from Tel Aviv. The next day, Israel's Foreign Ministry responded by calling home its envoy in Caracas, Shlomo Cohen.

Last week, Chavez announced he was about to break diplomatic relations with Israel altogether.

The escalating war of words between Israel and Venezuela, who are longtime trade partners, is causing concern among Venezuela's dwindling Jewish community and in Washington, where U.S. officials view Chavez as Latin America's greatest threat to democracy.

But Bernardo Alvarez, Venezuela's ambassador to the United States, defends his president's actions.

"We don't have any problems with Jews," Alvarez told JTA in an interview last week at the Venezuelan Embassy in Washington. "We have a large Jewish community, and we have had relations with the State of Israel for a long time.

"But Venezuela's position is that we should do something, because this massive bombardment and killing in Lebanon is morally unacceptable," he added. "We are waiting for the international community to put a stop to it."

With some 15,000 Jews, Venezuela is home to one of the largest Jewish communities in Latin America, yet it's the only country to recall its envoy to Israel in order to protest the current fighting.

"We thought we should tell the Israeli government that this is not the way to do things – no matter what happened – and that you cannot resort to such violence," said Alvarez, who never during the interview criticized Hezbollah's continuing rocket and missile attacks on Israeli civilians or its kidnapping and killing of Israeli soldiers. Hezbollah is supplied and financed by Iran, though Alvarez claims Venezuela's anti-Israel position "doesn't have anything to do" with Chavez's trip to Tehran.

"We have a long relationship with Iran that goes back many years, and is based on many common interests, starting with oil," he said.

Alvarez tried to distance Chavez from some of Ahmadinejad's more inflammatory statements, explaining that "we have relationships with many countries around the world, and it doesn't mean we support all of them. Venezuela's position is very clear: we don't agree with that statement made by the president of Iran" calling for Israel's destruction.

He added that Venezuela has good relations with Libya, and now has observer status at the Arab League. "This is part of our strategy of reaching out to the world," he said.

The strategy has infuriated the Bush administration in the United States, which has watched as Chavez travels the globe, embracing not only Ahmadinejad and Libya's Moammar Ghadafi, but also other dictators such as Cuba's Fidel Castro and Alexander Lukashenko of Belarus.

In an interview earlier this month with Al-Jazeera, Chavez said Israel's airstrikes against Hezbollah targets in Lebanon were an "unjustified aggression that is being carried out in the style of Hitler, in a fascist fashion."

Last week, more than 50 Holocaust scholars – including Michael Brown of York University and Gil Troy of McGill University – sent a letter to Chavez condemning his statements. The letter asked him to retract his statements that the Israelis "are doing what Hitler did against the Jews" and that Israel is carrying out "a new Holocaust." "Any comparison between Israel and the Nazis outrageously distorts Israel's actions and trivializes the enormity and nature of the Holocaust," the letter states.

Earlier this year, Chavez was accused of fanning the flames of anti-Semitism after a Christmas eve speech in which he referred to "minorities, descendants of those who crucified Christ" who today control the world's economy. The government later claimed Chavez wasn't referring to Jews.

But the incident heightened concerns about Chavez dating back to a police raid on a Jewish school in Caracas in November 2004. Two high-ranking officials from the World Jewish Congress met with Chavez in late July at the residence of Argentina's president, Nestor Kirchner, to discuss his government's attitude toward Venezuela's Jewish community.

The congress would not give details of the meeting.

The United States remains Venezuela's biggest customer, buying 60 per cent of the country's total exports. The biggest component of the trade is oil. Venezuela's state-owned PDVSA oil monopoly ships 1.2 million barrels of crude a day to U.S. markets and also owns refineries in Louisiana, Texas and the U.S. Virgin Islands. As well, it has 100 per cent ownership of the Citgo gas-station chain.

Bilateral relations took a turn for the worse after Chavez, who had led failed coup attempts against the Venezuelan government in the early 1990s, was elected president in 1998. Washington prevented Israel from selling Venezuela spare parts for its aging F-15 fighter jets.

Thanks partially to record-high oil prices that allow his government to spend lavishly on social programs, Chavez remains wildly popular. Presidential elections are scheduled for Dec. 3, though if the election were held today, polls say, Chavez would win 55 to 60 per cent of the vote, thanks to years of pumping oil revenues into new housing projects, community clinics and road construction.

Meanwhile, Venezuela's political opposition is fractured, with one presidential candidate – prominent Jewish economist Teodoro Petkoff – withdrawing his candidacy earlier this month.

At least one Latin American expert cautions against overreacting to Chavez's incendiary comments.

"Remember that in dealing with Chavez, he's far more bark than bite," said Larry Birns, director of the Washington-based Council on Hemispheric Affairs. "He also has no self-censoring capacity. After he says something, his most seasoned diplomats rush in and engage in damage control."

Give Your Child An Educational Advantage

The Math Masters/Don Valley Academy student understands that the learning process is not a universal approach. The student is an individual, and each individual must apply the most effective and efficient means to reach his or her goal of academic excellence. Personalized and self-paced learning programs cater to the needs and diverse learning styles of each student. Whether enrolled in private tutoring, a credit course, or a support/enrichment program, the instructor will challenge and motivate the student to attain academic success.

Math Masters tutoring programs emphasize effective study skills, time management, organizational skills, motivational techniques, and memory training. The Math Masters student will experience an improvement in grades and long-term retention of learned material, as well as an increase in confidence and self-esteem.

Don Valley Academy is an accredited, ministry-inspected private high school, offering credit courses for students from grades nine to twelve. What makes Don Valley Academy different is the flexibility in the delivery of its courses. Students may join a small class or they can opt for private study, working individually with their teacher. This is most beneficial to the student who needs additional attention, or requires a flexible schedule.

Oraynu - a totally different Jewish School!

"Do you remember what Hebrew school was like when we were kids? Well, this is different. With a capital 'D'"

Children are engaged in their learning at Oraynu. We teach through a variety of meaningful experiential approaches: our students experience the holidays, tzedakah projects and classroom by being involved first hand. Jewish history and culture are taught from a Humanistic perspective focusing on values.

Building a Jewish identity at Oraynu is fun – the children have a good time while experiencing a positive affirmation of their Jewishness. Intermarried families are very welcome.

Oraynu's teachers draw their students out of their shells. The children "do" and "act" in lively, rich participatory discussions, Family Education projects, extra-curricular tzedakah projects, music, crafts and community performances at festivals. Our family holiday celebrations are warm and full of lively fun.

"My kids love it here!"

Imagine a two-year B'nai Mitzvah program where B'nai Mitzvot choose their own projects. You may choose a group or individual ceremony. Torah readings are optional and our unique ceremony is in English.

Ten terrific reasons to give your child a USDS education

United Synagogue Day Schools' new initiatives strengthen our position as a leader in day school education. We are committed to building the best possible programs and facilities in order to continue to provide the best education. Here are ten terrific reasons to give your child a USDS education:

1) Nursery Program – The nursery program at the Bayview campus builds on the success of the Early Years Centre of Excellence. Here young children are introduced to pre-numeracy and literacy skills, an integrated Jewish studies program, arts and crafts, music and creative movement.

2) Yesod/Foundation Program – The goal of the program is to support students in grades 1 and 2 who need to consolidate their first language skills before being introduced to a second language. The customized curriculum builds a strong foundation in general studies and gradually integrates Hebrew language instruction and promotes academic excellence.

3) TeLeM/Adapative Program – This program, beginning in grade 4, is designed to deliver our current Jewish curriculum in English for students who would benefit from learning Jewish studies in their first language. During the Jewish studies portion of the day, subjects are taught, discussed and evaluated in English, with the integration of texts, key vocabulary and terms in Hebrew. Hebrew language arts continues to be delivered in Hebrew.

4) Mechina – This program provides an opportunity for students who have not previously attended Jewish day school to enter at middle school (grades 6-8). They receive Hebrew language instruction and study the Jewish texts in English.

5) Song, Circle & Celebration™ – USDS, in partnership with Beth Tzedec, will sponsor five fun-filled events over the 2006/2007 school year. Preschoolers, parents and grandparents can celebrate their Judaism in a warm nurturing environment. Based around Jewish holidays and themes each program includes music, arts and crafts, snack and playtime activities. Events will take place at both campuses.

6) Math, Literacy and Technology – USDS offers a cutting edge math curriculum called Math Makes Sense and a focus on literacy which is the touchstone of academic success. Technology is integrated into the program across all subject areas allowing for enriched curriculum.

7) Progressive Teaching Strategies – The approach of Differentiated Instruction includes Multiple Intelligences Theory and encompasses the child's interests, learning styles and maturity. Educators develop different approaches to teaching that meet the range of needs in the classroom.

8) Construction at Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Community Campus – As part of its strategic plan for the future, USDS is moving ahead with a strong presence in the north. This new state of the art facility is set to open in Vaughan in 2008.

9) Bathurst Campus Renovation – USDS, in partnership with Beth Tzedec Synagogue, is working on a joint renovation that features a full size gym, green spaces and larger classrooms.

10) Outstanding Professional Educators – USDS educators are committed to the core mission of the school. Their passion for drawing on the moral and educational purpose at the heart of USDS brings about teaching that is second to none. We welcome Ashley Waltman, former principal at North Toronto Collegiate, as the new Bathurst Campus principal. We also welcome Jordana Mednick, USDS alumni and graduate of JTS in New York, as the nursery school teacher at the Bayview Campus.

USDS is part of the Conservative Movement's Solomon Schechter Day School Association. Lucy Cohen, Head of School, is excited about the opportunities that these initiatives provide. They build on the USDS goal of "inspiring excellence in each child."

JCHS Online

Based upon the urgent need for providing quality secondary Jewish education across North America, the Jewish Community High School of Gratz College (JCHS) – the largest supplementary Hebrew High School in North America – is extending its nationally recognized program, introducing:

The Kenneth I. Rothbart Distance Learning Program for Teens

This is the first online distance learning program focused entirely on Jewish adolescent education, and is available for English-speaking students anywhere in the world.

The Fall, 2006 semester will run from September 18, 2006-January 19, 2007; the Spring, 2007 semester will run from January 29, 2007-May 25, 2007.

Our virtual classroom is open 24/7, allowing students to access lectures, assignments and class discussions at any time. A computer, internet connection and a word processor is all that is needed.

Tuition for each class is $375 plus a $50 tech fee. We are waiving the $75 registration fee for this first year only. Please note: There is liberal financial aid available for deserving students, both for those with financial need as well as for students with outstanding academic achievements.

The Gratz College Jewish Community High School is committed to the education and empowerment of Jewish high school students to become socially responsible leaders. The extensive program of formal and informal educational programs involves over 900 teenagers from throughout the Delaware Valley at eleven branch locations. JCHS has been recognized as a nationwide leader in Hebrew High School education. Students translate Jewish values of education, spirituality and service into a meaningful way of life and a powerful Jewish identity.

Gratz College, the first transdenominational Jewish college in the United States, has been teaching Jewish studies and training Jewish professionals for more than a century. Today, the college is a dynamic, vibrant Jewish institution with both on campus and online programs in a full spectrum of disciplines: Jewish Studies, Jewish Communal Service, Jewish Music, Jewish Education, Jewish Early Childhood Education and Jewish Non-Profit Management. We are committed to providing today's students, wherever they live, with access to Jewish learning at the highest levels of excellence.

If you or a teen you know is interested in this program, please contact our Project Coordinator, Julie Sinyakova, at rothbart@gratz.edu or 800-475-4635 ext. 113.

Freemont is a private secondary school where students receive an enriching education in an empowering environment. School life is positive, stressing co-operation and constructive academic guidance with the mandate of realistically preparing students for university. The school day starts at 10:00 a.m. and consists of two longer class periods throughout the day, allowing for real learning - not just hurried "crowd control." With an enrolment of approximately 60 students, there is no back row at Freemont. Our small classes create a nurturing environment for students to take risks - and they do. In fact, they thrive. Freemont offers a focused, innovative learning experience that students will be able to take with them not only into university, but also into life. Freemont Academy's Principal is Sean Meggeson.

Making the Grade after High School: College, University and Beyond

After eleven years as a university teacher and advisor, Judy Libman was convinced that high school and post-secondary students needed more individualized assistance. Soon after winning York University's highest teaching award, she founded Ambitions Educational Consulting, a unique counselling service for students and parents.

For high school students, Libman helps locate suitable college or university programs, and assists clients through the admissions process. She also helps sharpen up their academic skills in preparation for the faster pace of advanced studies.

For students already in college or university, Libman's expertise helps them consider career options, contemplate graduate schools, or navigate the complexity of professional school admissions. Libman's longtime specialty is the medical school admissions process, with an admirable track record of success.

Libman often counsels students who have had learning difficulties or an unexpected academic setback and need help finding their way back to success. As a former university administrator, she knows the ropes and can suggest workable strategies for overcoming institutional barriers.

For students considering US schools, Libman recently participated in the prestigious Harvard Summer Institute on College Admissions.

The Academy For Gifted Children – P.A.C.E.

The Academy for Gifted Children - P.A.C.E. is the only private school in Ontario devoted entirely to intellectually gifted students. The primary goal of P.A.C.E. is to find and enhance the abilities of each child in order to maximize his or her potential for success, while addressing the social and emotional needs of each student. Barbara Rosenberg, Director of P.A.C.E, is a specialist in gifted education. P.A.C.E is based on the premise that gifted children need high-powered learning experiences to challenge their minds and ensure intellectual growth and achievement. P.A.C.E. offers programs from Grade 1 through Grade 12. In addition to the basic skills, P.A.C.E. offers a differentiated education, a curriculum that is built on greater depth and breadth of instruction, and a more complex approach to learning. A fully balanced program, including the fine arts and physical education, complements this specialized academic program. Please call the school for registration information: 905-773-0997.

Kindergarten & Child Care Combined

Upper Canada Child Care Centres is a growing family of 48 child care facilities throughout York Region and North York. In addition to operating quality, non-profit care for children ages 3 months to 12 years, four of our centres also offer specialized programs which combine junior and senior kindergarten education with a full day child care component. These kindergarten programs run five days per week for the full year. The Curriculum emphasizes language, mathematics, science and technology, personal and social development and the arts.

Educators facilitate the child's growth by providing a rich and stimulating program. Balanced to provide learning opportunities in all educational areas, our program offers carefully planned and monitored learning centres. These concrete experiences promote competency and encourage self esteem.

Some of the many advantages to this program include: low child:adult ratios, no need for bussing from school to daycare, daily contact with teachers and no alternate day schedules.

Extended hours, nutritious lunches and snacks are provided at no extra charge. Please see our ad for the Upper Canada Kindergarten Program nearest you. For more information on any Upper Canada program, please call our Head Office at 905-946-1113.

Conservatives, Liberals vie for community support

PM's strong support of democracies comes as no surprise

By MATTHEW COORSH

In only a few short months since the election of Stephen Harper's government, Canada's Jewish community has been afforded a clear view of what the future for Jewish advocacy holds in a Conservative government.

Conservatives

Mr. Harper's comments regarding attacks on Israel by Hezbollah terrorists have come as a surprise to many – particularly those in the Jewish community. But to those who paid attention to Mr. Harper and other Conservative candidates during the run-up to the election, the prime minister's strong support of democracies like Israel comes as no surprise.

Mr. Harper's new-found support among those in the Jewish community comes in stark contrast to his standing in the community only months ago. While campaigning door to door and in synagogues around Toronto during the last campaign, volunteers often heard a barrage of criticism about Harper and the Conservatives. "He's scary," "I don't trust his eyes," "look what the last Conservative government did to us." A familiar chorus of rhetoric ingrained in psyches by years of Liberal smear.

How quickly it seemed Jews sought to forget years of anti-Israel bias by Canada's "natural governing party." With an eye to the past, we were all too eager to forgive Liberal prime minister Mackenzie King's refusal to allow Holocaust refugees into Canada or Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty's cancellation of the fair funding tax credit for non-Catholic religious families. And only two years ago, it was Paul Martin's government who consistently supported or abstained from resolution after resolution in the United Nations unfairly criticizing Israel's right to exist.

What a difference a year makes. While many Jews in Canada once shuddered at the thought of electing a Conservative government, today many have been left scratching their heads. Never before in the history of this nation has the Jewish community and State of Israel been the recipient of such unwavering support.

But if this fact alone is not enough to convince the Jewish community of the wisdom of supporting Conservative candidates, one need only look to the platform of Ontario Leader of the Opposition John Tory and his caucus to realize what Jews stand to gain from electing a Conservative government. Mr. Tory has unequivocally stated that a government under his leadership would reintroduce legislation to solve the obvious education funding unfairness and provide the parents of children attending Jewish day school some sort of remedy.

It's time we opened our eyes to the truth about Conservatism in Canada – it's good for us as Canadians and it's good for us as Jews. I implore you to consider these facts the next time you step into a voting booth in your community.

We support Israel's right to defend itself

By KEITH MARTIN

Over the past several weeks, there has been much attention paid to the way in which the federal government has responded to the crisis in the Middle East and how opposition parties have reacted. In particular, there has been concern by some members in the Jewish community that the Liberal Party has not demonstrated sufficient support for Israel in this current crisis. I feel that as the foreign affairs critic for the Official Opposition, I should clear up this misunderstanding.

Liberals

Three weeks ago, I returned from Geneva where I met with various United Nations organizations and NGOs on this crisis. During those meetings, I was provided with the details on the high civilian casualty rate and destruction of infrastructure. Many officials expressed their concern that due to the hostilities, desperately needed humanitarian assistance and aid workers could not safely enter southern Lebanon. Thousands of civilians were isolated in heavy combat areas, unable to leave and rapidly running out of basic supplies.

Also, Hezbollah's support in Lebanon had risen from 13 per cent at the beginning of the conflict to 89 per cent as of the end of July. At the same time, anti-Israeli sentiment had risen throughout the region. This had increased, not decreased, the security threats to Israel and Jews living in and outside the Middle East.

The Liberal Party believes that the loss of life in communities along the Israel's northern border and in Haifa amongst Israelis, the serious damage done to the economy and infrastructure of Israel, the fact that thousands of Israelis have been living underground for the last five weeks, and the psychological stress Israelis have endured from these unprovoked attacks is deplorable.

Neither I, nor my colleagues in the Liberal Party, view Hezbollah as anything but a foreign-sponsored terrorist organization whose attacks continue to endanger the people of Israel, Lebanon and the region.

So allow me to make our position on this crisis perfectly clear. We support Israel's right to defend itself. We acknowledge that this conflict was started by unprovoked attacks by Hezbollah, supported and aided by the governments of Syria and Iran. We condemn, in the strongest possible terms, the actions of these groups that undermine the safety and stability of the region. We are concerned that in the effort to remove Hezbollah, more than 1,000 Lebanese civilians have been killed (40 per cent of whom were children), and that these deaths, along with the destruction of Lebanon's infrastructure, are being effectively used as a propaganda tool to stimulate anti-Israeli feelings and encourage more people to wage violence against Israel. The long-term implications of this to the security of Jews everywhere cannot be underestimated.

We support Israel's right to engage in military actions against Hezbollah, however, these actions will not remove the threat to Israel. Thus our plan to address this crisis includes the following: implement a ceasefire, even for 48 hours, so that civilians can safely leave northern Israel and southern Lebanon. This would also allow the United Nations and other aid organizations to distribute urgently needed humanitarian aid to these areas.

We support a UN-sponsored force to enter Lebanon as soon as possible to assist the Lebanese government in disarming Hezbollah and destroying its arms caches and to assist the Lebanese government in regaining control over its country.

We support multinational talks to remove Hezbollah's military wing from Lebanon and support a program to strengthen the Lebanese government's ability to provide for the social needs (infrastructure, health care, etc.) in southern Lebanon.

We support the immediate return of the kidnapped Israeli soldiers as well as the release of detained Palestinian parliamentarians.

We support sanctions against Iran and Syria if they continue to work to inflame the region.

We support the resumption of peace talks and the sustainable resolution of the Palestinian/Israeli conflict under the auspices of creating a viable and secure Palestinian country next to a safe, secure Israeli state.

The Liberal Party's proposals for the region are for the long-term safety and security of Israel, Lebanon and the region as a whole. We would not promote nor condone any initiative that violates this principle.

The power of intention

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin Librach

When you wake up in the morning, create a positive intention for yourself such as "I'm going to have the best day ever." And chances are, that is exactly what will happen.

When we create from a place of openness and possibility, the sky is the limit. Look at children. They never think "no" or "I can't do it." They take chances and risks and often will believe they can be and do anything they set their minds to. So can you. As Wayne Dyer, a therapist, author and motivational speaker, says, "Our intention creates our reality" and "what we think creates our life."

If you act as if you have already achieved what you desire, the likelihood of your achieving it is much greater.

I had a client once who was hoping to become a songwriter. I suggested to him that he change the phrase to "I am a songwriter" because if he only hoped to compose songs, he would forever remain in a state of hoping. I invited him to create a clear intention that he would write a song by the end of the week. He became excited by the possibility and the result was phenomenal. He wrote a song called Try, and it was good enough to be a hit single on the radio. He has now written seven songs and is working on a musical.

This is a perfect example of how he set a positive intention for himself and made one of his dreams come true. Athletes do this all the time. They visualize getting that winning goal or scoring that final touchdown. They can practically feel the Olympic medal dangling around their neck or the sensation of lifting the Stanley Cup over their heads while the crowd roars.

Intention, according to Webster's dictionary, determination to act in a certain way. It's your aim, intent, design, objective or goal.

Intention is often married to your desire. As therapist, author and motivational speaker Denis Waitley says, "When you want something, you become motivated to get it."

But where many people fall short is they don't state their intention in a clear and straightforward manner. So instead of saying, "I would love to lose 10 pounds one day," you have to make your goal more concrete. As the teacher, speaker and author Hal Urban says in Life's Greatest Lessons, 20 Things That Matter, "Goals are dreams with deadlines. When we put a target date on our dreams, it's the first step in turning them into goals.

So make your intent or your goal specific and detailed. Paint a picture with words. Give the goal a date, make it visual, narrow it down, brainstorm and find new and creative ways to achieve it and you'll be on your way.

Dyer tells about a conversation he overheard after the events of 9/11 in New York in his book The Power of Intention.

"A grandfather was talking to his grandson, telling him, I have two wolves barking inside of me. The first wolf is filled with anger, hatred, bitterness and mostly revenge. The second wolf inside of me is filled with love, kindness, compassion and mostly forgiveness.'Which wolf do you think will win?' the young boy inquired. The grandfather responded, 'Whichever one I feed.'"

We always have a choice and can choose to feed the second wolf that barks from a position of hope and love for humanity.

So imagine a specific thing that would make you happy. Putting good thoughts out into the world helps attract those very things into your life. What intention do you have for yourself, for your family and for the world?

Articulate your goal clearly by writing it down or saying it out loud to someone you trust. Act as if everything you wish for is already here and then step into the new possibility of what you and your life can become.

And remember, if you create a clear intention for your life to glow, chances are it will do exactly that.

JIAS program connects skilled newcomers to jobs

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Jewish immigrants have been getting a leg up on the Canadian labour market thanks to Jump Start, a program developed by Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, Toronto (JIAS).

The goal of the program, which has been running for about one year – it has a two-year grant from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto – is to connect newcomers to positions that match their training and expertise.

Jump Start co-ordinator Elisa Lepek said that many immigrants coming from such places as Israel, Argentina, the former Soviet Union and eastern Europe are trained in professions that include teaching, law, engineering and administrative services.

"No matter how 'job ready' they are, however, they're reduced to finding survival jobs to support their families, because they can't get their foot in the door," Lepek said.

"They do not have access, in Toronto, to the invaluable social and professional networks naturally developed over one's educational and work life."

These people are motivated to work, she said. "They're not looking for charity. All they want is an opportunity. It's not about favours. It's about adding value to the workplace.

If the potential of newcomers is wasted, "we share in the responsibility for a downward cycle of reliance on communal funds, ensuing poverty, and the inevitable and irreparable disengagement from Jewish communal life," Lepek added.

Jump Start serves its clients by providing a continuum of opportunities such as mentoring, networking, volunteer positions, employment and business partnerships.

"We help them with resumes and cover letters, and if they need more training, we refer them to the proper place. When we refer someone from our program, they are ready to go."

Since Jump Start began, it has placed more than 30 people in jobs related to their fields. "A lawyer who had worked in child welfare in his native Argentina, for example, is now working in a bank because they needed a Spanish speaking person with legal experience."

Another woman who had worked as an administrator in India, Lepek said, had to juggle a few offers before she decided on a position in a charity organization.

"This is how communities are built. The quicker we connect them, the more successful their immigration will be."

Jump Start has created a database of employers, she said, "and we are always ready to make a match. There is a high demand for jobs in engineering, teaching and bookkeeping.

"[Potential employees] are not looking to start at the top. They want a job that matches their capabilities."

There are a number of job initiatives in Toronto for immigrants, Lepek said, "but there is not the same awareness in our own community. [Our ancestors] were all newcomers at one time. We have to put ourselves in their shoes."

For more information, call Lepek at 416-630-6481, ext. 24, or e-mail elepek@jias.org.

Holocaust memorial book recalls a town in what was Germany

History of the Jewish Community of Schneidemuhl: 1641 to the Holocaust*, by Peter Simonstein Cullman, Avotaynu.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Nazis wiped out a succession of Jewish communities during the Holocaust, and the community in Schneidemuhl was one of them.

Peter Simonstein Cullman, a retired Toronto goldsmith whose maternal ancestors dwelled in that town, has written a memorial book about it.

History of the Jewish Community of Schneidemuhl: 1641 to the Holocaust is a model of its kind – thorough and readable. Cullman, who was born in Berlin in 1941 and immigrated to Canada from South Africa in 1977, is not a professional historian. But he has served Schneidemuhl quite well with this account of its rise and fall.

Schneidemuhl, known also as Pila, was part of greater Poland until it passed into Prussian hands in the 18th century. With Nazi Germany's defeat in 1945, Schneidemuhl once again became Polish.

Cullman dedicates the book to the Jewish men, women and children of Schneidemuhl who were murdered by the Nazis. "Their names have been rescued from anonymity," he observes. "They are not forgotten."

Jewish roots in Pila – which is also spelled Pyla – can be traced to the mid-17th century, when Jewish traders settled in that town in western Poland.

As elsewhere in Europe, Jews were subjected to restrictions. They lived in a ghetto, cut off from the rest of the inhabitants by a trench and a tall wooden fence so that their Christian neighbours would not have to endure "the sight and sounds of the Jews." In addition, they could not practise certain professions.

Peter Simonstein Cullman

From 1772 onward, Prussia controlled the region where the town was located. By that juncture, Jews comprised about a third of its population of 1,203.

Having done his research, Cullman comes up with the information that there were 14 small Jewish merchants, 19 butchers, six tailors, five furriers, two barbers, two teachers and an unspecified number of haberdashers, tobacconists, horse traders and an innkeeper during this period.

The Jews of Prussia and of Schneidemuhl were officially emancipated in 1812. But this made no difference to Jews who sought better opportunities abroad. Cullman says that emigration sent waves of Jews to Britain, Australia, South Africa, North America and even Morocco.

Most of the immigrants followed the faith of their parents, he notes, but in some cases there were conversions to Christianity and Islam.

The community tripled in size to 1,039 in the mid-19th century, when Schneidemuhl became an important railway junction. Around this time, its occupational structure changed and the ghetto disappeared.

As Jews were increasingly integrated into mainstream society, they gradually drifted out of trade and into the professions, medicine, law and so on.

After the great fire of 1834, virtually nothing remained of the ghetto, and Jews began moving into areas of town that had been off-limits to them.

But as Cullman notes, anti-Semitism, a phenomenon as old as assimilation itself, was never too far from the surface. He cites a few examples of the rising tide of anti-Semitism.

Be that as it may, Jews were German patriots. Three Jewish men fought in Prussia's 1866 war with Austria, while 15 volunteered for the 1870 Franco-Prussian War. Patriotic fervour swept the community when Germany went to war in 1914, and 15 Jewish soldiers were killed on the battlefields.

Jewish displays of patriotism had no effect whatsoever on anti-Semites. During the 1920s, the Jewish cemetery was repeatedly vandalized, and attempts to find the perpetrators were unsuccessful.

By 1925, Schneidemuhl's overall population was 37,551, of whom roughly 10 per cent were Jewish.

The rise of Nazism was keenly felt. Adolf Hitler's Nazi party picked up 10 per cent of the vote in the September 1930 election, but 53 per cent in the November 1932 election.

In the last democratic election in March 1933, following Hitler's accession to power, the Nazis increased their share of the vote to a whopping 56 per cent.

The atmosphere in Schneidemuhl turned menacing as Jewish schoolchildren were forced to put up with racial slurs.

Kristallnacht, in November 1938, was a watershed for the town's Jews.

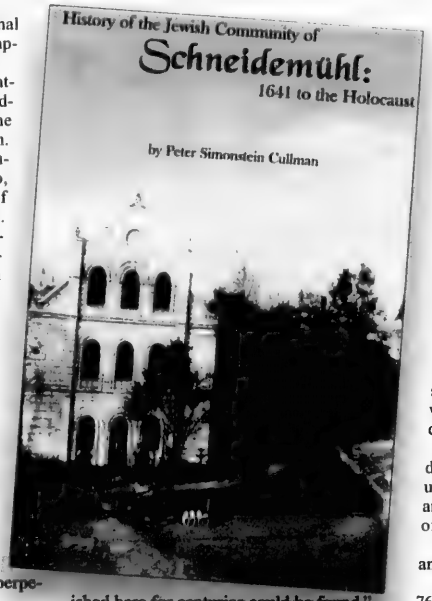
The venerable synagogue, which had long been a national historic monument, was torched by Nazi hooligans.

Cullman, whose family survived due to false papers identifying them as Christians, estimates that at least 10 Jewish-owned businesses were destroyed during that rampage.

In the aftermath of Kristallnacht, Nazi vandals desecrated headstones in the Jewish cemetery. Some were used for building purposes, in a travesty reminiscent of the Middle Ages.

Germany had indeed sunk low.

On a visit to Pila in 1998, Cullman visited what remained of the cemetery. "One could see but an expanse of lawn," he writes. "Not one gravestone with even the faintest inscription could be found here, where four generations of the Simonstein family lay buried. No evidence that a Jewish community had existed and flourished here for centuries could be found."



As the Nazis tightened their grip on Germany and inflicted yet more pain and suffering on the Jewish community, Jews were forced to live in specially designated houses and wear the dreaded yellow star.

Faced with a hopeless situation, the Jewish burghers of the town emigrated when they could, finding a haven in such far-flung countries as the United States, Canada, Britain, Brazil, Argentina and Shanghai in China.

Jews in mixed marriages were protected, at least for a while.

Jews who remained in Schneidemuhl and the surrounding region by 1941 paid the ultimate penalty and were deported eastward to the Lodz ghetto, the Riga ghetto, Theresienstadt, Auschwitz and Treblinka.

Schneidemuhl was hit by Soviet air strikes beginning in the spring of 1944, when the Red Army was within striking distance of the town.

On Jan. 22, 1945, the authorities ordered the civilian population to be evacuated. But the order was never carried out and civilians bore the brunt of the Soviet offensive.

A month later, the Red Army stormed and captured the town.

Today, in Pila, a green and modern city of 76,000, the traces of its German past are gone, as are its German and Jewish minorities.

But in the pages of this book, the memory of those days lives on.

Soap opera character's revelation matches actor's personal journey

By RACHEL SILVERMAN
JTA

If you didn't catch The Young and the Restless recently, here's what you missed: Neil blew off Dru for dinner. Nick and Sharon continued struggling with their divorce. And Brad Carlton came out as Jewish.

That's right, Carlton – a mainstay of the long-running soap series – told viewers that his real name is George Kaplan and that his mother, Rebecca Kaplan, is a concentration camp survivor.

Carlton's declaration of his lineage illustrates the degree to which the Holocaust, and Judaism, have infiltrated pop culture. Though a soap opera may seem an unlikely genre for a lesson in Jewish history, Young and Restless head writer Lynn Latham says it's just the opposite.

The veteran soap writer pointed out in an e-mail exchange with JTA that "storytellers are storytellers no matter what form we work in ... and we are always looking for compelling stories to tell.

"I believe the most riveting ones reflect real life," she added.

Don Diamont, who has played Carlton on the show for two decades, couldn't agree more.

"You can't tell the Holocaust story too many times, however the Holocaust story is told," he said.

The plotline has particular significance for Diamont: He too is Jewish, and like his character, Diamont – whose real last name is Feinberg – came to his Judaism later in life.

Raised the "ultimate secular Jew," Diamont knew little of religion growing up. His family had a Christmas tree but no Chanukah celebrations.

Diamont has vivid childhood memories of being taunted for being Jewish.

"I remember going home and saying to my dad, 'What's a kike?' He said, 'It's the worst thing you can call a Jew.'"

The bullying led Diamont into fights at school, and gave rise to conflicting emotions.

"When you have no sense of who you are, any sense of where you come from, who your people are, and then you're attacked in that sort of way, there's a natural sense of pride," he said. "But the other half is ashamed because you're being made fun of, you're being abused."

Diamont took his mother's maiden name when he began acting and modeling. He remembers an agent recommending that he choose a more "rhythmical" name.

"Donald Feinberg is kind of like a neon sign," he said. "Its flashing 'Jew, Jew, Jew.'"

But Diamont's attitude toward Judaism began to change as an adult when his older brother, who had been diagnosed with a brain tumour, began to study for his bar mitzvah. Diamont decided to study too.

His brother died before becoming a Bar Mitzvah, but Diamont underwent the rite of passage at age 29.

Diamont's sense of Judaism also was heightened by his father's death. As he grew sick, his father expressed regret at not having given his children a Jewish education, Diamont said.

"Particularly with my dad's passing, I really felt a longing just to get more in touch and ask who I am and where I come from," Diamont said. "I'm not suddenly going to become the most religious, observant Jew in the world, but as I started getting older, the pride started to overcome the shame."

Now Diamont goes to synagogue on High Holidays, celebrates Chanukah and has seen two sons bar mitzvahed, with another one scheduled for 2008.

After playing the same character for 20 years, Diamont said it was a pleasant surprise to find out that the character's true identity was not unlike his own.

"I open a script one day and I knew that they were delving into the character's history, but I had no idea my real name was George Kaplan," he said. "I called upstairs to the head writer and I said, 'So, I'm Jewish?' And she said, 'Are you OK with that?' I said, 'Well, yeah, I am Jewish.'"

Diamont is glad his character, a chiselled Navy SEAL, doesn't conform to stereotypes.

"It's not usually Rambo, not Tom Cruise in Mission Impossible, not Colin Farrell in Miami Vice. He's not the guy taking names and kicking ass," Diamont said. "This guy is not Woody Allen."

Carlton set the record straight about his identity in an episode two weeks ago.

When World War II broke out, Carlton's mother, Rebecca Kaplan, was stripped of her possessions and sent to a concentration camp. But because she spoke German and knew a great deal about fine art, Rebecca was put to work cataloguing stolen Jewish artwork.

"It's what kept her from the gas chamber," Carlton explains in the episode.

In typical soap opera form, the intrigue doesn't end there. Killers are chasing the family because Rebecca Kaplan was partly responsible, after the war's end, for the return of lucrative goods stolen by Nazis.

Will the Nazi bounty hunters have their revenge? Will Brad Carlton's friends accept his new identity? Will the Holocaust continue to play a role in what has been the No. 1 daytime drama for 16 years?

Tune in to find out.

91-year-old pianist headlines KlezKanada

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Irving Fields, who created a sensation in 1959 when he blended popular Yiddish tunes with Latin rhythms on the album Bagels and Bongos, is performing at this year's KlezKanada festival in the Laurentians.

At 91, the cocktail pianist and jazz-fusion pioneer is still at it after 75 years of tickling the ivories in nightclubs, hotels, cruise ships, resorts and casinos, as well as entertaining at private parties for the likes of Barbara Walters, Donald Trump and, recently, U.S. First Lady Laura Bush.

The New York native is enjoying something of a revival: he's a regular on CBS' Late Show with David Letterman, and last year, Reboot Stereophonic, a nonprofit company dedicated to preserving Jewish music classics rereleased Bagels and Bongos.

Another legendary entertainer, Theodore Bikel, best known for his starring role in Fiddler on the Roof, is also coming to KlezKanada, which is being held Aug. 20 to 27 at Camp B'nai Brith. He'll give a cabaret-style concert Aug. 22. Bikel gave a benefit concert in Montreal in May for the KlezKanada youth scholarship fund.

Yet KlezKanada founder and director Hy Goldman said his goal is not to keep the old-timers in gigs, but to encourage a new generation of artists of klezmer and other Jewish music.

So he's thrilled that Matt Haimovitz, considered one of the best young cellists in the world and known for his dedication to bringing classical music to unconventional venues, has joined the KlezKanada faculty. Haimovitz, 35, a McGill University music professor, dropped by KlezKanada's 10th edition last year and was impressed with how the event brings together the interpreters and lovers of Jewish music of all kinds in a totally laid-back environment, as well as its mission to transmit this culture to the young.

The 11th edition of KlezKanada has its largest registration ever – a capacity 480 participants.

"We have literally had to turn away people," Goldman said. "On principle, we will not expand beyond the dining hall's capacity. There is only one sitting for meals, in order to create a sense of community.

That total includes a record 125 young people attending on scholarships from throughout North America, as well as from Europe, Israel, and a dozen from Russia, Ukraine, Belarus and Estonia.

KlezKanada always bills itself as a celebration, so it's appropriate that the festival will be the site of a bat mitzvah this year, that of 12-year-old Ilana Dresdner, daughter of faculty member Sruli Dresdner.

As his creation (with the late Sara Rosenfeld) enters its second decade, Goldman is looking to expand KlezKanada's influence beyond a week in the country each year for like-minded people.

"Our first 10 years were about growth. This year, we are beginning a new phase of outreach and education, concentrating on youth, going to schools and making appearances at other festivals," Goldman said.

After seeking out musically adept youngsters for years, he's now turning his sights on the next generation of potential audience members for Jewish music.

"What we are accomplishing – and quite successfully, from the feedback we have received – is turning our kids on to their Jewishness, in some cases more so than those who are enrolled in the Jewish day school system," Goldman stressed. "That isn't meant as an indictment of the school system. It's simply to show that music has been a most effective way of igniting joy for learning in our youth."

Goldman wants KlezKanada, and the joyous revival and rejuvenation of Jewish culture after the Holocaust that it represents, to be more visible in the Jewish community and the wider public.

On Saturday evening, Aug. 19, Montrealer Josh "So-Called" Dolgin, a former KlezKanada youth scholar who has established a musical career fusing klezmer with hip hop, will headline a klezmer concert at Le National, a downtown Montreal club, as a lead-up to the opening of KlezKanada the following day. Other musicians and bands associated with KlezKanada will also perform, including Michael Alpert, Beyond the Pale and Shtreiml.

On Sunday, Aug. 20, prior to heading for the Laurentians, many of KlezKanada's faculty will spend the afternoon performing at the Ottawa Folk Festival. This will coincide with the release of the first "best of KlezKanada" CD. The festival has set up its own recording label and plans to issue a series of CDs.

Goldman admits that KlezKanada was run by the "seat of our pants" for its first decade, but is now on a more stable footing thanks to what has become an international board of directors made up of people with the management skills needed for what has become a huge undertaking.

Montrealer making doc about Klimt's Adele

By HINDI DIAMOND
Special to The CJN

One month before her 90th birthday, on Jan. 15, 2006, Maria Altmann received the news that a Viennese court ordered Austria to give up all claims to five paintings and return them to their rightful owners, Altmann and her family.

The decision was the culmination of Altmann's 60-year legal battle with the country of her birth to reclaim ownership of five paintings of her aunt, Adele Bloch-Bauer, by Austrian artist Gustav Klimt. The decision gave hope to those Holocaust survivors still seeking restitution for artwork that the Nazis stole from them.

Ronald Lauder, the son of cosmetics magnate Estee Lauder and the former U.S. ambassador to Austria, purchased the luminescent, gold-flecked painting of Adele for $135 million, a figure that broke all records for a painting sold to an individual. It's estimated that four other Klimt masterpieces that have been returned to the family are worth $100 million (US). It was announced last week that they will be auctioned by Christie's this fall.

Klimt's painting of Adele Bloch-Bauer.

Hot on the heels of this scenario comes word that the extraordinary saga of the portrait that travelled across the ocean almost a century after it was painted in 1907 has spawned a documentary, Portrait of Adele, being made by Montreal filmmaker Ilana Linden.

"The minute I read several articles about this story, it just blew me away. I felt in my heart I had to get involved," Linden said.

"I knew I had to make this into a documentary. It was just mind-blowing that after six decades of wrangling and denial, Altmann, this feisty 90-year-old niece of Adele Bloch-Bauer… finally emerged victorious in her battle for restitution of five Klimt paintings stolen by the Nazis."

The Israeli-born Linden, whose parents are Holocaust survivors, immigrated to Canada in 1961. She has more than 35 years of experience in the arts as a producer and a director, and is the director of her own theatre company. Her Montreal production of David Mamet's play Oleanna was critically acclaimed.

Linden and Robert Krakow, the executive producer of Portrait of Adele, travelled to California, Vienna and other locations to film the documentary. Krakow is a Boca Raton lawyer, writer and producer.

"We didn't just want to tell the story of the restitution of the illegally held art. We go back in history to portray turn-of-the-century Vienna and re-enact scenes of Adele's life – an extraordinary woman whose artistic salon was a magnet for the elite in the music and art world," Linden said. Adele died in 1925, at the age of 43, long before the Nazis came to power.

"Our documentary covers the harrowing fate that befell the Bloch-Bauer family, and how their entire world was wiped off the map by Hitler," Linden said.

"There is a chilling connection the family had with the Nazis. Not only did they steal the magnificent antiques and paintings but they also took over the sugar factory the family owned, which became the Nazi railroad headquarters.

"Adele's husband, Ferdinand Bloch, a Czech sugar magnate, also owned a castle outside of Prague, where artist Klimt frequently visited. This castle became the headquarters of Nazi chief Reindhardt Heydrich, where he planned the Final Solution of the Jews. "Ironic, isn't it?" Linden observed.

The filmmaker said she is amazed at how humble Altmann is. Altmann has said to Linden: "Oh, what I have suffered is nothing, but for me, it [what happened to the portrait] symbolized what happened to all the Jews. When you look at the painting of Adele, it is immortal. It will outlive the last survivors of the Holocaust, and continue to have its mesmerizing effect on all who see it."

When the portrait was featured in a Klimt exhibition organized by the Nazis in Vienna in 1943, Adele's identity was not revealed. Instead, a sign that read "Lady in Gold" was used to identify the painting. The Lady in Gold's identity has now been restored. And she takes her place in history as a remarkable Jewish woman who will be remembered through the ages.

Performer sees herself as an ambassador for Jewish culture

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

Performer, vocal soloist, dancer, lyricist, composer, cantorial singer – Aviva Chernick does it all, and often with a Jewish twist.

Chernick, 35, thinks the most important aspect of her work is the responsibility that comes along with being an artist.

"As artist, we have a great responsibility to speak our own truths so others can see themselves expressed in our art," she said.

She grapples with the question of "what's my responsibility" even today. "There's a dichotomy: I'm an artist, a Jewish woman. How do I balance Jewish life and my desire to remain active and accessible to mainstream culture?

"We all are ambassadors for our own culture," she continued. "I want to show others what's so beautiful about what we do [as Jews]."

Born in London, Ont., Chernick, who is now based in Toronto, grew up in a traditional Conservative Jewish home, participated in USY and attended Camp Ramah. At 18, she decided she wanted to study theatre and went to York University, which was the only place offering an undergraduate program in directing at the time.

Aviva Chernick

"I studied playwriting and design, and I did a lot of acting," said Chernick, 35, describing her four years at York as "good, great, crazy."

As an undergraduate, Chernick also participated in Steven Spielberg's Shoah Foundation project, interviewing Canadian Holocaust survivors about their lives, something she describes as a "massive experience."

The Holocaust quickly became the focus of Chernick's theatre projects at university, and she staged an adaptation of Euripides' The Trojan Women that was set in the Warsaw ghetto.

Chernick said that as a Jew growing up in a traditional, warm Jewish home that was very pro-Israel and placed an emphasis on Jewish scholarship, she always felt a tension with the outside world.

"I have to be very truthful with my relationship to Judaism. Real Jewish practice is about grappling," she said.

"What Judaism needs from me is the willingness to engage in a process which is not black and white, to work with tradition and halachah and my own desires and dreams."

Incorporating those desires with tradition has resulted in many fruitful creative endeavours for Chernick, one of them being Shabbat Fusion, a service held at Holy Blossom Temple on the last Friday of every month. Shabbat Fusion, which starts up again in October, combines dance and music from around the Jewish world with a traditional Kabbalat Shabbat service.

> 'I want to show others what's so beautiful about what we do'

Chernick is currently training as a cantorial soloist with Cantor Benjamin Maissner at Holy Blossom, where she will be leading auxiliary services on Yom Kippur, but she also makes time for solo gigs and to perform as part of a larger band.

Audiences will be able to check out that band, Shakshuka, for free at Ashkenaz 2006: A Festival of New Jewish Culture on Sunday, Sept. 3. The group plays traditional Jewish tunes taken from eclectic sources and gives them a contemporary sound. Chernick sings in Hebrew and Ladino while the band plays arrangements that incorporate jazz, rock and Latin influences, yet are respectful of the original traditions. For instance, one song has a Latin groove, but its lyrics contain the first line of the Song of Songs.

Another new project that allows Chernick to integrate performance and service is The Huppah Project, in which she sings the traditional wedding repertoire set to original, contemporary musical arrangements after the bedecken. Then, she and her bandmates perform a wedding ceremony under a chupah to their own acoustic world music arrangements.

"We want a textured, rich atmosphere woven together by the music that is not invasive," Chernick said.

Chernick, who officiated at her first wedding ceremony last week, is always searching for something that allows her to serve the Jewish community.

"I want to be of service and be satisfied and be giving," she said.

Chernick will be performing with Shakshuka Sept. 3 at 4:30 p.m. on the Toronto Star Stage at Harbourfront Centre, and with The Huppah Project later the same day at 8:30 p.m. at Harbourfront Centre's Marilyn Brewer Community Space. Both performances are free. For more information about Chernick, Shakshuka or The Huppah Project, visit www.avivachernick.com.

Jewish groups court Mel Gibson

By TOM TUGEND
JTA

LOS ANGELES — The race is on to become the first Jewish group to land an appearance by Mel Gibson.

First out of the starting block was Rabbi David Baron of the Temple of the Arts in Beverly Hills.

Rabbi Baron alluded to the actor's profuse apologies for his anti-Semitic slurs, then invited the director of The Passion of the Christ to speak at Yom Kippur services, "in order that you might directly express to the Jewish community your remorse."

Rabbi Baron added, "In our faith, we are commanded to forgive when the offending party takes the necessary steps and offers an apology from the heart."

Many congregants of the Temple of the Arts work in the entertainment industry. Many synagogue members expressed strong objections to the invitation.

Rabbi Baron responded with another open letter, pointing out that he had invited Gibson not to speak but to deliver a public apology.

Some have suggested that the publicity accruing to the first Jewish institution sponsoring Gibson's mea culpa might have played a role in the temple's invitation.

Attempts to reach Rabbi Baron, on vacation in Europe, were unsuccessful.

Two other Jewish organizations have publicly invited Gibson. The Museum of Jewish Heritage – A Living Memorial to the Holocaust in New York City also extended an invitation to Gibson.

Asserting that he took Gibson's previous apology "very seriously," director David Marwell added in his letter that "In making a genuine commitment to learn about the Jewish people, you could find no more appropriate place to start your journey than our museum."

Marwell closed by saying, "We look forward to the opportunity of participating in your journey of understanding."

Marwell rejected the suggestion that the museum was seeking publicity. "We are in the business of educating people every day," he said.

If Gibson visits the museum he obviously would attract press attention, Marwell acknowledged, but said such a visit "should not be a media circus."

A third invitation has come from the "1939 Club," a Los Angeles-based association of Holocaust survivors and their children.

William Elperin, the group's president, said in a phone interview that he had invited Gibson "not to talk to us, but to listen to us. He has done enough talking.

"Who better to educate Gibson about the ultimate effects of anti-Semitism than those who experienced the Holocaust?" Elperin added.

He said he was not looking for publicity and originally had extended the invitation in a private letter. When there was no response, he was advised to go public as the best way to catch the actor's attention.

Of all Jewish organizations, none has better entree to Hollywood's A-list than the Simon Wiesenthal Center, which has assiduously cultivated the brightest stars and directors.

However, centre founder Rabbi Marvin Hier said "under no circumstances" would he invite Gibson. "He can't be cured by a press release or be koshered by a 24-hour 'conversion.'"

Among the hundreds of invitations Gibson has received to speak or confess his sins, "lots" are from Jewish groups, said his publicist, Veronica Pinto.

MICHAEL REDHILL PLAY GOODNESS OPENS AT EDINBURGH FESTIVAL

Volcano, a Toronto experimental theatre company headed by Ross Manson, was keen on taking Goodness, a play by local novelist-playwright Michael Redhill, to the Edinburgh Fringe Festival until a funding crisis temporarily put the plans on hold. A call for funds in June resulted in what Manson described as "the most encouraging, and actually quite moving, outpouring of support I have ever had as a theatre artist."

Hannah Moscovitch

The sum of $24,000 was raised in less than two months thanks to large contributions from the Tarragon Theatre (where Goodness ran for six sold-out weeks last fall) and from the John McKellar Charitable Foundation, the Zukerman Family Foundation, the David Glenn Fountain Foundation, Bluma Appel and nearly 200 others.

Manson described the play as "an articulate and powerful examination of genocide and the morality of storytelling," and filmmaker Atom Egoyan said it "deserves as wide an audience as possible." It opens this week for a two-week run at the Traverse Theatre in Edinburgh.

* * *

Jewish Films at Bloor Cinema: Shlomo Schwartzberg, former programming director for the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, presents Let's Talk!, an occasional series of films with Jewish content at the Bloor Cinema.

The series begins with the sweeping French-Israeli epic Live and Become (2005) by director Radu Mihaileanu. The film, in French, Hebrew and Amharic with subtitles, chronicles the tumultuous life of a young Ethiopian boy who poses as a Jew, is rescued by Israel during Operation Moses, and tries to discover who he is and where he really belongs as he grows up in Israel.

Bloor Cinema, Tuesday, Aug. 22, 9 p.m. $4 for seniors; $5 for Bloor members; $8 for non-members. www.bloorcinema.com

Names in the News: Hannah Moscovitch, a graduate of the National Theatre School of Canada in Montreal, wrote the play Essay, which debuted to critical acclaim at last year's SummerWorks Theatre Festival and was voted best new play by Now magazine.

Essay probes the highly charged realm of gender and classroom politics and is "a play with a true conflict, with no absolute right or wrong in it," Moscovitch told Now magazine last year. "I hope the audience will find themselves switching allegiance throughout the piece."

A new production of Essay, directed by Michael Rubenfeld, is to be staged as part of the Groundswell Festival of New Works by Women. The performance features Richard Greenblatt, Claire Jenkins and Jordan Pettle at the Tapestry/Nightwood Studio, Distillery District, Cannery Building, Studio 315. Monday, Aug. 21, 8 p.m.

Moscovitch, meanwhile, wrote another stage vehicle, The Russian Play, which was included in this year's SummerWorks Festival.

* * *

Yiddish at Roy Thompson Hall: Gloria Valentine sings in Yiddish at the Canadian Organization of Senior Artists and Performers' 18th annual Seniors Jubilee at Roy Thompson Hall. Valentine opens the show recreating the character Nonna, a role she played in the long-running hit Tony and Tina's Wedding at Second City. Aug. 14 to 18

Three Casting Calls

• Markham Little Theatre seeks actors for two one-act plays it intends to stage in late November. The plays are The Real Inspector Hound by Tom Stoppard and A Night in the Theatre by Lawrence Casler. Auditions take place Aug. 23 and 24, 7:30 p.m. Contact director Kerry Harman, 905-294-8466; e-mail kerry.harman@ sympatico.ca

• Encore Productions seeks cast members for Sylvia, a comedy by A. R. Gurney to be directed by Mark Tingle. Audition dates are Aug. 28 and 29, 7:30 to 10:30 p.m. Rehearsals start in September and performances are Oct. 26 to Nov. 5 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, Studio Theatre. Auditions by appointment only. Non-paying. 416-733-0558

• Teatron Jewish Theatre seeks actors for upcoming productions of The Last Night of Ballyhoo by Alfred Uhry and The God of Isaac by James Sherman, both to be produced in the Leah Posluns Theatre in January and March respectively. Auditions take place Sept. 12 and 14. Please send your resumé and photo by e-mail to teatron@sympatico.ca or by mail to Ari Weisberg, artistic director, Teatron Theatre, 41 Warwick Ave., Toronto M6C 1T7.

At the Galleries

• Judy Singer, who gives drawing and painting classes in her North York studio, opens her garden for an art show and sale of paintings by her talented students. Singer's new paintings will be displayed in her studio. 224 Armour Blvd. Thursday, Aug. 17, 5 to 9 p.m. Rain date Thursday, Aug. 24. www.judysinger.ca

• In Search of Vashti, an audio art installation outside the Royal Ontario Museum, explores the disappearance of Queen Vashti from the Book of Esther. The 45-minute audio piece, which runs continuously day and night, was created by local artist Evan Tapper with assistance from a Toronto Jewish Visual Arts Award from the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. You'll find the headphones on the stairs outside the ROM's former main entrance on Queen's Park Crescent. Until mid-September. www.insearchofvashti.net

Correction

The story "Richler parodied other writers, new book contends" (CJN, Aug. 3) should have indicated that the book's author now lives in Kitchener, Ont. Another city was named in the story. The CJN regrets the error.

IDF holds line along Litani River

Late Sunday night, officials indicated that the navy and the air force will not lift the siege on Lebanon until the Lebanese government takes action to control access into the country, as required by the UN's ceasefire resolution.

But the question of what Israel will do if Syria sends convoys of weapons into Lebanon to help rehabilitate Hezbollah remains unanswered.

"This is a serious question that requires a decision by the diplomatic echelon," the officer said. "We need to prevent Hezbollah from rebuilding itself. The question is how far are we willing to go to do that."

So with Israeli soldiers holding the line along the Litani River, the IDF is now waiting for the 15,000 UN observers to deploy in southern Lebanon, together with the Lebanese army, as stipulated under the ceasefire agreement.

Deputy IDF chief of staff Maj.-Gen. Moshe Kaplinsky told the Post Sunday that the multinational force was expected to begin deploying in the next few days, and there was a chance that the IDF would begin withdrawing from Lebanon by the end of the week.

"It could take just a few days for the multinational force to arrive," Kaplinsky said from a bunker in Northern Command headquarters in Safed. "Until then, we will continue to defend ourselves and we will engage anyone we believe is endangering our soldiers."

Not all the details of how the ceasefire will be enforced have been worked out, and late Sunday night, senior IDF officers, led by the head of the IDF planning directorate, Maj.-Gen. Haki Harel, met with top UN officials to iron out the issues left open.

Despite the public uproar over the late launching of the massive ground offensive up to the Litani River on Friday, the officer said the operation created the right conditions for the ceasefire agreement.

"We would not have succeeded in creating an Israel-favourable agreement without the operation launched on Friday," Defence Minister Amir Peretz said during a tour of the Northern Command.

The IDF displays some of the weaponry captured from Hezbollah. [Israel Sun photos]

The day after the bloodiest day of battle claimed the lives of 24 IDF soldiers, fighting continued on Sunday with clashes in Randumia, Abu-Turin, Tel-Nahes and Ayta al-Shab that left five soldiers dead. More than 15 Hezbollah gunmen were killed in the clashes.

In the central Lebanese village of Abu-Tawil, one officer and three reservists were killed when Hezbollah guerrillas fired anti-tank missiles into their infantry force. Another three soldiers were seriously wounded.

Further south, in the village of Tel-Nahes, an officer was killed and another seriously wounded when an anti-tank missile scored a direct hit on their tank. Later in the day, a number of soldiers were wounded when a Katyusha landed in an Israeli village near Kiryat Shmona. Another 21 soldiers were lightly wounded during the day.

cannot argue they are not bound to comply with the Geneva Conventions. The ICRC might be the only organization to save these captives' lives.

"The ICRC should energize its unique global position and international credibility and prestige to use its best efforts to ensure that these kidnapped Israeli soldiers are being treated under international standards of care," he wrote.

In the United States, meanwhile, Hastings, a seven-term Democratic congressman who represents the Fort Lauderdale and West Palm Beach areas of Florida, wrote to American Red Cross chief executive Jack McGuire asking that "pressure" be applied to the ICRC to visit the kidnapped Israeli soldiers.

"As an organization of enormous credibility and status, the ICRC can use their moral authority to verify the health and safety of the Israeli soldiers," Hastings stated in his letter to McGuire.

"Neither Hamas nor Hezbollah have given any indication as to whether these soldiers are injured or even alive. Recently, Israel received concrete evidence that Hezbollah plans to transfer the two soldiers to Iran. Wherever these captives are being harboured, international law demands they are held under humanitarian conditions," Hastings wrote.

Fred Turner, Hastings' chief of staff, said the American Red Cross has indicated it has already "made inquiries" with the ICRC.

Grafstein said he and Hastings were engaged in "parallel" efforts, but both lawmakers have a relationship that stemmed from their work at the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe, a regional security organization with 56 participating states. Grafstein said Hastings is an old friend, a longtime supporter of Israel and a civil rights activist.

Turner said Hastings took on the soldiers' case because "he is first and foremost... interested in human rights, civil rights, both domestically and abroad."

Grafstein said seeking the freedom of captives is part of Jewish tradition and is repeated daily in the Shmoneh Esrei prayer. "To my mind, the key thing we have to do here comes from the Torah and from davening and is part of the Ismelis' strategy," he said.

Former 'shlob' sculpts his prize-winning physique

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

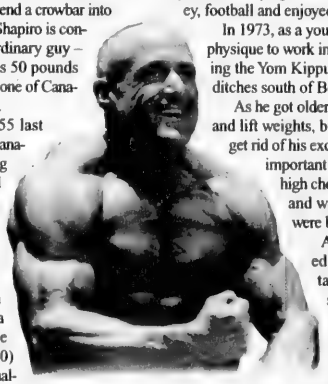
It's true that if Jerry Shapiro wrapped his 11-megaton biceps around your head, he could probably crack it open like a walnut. Not to mention he's probably strong enough to stop a single-seat airplane from taking off and bend a crowbar into a horseshoe. But as far as Shapiro is concerned, he's still just an ordinary guy – a former "shlob" who was 50 pounds overweight but who is now one of Canada's premier bodybuilders.

Shapiro, who turned 55 last week, has been named to Canada's national bodybuilding team and has been tagged to travel to Sicily in November to compete in the International Federation of Bodybuilders (IFBB) World Championships. Shapiro earned the spot on the national team with a first-place finish in the grandmaster class (over 50) at a world championship qualifier at York University.



Jerry Shapiro

Two months before, at the 2006 Ontario National Qualifier in Ajax, Ont., he finished first in the grand-master category for athletes over 50 and second overall in the light heavyweight division. Last year, he was named grandmaster champion of the Ontario Physique Association provincial qualifier, grand-master fourth- place winner at the 2005 Fitness and Model Expo (FAME) World Championships and third-place winner at the 2004 MuscleMania Canadian Nationals.

Not bad for a guy who four years ago was just looking for a way to shed some weight and feel better about himself.

Shapiro believes his story can be inspirational for the masses of overweight ex-athletes and potato-chip connoisseurs who may work out at the gym but who still can't seem to get into really good shape.

As he tells his story, he was always interested in sports and keeping fit. He played high school hockey, football and enjoyed the martial arts.

In 1973, as a young man, he put his sturdy physique to work in Israel as a volunteer during the Yom Kippur War, digging irrigation ditches south of Be'er Sheva.

As he got older he continued to work out and lift weights, but he seemed he couldn't get rid of his excess pounds. What's more, important health indicators, such as high cholesterol, high blood sugar and worrisome sodium levels, were beginning to concern him.

Around that time, he decided to see a nutritionist, Natalie Bean-Sole, who designed a plan for him that cut out some of the less healthy foods and got him eating right. No more coffee and high-fat muffins for breakfast. He started to reduce the high-carb, high- sugar and high-fat foods and replace them with healthier choices.

As his diet changed and his workouts started to provide results – all without any chemical boosts – guys in the gym suggested his physique was cut out for bodybuilding.

It was, he said, "like buying a house in the Manor, stripping off the linoleum and finding hardwood floors below."

Three years ago, his main trainer at Strictly Fitness, a gym on Dufferin Street in Toronto, encouraged him to enter bodybuilding events. One of his buddies, a guy in his early 50s, was already involved in the sport, and being competitive by nature, Shapiro decided to give it a try. He ramped up his training regimen with two-a-day cardio and weightlifting workouts. Coupled with some yoga, he'd put in 18 to 20 hours per week in advance of competitions. His wife, Este, was behind him all the way.

The results speaks for themselves.

As he sculpted his body to his new specifications, he found that not only did he look better but he felt way better, too. Today, he feels like a different person and has a level of confidence he never possessed before.

His new healthy lifestyle was also expressed in his business, as he developed, with the help of researchers at the University of Guelph, a protein-packed energy snack called Power Pop. "I make a product and I can look in a buyer's eye and I walk the walk," he said.

Though he walks in the footsteps of famed bodybuilders like Arnold "the Guvernator" Schwarzenegger, Shapiro tries to retain his natural humility

"I don't see myself as the guy they tell me I am," he said. "I see myself as a guy in good shape. When I get on stage, I wonder if I'm good enough… but when I hit the stage, it's show time."

He's just an ordinary guy and he believes his experience could be a lesson for others. "This should be an inspiration for everybody out there," he said. "I'm not special. It's determination, focus, that's the real message."

International basketball games moved out of Israel

By SHARON SOLOMON
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — The escalation of the military conflict in the north has now taken its toll on Israeli basketball.

FIBA, world basketball's governing body, has notified the Israel Basketball Association (IBA) that no international games will be allowed to be played in Israel until further notice.

Israel's European championship qualification opener against Bosnia on Aug. 31 is now likely to be played on foreign soil.

The national team is also scheduled to host Portugal and Macedonia in September.

FIBA board president George Vasilakopoulos dispatched an official letter to IBA chair Yirmi Olmert with the news, setting Aug. 18 as a deadline to find an alternative venue for the games.

However, the decision is not set in stone. Since learning of the possible ban, Maccabi Tel Aviv president Shimon Mizrahi has been successful in lobbying for postponement of a final ruling.

FIBA will hold another meeting on Aug. 19 to re-evaluate the situation and announce its final decision.

"We will not give up easily," Olmert said about the development. "I am encouraged by the fact that the decision is not final.

"We will explore other options, but I will invite FIBA security officials to show them that Tel Aviv is safe."

Last week, Israel returned from a successful pre-season tournament in Lithuania that saw Israeli head coach Tzvika Sherf's team beat Russia and Senegal but lose to Lithuania.

The FIBA ruling follows a similar decision by European soccer's governing body UEFA, which said all Israeli clubs involved in European competition must play their home games outside of Israel.

The devil that I know

Sandie Benitah
20Something

When I graduated from university, I was one of the lucky ones – or so I thought.

Just a month after graduating, I landed a job at a successful community paper, writing news and other fun stuff.

But just as I remember exactly how happy I was to land a job, I also remember exactly how humiliated I felt each time my new boss singled me out in front of my colleagues, yelling at the top of his lungs about my incompetence.

Though I was young, I was smart enough to know that his complete disrespect for anyone below him was not personal. The rumour was that he had made everyone at the office cry at least once.

Nonetheless, each time, I let him put me down, and not once did I stand up for myself. To this day, I'm still haunted by my cowardice.

Maybe that's why I couldn't put down The Devil Wears Prada by fellow twentysomething Lauren Weisberger. And by the time I got to the part where she tells off her own devilish boss, I was ready to pick up my own phone and let off some steam.

I never did tell him off, but this time, it's not because I was a coward. It's because I'm struggling to understand what makes a good boss.

Does a good leader intimidate everyone into frightful obedience? Does a respected boss act cool and laid back so everyone will think he's the greatest?

What about a boss who's in her 20s?

I've been lucky. Since that first "devil," I've had some great bosses and mentors who have assured me that I'm not a complete loss and who have even trusted me to be a "boss" myself.

But being a so-called team leader when you're in your 20s comes with its own set of challenges, and to be honest, I'm still figuring out all the rules.

For example, is it OK to consider your co-workers friends instead of just colleagues? I thought it was, until one of them came to work an hour late without calling and without an explanation.

"Babe," I said, talking in the language of my generation. "You gotta call me next time, all right?"

"Ya, sure," she said offhandedly.

That's when I realized my friends would be the first to give me that respect.

"I'm serious. Don't let it happen again," I said, turning tough.

But in the end, I was still the only one who felt bad.

As a twentysomething "boss" (my gosh, the term makes me so uncomfortable, I can't handle not putting it in quotation marks) of other twentysomethings, I find myself constantly at odds with how I'm feeling.

I don't want them to think that I think I'm better than anyone else, but at the same time, I need them to respect my decisions.

I want to spend hours gossiping about the latest Laguna Beach episode, but at the same time, I need to be tough about meeting deadlines.

I want to be a friend, but instead all I can afford to be is fair.

Not only do I have to be fair to my own bosses and carry out my responsibilities, I want to be fair to my co-workers and treat them with the respect and kindness that I never got from my own first boss.

But most of all, I have to be fair to myself.

I never want to be some twentysomething's "devil," but that doesn't mean I can't let go of that fear long enough to have respect for my own accomplishments.

At some point, I have to accept that being proud of myself and having self-confidence will not make me a mean person. It will just make me a real boss, without the quotation marks.

RAINBOW SLAW

1 1/2 cup mayonnaise
2 tblsp. apple cider vinegar
1 tblsp. sugar
1 tblsp. pure maple syrup
1 small green cabbage, thinly sliced (about 8 cups)
1 small red cabbage, thinly sliced (about 8 cups)
2 medium carrots, peeled, grated
1 small sweet potato peeled, grated
1 large unpeeled Fuji apple, cored, grated
1 large unpeeled Golden Delicious apple, cored, grated
1 medium green pepper, cored, seeded, thinly sliced
3 green onions, finely chopped
paprika

Whisk mayonnaise, apple cider vinegar, sugar, and maple syrup in small bowl. Place green cabbage and next 7 ingredients in very large bowl. Pour dressing over; toss. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Cover and chill 1 hour.

Chill. Sprinkle with paprika and serve.

Use the large-holed grating disk and the thin slicing disk of the food processor for easier preparation.

About Life

Dear Ella,

Five years ago, I met a wonderful caring man and we got married. When we met, I was living on my own and had a promising career. I continued working after I got married, even though my husband is a very successful entrepreneur. Eventually, I got pregnant and we decided together that I would be a stay-at-home mom.

I now have two small children and things have really changed around here.

I feel like a slave, not an equal partner in this marriage. I cater to Stan's every need and make sure everyone is well taken care of. What do I get in return? Not a whole lot. Sure, I have a wonderful home, food on the table and a reliable car, but my emotional needs are not being met at all. Nothing is appreciated, everything is expected. I am unhappy and need to fix this.

It's My Life, Too

Dear It's My Life, Too

In the past you were rewarded for a job well done with a weekly paycheque. Those days are over, but the rewarding feelings and appreciation should not be. Stay-at-home moms make all kinds of sacrifices and often put their own needs last. You are not doing anyone any good if you are unhappy.

You and Stan have been able to discuss important matters in the past, so why not try again? Often the pressures of daily routines don't allow a lot of time for discussion, but this is too important to put on the back burner.

You need a plan. You must make the necessary arrangements that will allow you to have the time and privacy to have this talk. Don't wait. This issue will not disappear on its own. You are doing your job well – perhaps too well. You have made it very easy for everyone to live their lives comfortably, and you've put your own needs last.

You need to rein everyone, including the kids, back in. Start by delegating chores. If you can afford it, hire help to allow you more personal time.

Don't underestimate what your contentment brings to your family. My guess is that Stan would be hurt if he knew how you have been hiding your unhappiness. I'm sure that was not his intention.

A revolution of peace!

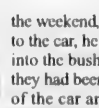
By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER



Hatred needs to be capsized. We Jews know hatred, and although there is little of it here in Toronto in the guise of anti-Semitism, we are constantly reminded of it, most recently because of the current heartbreaking war against Hezbollah (if a war can be anything but).

But hatred does not find its way into our village alone. It is like a swarm of nasty bees and buzzes around everywhere.

Last week, I was at my friend's cottage on Christian Island, a native reserve with areas for summer homes.

There we schmoozed with a police officer who told us how difficult it is to police the island, especially when weekend campers arrive – "often with guns, machetes and knives expecting" violent Indians to attack them when the wolf has howled.

He related that once in the course of his duties he pulled over when he saw a car full of guys, who were about to pitch a tent for the weekend, swigging beer. As he got closer to the car, he saw the driver toss a beer bottle into the bushes. When he asked the driver if they had been drinking, six of them piled out of the car and one responded: "I guess an Indian would know the clinking sound of a bottle well."

There he was, a native police officer and father, on an island settled and owned by Canadian aboriginals; a place where they should be protected from the racism they are so often recipients of, being disrespected, and the target of hatred. Damn, what audacity.

It seems while this World War 2½ erupts, our thirst for hatred and violence is growing like never before.

Recently, I read the New York Times Book Review section. Book after book reviewed dealt with horrendous subjects. One of the books reviewed, Scot Smith's novel The Ruins, is about a man who discovers a crashed plane containing $4. 4 million and then promptly hacks "to death a remarkable number of people." The Times also reviewed a book called Execution, by Geoffrey Abbott, about the ways and means of institutionalized killing over the ages including chapters on the gas chamber, the guillotine, the electric chair, burning at the stake, firing squad and hanging – the A to Z list of favourite means of taking someone's life.

Our fascination with the macabre side of life has increased incrementally over the last few years. Even our newsmakers are showing more graphic footage of wars they cover, pretending in some strange way they are important to watch. In fact, an aerial view of the destruction of a truck carrying human beings is a breach of victims' privacy and comparable to slowing down to see an accident by the side of the road.

The Dali Lama said hatred among nations would stop when we learn to love one another other as individuals. Indeed, I believe this is the truth and therefore call for a revolution of goodness to be launched throughout the world to convince villagers and city folk alike that the time to end war, hatred, destruction and the mass murder of hundreds of millions is now.

Start such a movement to learn, teach and model about the potential for our world to achieve peace. Learn the peaceful aspects of the Torah, if that is your blueprint for peace, and translate it into action. Christians, Muslims, atheists and everyone else – learn about peace, too.

Today, Jews are dying once again in Israel (rest in peace). Last century, six million Jews and hundreds of millions of others were butchered and still we miraculously kept our planet from being destroyed. This century, we may not be as lucky.

Shalom is the world. We need so badly to let it grow.

Israelis, Arabs and Iranians meet at AIDS conference

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

An "unprecedented and quite unusual" meeting between HIV/AIDS researchers from Beirut, Tehran, Bethlehem, Khartoum and, yes, Jerusalem took place last week at the 16th International AIDS Conference in Toronto.

The Aug. 15 meeting was organized by the Global Network of Researchers on HIV/AIDS in the Middle East and North Africa [GNRMENA], an apolitical scientific forum that shares ideas and research projects and facilitates scholarly exchange about HIV/AIDS in the region.

In Toronto, researchers from the United States, Israel and Muslim countries "were sitting in the same room and talking as scientists to each other," said Dr. Inon Schenker, senior HIV/AIDS prevention specialist at Hebrew University and founding chair of the Jerusalem AIDS Project NGO. .

"The fact that this could have happened in an open, scientific forum – no closed doors, no police guarding – is a very important message by itself. While we often talk about HIV as a virus that discriminates, I think that HIV can also be a bridge – a bridge to peace, a bridge to collaboration," he said.

"This is more than just a slogan, because we know that the HIV virus really crosses all borders and boundaries, and in a small region like ours, it's crucial for us to work together."

But last week's meeting was more than just talk: it also set in motion co-operation between Palestinian and Israeli HIV researchers, as well as others in the Middle East.

"We have agreed to start mapping the research initiatives in each country and finding threads of collaboration," Schenker told The CJN.

Toronto's Orthodox community:
Is it becoming too religiously right-wing?

By FRANCES KRAFT and LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporters

Special Report
Part 1 of a series

A group of people, some friends and some strangers, are sitting having dinner at a wedding. Two couples meet in a restaurant. Casual acquaintances stop to chat on the street.

Three different scenes.

What's common to all of them is the subject of conversation: what is going on in Toronto's Orthodox community.

While Jewish geography, communal gossip, Israel and shul politics are common topics of discussion among Jews, this time the focus is unusual, as is the frustration that often accompanies it.

Concern about what many consider to be a drastic move to the far right of religious observance by some in the Orthodox world is nothing new. What seems to have stirred the pot, though, is what has come to be referred to as the "Slifkin affair," a brouhaha that erupted this past winter when the British-born, Israel-based Rabbi Natan Slifkin – also known as the "Zoo Rabbi" for his educational Torah-related zoo tours – visited Toronto to speak at a program sponsored by Torah in Motion, a Modern Orthodox educational organization that hosts lectures and programs.

Three of his books – including Mysterious Creatures and The Camel, the Hare and the Hyrax, which include ideas about the origins of the universe that are anathema to his fellow haredim – were banned by Israeli and North American haredi rabbis in early 2005.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Relief Funds Pledged

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Stephen Harper last week announced the creation of a $25-million Lebanon relief fund. The two-year fund will be used to respond to requests by the Red Cross, the United Nations and other multilateral and non-governmental organizations to address stabilization and reconstruction in Lebanon after the recent ceasefire between Hezbollah and Israel. "As a leader on the international stage, Canada has a responsibility to help those suffering from circumstances beyond their control," Harper said.

Street Named for Poet

MONTREAL — Cote St. Luc is naming a street after the late poet Irving Layton, who died last January in the Montreal suburb at a seniors home where he had been living for five years. Cote St. Luc city council voted to name a new residential street Irving Layton Avenue. Layton lived in Cote St. Luc in the 1950s and early '60s and raised his two eldest children there. "Given the links which [Layton] has to our city, his international renown and his recent passing, naming the new street after him is a mark of respect he rightfully deserves," Mayor Anthony Housefather said.

WORLD

Hate Incidents Rise

LONDON — Anti-Semitic incidents in Britain escalated in July due to hostilities in the Middle East, a survey found. The Community Security Trust, which monitors security in Britain's Jewish community, recorded twice as many incidents in July 2006 as in July 2005. The trust also warned that the risk of a terror attack against the British Jewish community was heightened, though no specific threats have been linked to the recent foiled terror plot at major London airports.

Cartoon Exhibit Open

TEHRAN — An exhibit of cartoons on the Holocaust opened last week in Iran. Earlier this year, Iran began a competition that solicited the works in reaction to the controversy over the publication of cartoons in a Danish newspaper about the Islamic prophet Muhammad. One of the more than 200 cartoons displayed shows the Statue of Liberty holding a book on the Holocaust in one hand and giving a Nazi-style salute in the other, Associated Press reported.

Man Sues Auschwitz Museum Over Suitcase

PARIS — The son of a man killed at Auschwitz took legal action against the Auschwitz Museum in order to obtain his father's suitcase, the Sunday Times of London reported.

Michel Levi-Leleu, a retired French engineer, spotted his father's suitcase at an exhibition in Paris on the Holocaust that contained items borrowed from Poland's state-run Auschwitz Museum. His father's name and prisoner number are on the suitcase and the Auschwitz Museum agrees that they were his, the Times reported.

Levi-Leleu sued the museum for the return of the suitcase, which he saw for the last time in 1943 when he was three and his father was deported. The museum is seeking to keep the suitcase in an effort to preserve the memory of the Holocaust, according to a museum statement made in court papers cited by the Times. The Times said the case is the first in which a relative has demanded something back from the museum, and officials there worry it could set a precedent.

Not-Guilty Plea

SEATTLE — The alleged shooter in the Seattle Jewish federation shooting pleaded not guilty Aug. 15. Naveed Haq is being held on nine counts, including aggravated homicide and malicious harassment – under Washington state's hate crimes statute – in the July 28 attack that left one woman dead and five injured. At an Aug. 10 hearing, he surprised the court and his lawyer when he tried to enter a guilty plea, but he apparently changed his mind afterward. Prosecutors have 30 days to decide whether Haq will face the death penalty.

Fund Established

SEATTLE — A fund has been set up to assist victims of the July 28 shooting at Seattle's Jewish federation. Donors can visit www.jewishinseattle.org to contribute. The fund is being run by the Jewish Community Federation of San Francisco. Some of the money may go to renovations and security costs for the federation's offices. The attack left one woman dead and five people injured.

Oz Shul Hit Again

SYDNEY — A shul on the outskirts of Sydney, Australia, was attacked for the second time in two weeks. On Aug. 15, vandals hurled concrete blocks at the doors of the Parramatta Synagogue. Two weeks earlier, a group of men whom witnesses described as being of Middle Eastern appearance threw blocks at the compound, damaging its rabbi's two cars and his residence, located next to the synagogue. The shul is isolated from the major part of Sydney's Jewish community and is close to areas with a high Muslim population.

Duceppe defends his participation in anti-Israel rally

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Bloc Québécois leader Gilles Duceppe says he has no regrets about the prominent role he played in the huge Aug. 6 rally in Montreal that had a strong anti-Israel tone and attracted Hezbollah sympathizers.

In an interview with The CJN, Duceppe rejected criticism that he either showed poor judgment because it could have been foreseen how the event would unfold, or that he deliberately took part in the rally for political gain, knowing that Israel's bombardment of Lebanon had little support among Quebecers.

The latest to criticize Duceppe is Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker, who told the media in a teleconference on Aug. 15 that he was "shocked and disappointed" by Duceppe's participation in what he considers "a blatantly anti-Israel march… by a highly incited crowd."

He released a letter to Duceppe dated Aug. 8 in which he writes: "I find it inconceivable that the leader of a respected, major Canadian political party lends support and associates his name, and that of his party, to a demonstration that glorifies a terror organization that has been outlawed in Canada and that shamelessly seeks the elimination of the state of Israel, a liberal democratic country, sharing the values held by Canada, and ranking among Canada's close friends."

Baker accuses Duceppe of causing "irreparable damage" in appearing to "proffer encouragement" to Hezbollah, that sends "a very sad and foreboding message" to Israel and communities, "both Jewish and Christian," in Canada and the world who support the struggle against terrorism.

Meanwhile, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) sent Duceppe a more conciliatory letter expressing appreciation for his denunciation of Hezbollah's terrorism and call for its disarmament, while expressing serious concern about the rally and the "toxic" atmosphere in Quebec since.

Duceppe said the Bloc does not support Hezbollah and it is inaccurate to characterize the rally or its organizers as pro-Hezbollah. He regrets that some "radicals" were in the rally, but said he does not believe he can be held responsible for these individuals' actions.

He said his and his party's position, since the beginning of the conflict, has been that Israel had the right to fight back against Hezbollah, but its retaliation exceeded the "criteria of proportionality" set out in international law, and there should be an immediate ceasefire by both sides.

He believes Hezbollah is a terrorist organization and should be disarmed, according to United National resolutions, which he said he was booed for saying at the rally.

He said that marching in the rally allowed him to express his regret over the toll suffered by Lebanese and Israeli civilians.

Duceppe said he would not describe the rally as "anti-Israel" either, because "criticizing a decision or a policy of the Israeli government of Israel does not mean we are anti-Israel, just like we can criticize the Canadian government without being anti-Canadian." He also noted that there were Jews in the rally.

Duceppe was a speaker at the press conference announcing the rally, and the Bloc Québécois is listed among the 60 organizations endorsing the event and a statement issued placing most of the blame for the conflict on Israel, as are the Parti Québécois, the Liberal Party of Canada and Quebec Solidaire, a left-wing sovereigntist party launched in February that has no elected members.

PQ leader Andre Boisclair and Montreal-area Liberal MP Denis Coderre also marched with Boisclair in the rally. (The CJN requested an interview with Coderre last week, but he had not responded by deadline.)

The rally, Duceppe said, was a democratic exercise, something denied to people in countries like Syria and Iran."Because there were some radicals is not to say there should have been no demonstration."

The Hezbollah flags, photos of Hezbollah leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah and other identifiable images were a very small part of the event, he said, adding that he wished they hadn't been there. A small contingent of anti-Zionist Neturei Karta haredim was also there.

Israel is an angry place

From the editor's desk

Some three days after the ceasefire with Hezbollah went into effect, Israel – where this column was written – was an angry place.

Everybody was angry at somebody, although they were not all angry at the same people.

Most people were upset with the outcome of the war and with the way decisions were made by the top echelons of the political establishment. Some people are angry at the top echelons of the defence establishment, too.

According to three different polls conducted two days after the ceasefire, the approval ratings of both Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defence Minister Amir Peretz have sunk to their lowest levels since the two men took office more than three months ago.

Some two-thirds of Israelis believe that Olmert did not handle the war properly. The figure of disapproval is even higher for Peretz.

"Why go to war if you don't intend to fight?" one headline in The Jerusalem Post sneered. "Ehud Olmert never had any military aims – or, more accurately, he never had any intention of doing what was necessary to achieve them," the author of the accompanying article wrote.

On the subject of who actually won the war, debate raged, literally, in homes, coffee shops, hotel lobbies and sidewalk parkettes; on the opinion pages of every newspaper and on the very noisy, seemingly ubiquitous talk shows among friends, acquaintances, family, self-styled experts and highly-credentialed but feisty television studio guests, .

In Ha'aretz, the double headline over a column by Reuven Pedatzur was: "How we suffered a knockout: In Damascus, Tehran and Cairo, people looked on in astonishment as the Israel Defence Forces failed to bring a tiny guerrilla group to its knees."

The term "knockout" however was popular among headline writers on both sides of the issue.

For example, it also appeared in a commentary on the outcome of the war written by Uri Dromi in the Jerusalem Post. "No knockout blow for Israel: It was still a victory on points."

While there was no consensus on the ultimate political, military or geo-strategic effects of the conflict, there was indeed collective agreement that mistakes were made during the actual waging of the war.

The most egregious example was the story told by some reservists of the lack of proper provisions for them after they entered the battle. Some soldiers found themselves fighting for more than 24 hours straight without food or water.

But as many people told The CJN, the single most unsettling aspect of the war – even more unsettling than initial setbacks during the Yom Kippur War – was that rockets and missiles rained down on Israeli cities, towns, villages and homes for more than a month. On the last day of fighting, some 250 Katyushas were launched against Israel. And had the fighting continued, thousands more would have fallen still.

The finger-pointing of blame began in earnest even before the ceasefire, as various editorialists and other pundits had already called for the resignations of the prime minister, the defence minister and the chief of staff.

Forty-eight hours after the ceasefire, Peretz appointed a five-person panel of prominent individuals, headed by former chief of staff Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, to investigate the army's performance and state of readiness for the war in Lebanon.

The panel will be publishing its first report within three weeks.

Adding to the already heightened sense of disappointment and agitation among the public was the news report, leaked to Ma'ariv on the day of the ceasefire, that Chief of Staff Dan Halutz had found the time to place an order to sell his stock portfolio on July 12, the very day that Hezbollah kidnapped two IDF soldiers and killed eight others.

Even before all the facts were known, the level of indignation spiralled quite high. If Halutz ought not to resign over his leadership of the war, he ought to resign over his selfish sense of misplaced priorities, many people demanded.

That he apparently made his original request before he actually knew of the kidnapping seems not to have persuaded too many people to restrain the tone, at least, of their angry rhetoric.

Israel was indeed an angry place last week, but amid the anger there were still sprinklings of elevating, good news.

Like a strong breeze into a limp, motionless sail, the country's collective mood revived temporarily by the arrival last Wednesday of 550 olim – some 150 Canadians, 150 Britons and 250 Americans on flights sponsored by Nefesh b'Nefesh in partnership with the Jewish Agency. In fact, some 4,000 new olim arrived during the fighting along the northern border.

"It's the only country in the world, where the prime minster waits at the airport to welcome new immigrants," Jewish Agency chairman Ze'ev Bielski told the olim as they gathered in a special assembly hall at Ben-Gurion Airport.

But given the high volume of editorial and public opinion shrapnel flying in and around his office last week, the airport was one of the safest political places for Ehud Olmert to be.

HISTORIC ALIYAH: Some 150 Canadians were part of a group of more than 550 North American and British Jews who moved to Israel last week as part of a six-day global aliyah campaign by Nefesh B'Nefesh, which was run in close co-operation with the Jewish Agency for Israel. It was the largest number of western immigrants ever to arrive in Israel in one day. A specially chartered El Al flight left Aug. 15 from Pearson International Airport, and two additional flights, one from the United States and another from the United Kingdom, left the same day. All three landed in Israel within one hour of each other on Aug. 16 and were met by Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. An emotional goodbye ceremony at Pearson's Terminal 3 included a good-luck cake and words from Ya'acov Brosh, Israel's consul general in Toronto; Tzvi Richter, director of social services for Nefesh B'Nefesh; Dina Gidron, outgoing regional director of the Jewish Agency for Israel's Israel Aliyah Centre; and Ted Sokolsky, president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. [Carolyn Blackman photos]

Jewish schools welcome news of $100M education fund

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

The heads of some of Toronto's largest Jewish day schools said they're pleased by the news of a forthcoming $100-million fundraising drive for Jewish education and hope it can help tackle pressing financial challenges.

Lucy Cohen, head of school at United Synagogue Day School (USDS), said she sees "tremendous potential" in the fund, which is set to be launched later this year or early next year by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"I'm delighted that federation is allocating such a significant sum to addressing the whole challenge of Jewish education in all its aspects," she said.

Cohen said she hopes the fund will allow schools to increase the quality of the education they offer.

"The issues of investing in quality of product is very important: professional development and training, up-to-date materials and the whole aspect of technological integration is enormous. If this [fund] will ameliorate some of the stresses that day schools feel, then I applaud the initiative of the federation."

With the rising cost of tuition, affordability also remains a "critical issue," Cohen said. "[Affordability] is still an impediment for many families in allowing them to give their children a Jewish education."

Howard English, spokesperson for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, told The CJN that a date to launch the education fundraising drive has not been set.

"We're going to be talking about the fund within the next few weeks and determining the nature of the fund, to whom we will be appealing, the use of the fund – a lot of the details have not been determined," English said. "We are deeply committed to the initiation of the fund, but fund details are going to be worked out in the next couple of months."

He said the fund is federation's "top domestic priority."

Seymour Epstein, executive director of the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, told The CJN last week that the fund will be used for all aspects of Jewish education, and that across-the-board tuition reductions are unlikely, because the fund would not be large enough to generate sufficient annual interest for that purpose.

Epstein also stressed that tuition subsidies to parents, which stand at about $7.8 million per year, remain federation's single largest budget item.

English said federation recognizes the financial pressure on parents, adding, "We haven't by any means slowed down our discussions with the government on funding, and we understand that government funding is the key to influencing the cost of Jewish tuition."

Shana Harris, director of education at Bialik Hebrew Day School, welcomed news of the endowment fund.

"Any investment in Jewish education for me is an investment in the future of the Jewish People," she said.

"Providing Jewish education for our children is really important for Jewish continuity, Jewish identity, and a connection with Israel. Giving that to children would be important."

She, too, stressed the importance of affordability. "I would hope that making Jewish education affordable for a greater portion of the population is something the community will look at," she said.

"Any money invested in Jewish education that would include a larger number of children would be important. It's an important investment in our Jewish future," she added.

Like Cohen, Harris also emphasized the issue of quality. "I would like to see us providing the best quality Jewish education for our children."

David Prashker, director of Leo Baeck Day School, declined to comment on the fund itself, but he wished the BJE success with its initiative. "Jewish education across Toronto will benefit enormously because of this campaign," he said.

Mark Smiley, director of education at Associated Hebrew Schools, said he is a "really big believer" in major endowment funds for Jewish education.

"I think it is so important that the community create 'superfunds' for the purpose of enhancing Jewish education," Smiley said. "I'm hoping that part of that [federation] fund will make all forms of Jewish education more accessible.

Hollow promises from hollow men

On Saturday, Israeli commandoes struck deep in the Bekaa Valley in the southeastern region of Lebanon to prevent an attempted transfer of weapons from Syria to Hezbollah. Neither the Lebanese army nor the pitifully few and timid forces of UNIFIL were ready, willing or capable of doing so. But to prevent Iran and Syria from using the pretext of the ceasefire to re-arm Hezbollah, Israel acted, once again, in its own self-defence.

Of course, the United Nations, led by its all-too-often Israel-bashing Secretary General Kofi Annan, quickly condemned the Jewish state for violating UN Security Council Resolution 1701 of Aug. 12, the legal basis for the current tenuous ceasefire. Typically and predictably, Annan did not condemn the attempted re-arming of the Hezbollah terrorist army as a violation of the ceasefire. His soft-spoken, studied vituperation was directed only at the Israelis.

How odd. How illogical. How hypocritical.

Israel agreed to the ceasefire because it is predicated upon, and incorporates, United Nations Security Council resolution 1559, passed in September 2004, which calls for the disbanding and disarmament of all Lebanese and non-Lebanese militias and supports the extension of the control of the government of Lebanon over all Lebanese territory.

But the secretary general himself dampened any expectation that Hezbollah would be disarmed by the Lebanese army or UN forces.

"It is not expected to be achieved by force what must be realized through negotiation and an internal Lebanese consensus," Annan explained. His suggestion that Hezbollah – read Iran – will negotiate a voluntary surrender of its arms in Lebanon is either breathtakingly naive or duplicitously disingenuous.

Israel also agreed to the ceasefire because it promised to bring what U.S. President George W. Bush referred to as a "robust [international] force on the ground." As of this weekend, however, Annan was said to be pleading with UN member states to provide troops for that force on the ground. Indeed, France, which fiercely opposed the U.S. proposal to bring a NATO-sponsored force to the area, has already backed away from its promise to commit substantial forces. The total French commitment to UNIFIL, apparently, will be 400 soldiers.

At the moment, therefore, Israel and, one must add, Lebanon are left with an increasingly hollow ceasefire promise made to them by Annan and his associates. T. S. Eliot could have had them in mind when he wrote his famous poem The Hollow Men.

"[Their] dried voices, when/ [They] whisper together
Are quiet and meaningless…
Shape without form, shade without colour,
Paralysed force, gesture without motion."

For Eliot, the phrase was a poignant literary image. For Israel, alas, the phrase may be a precursor of foreboding and further strife.

A false peace

With the adoption of UN Security Council Resolution 1701, Israel has declared that it shall cease its offensive military operations against Hezbollah. There are many who will welcome a cessation to the hostilities. Some Israelis may cry "victory!" even as they bury their dead. Israel has, after all, managed to evict some part of Hezbollah from its northern border, kill hundreds of its terrorists, destroy many long-range missiles and degrade its military infrastructure. Yet Resolution 1701 represents the culmination of a near-complete victory for Hezbollah, Syria and Iran, and a resounding defeat for Israel, and by extension, the whole western world.

Hezbollah, after all, has withstood the full force of the Israel Defence Forces and remained very much intact, its arsenal of rockets still secure and hanging like a Damoclean sword over the outstretched neck of the Zionist entity.

This striking defeat for Israel should not come as a surprise to anyone. It is the inescapable byproduct of a profoundly flawed policy posited on ceding land in exchange for disingenuous and treacherous assurances of peace and security from its enemies and the "international community." Throughout this terrible conflict, Israel has suffered from a profound lack of leadership. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has hopelessly mismanaged this war, bobbing and dancing like a marionette to the pull-strings and shrill cries of a hostile Europe and a timorous United States. His smug and bombastic assurances of a quick and total victory were drowned by the sinister whizzing of Katyushas streaking through the sky.

If anything good comes of this conflict, it is that it has, to some extent, united Israel's Jewish population, and starkly reminded them that the world is at war with their country. As desperate as it is to live like a normal nation, Israel must never again imbibe the false bromides of a peace disconnected from its reality, or succumb to panaceas of false hope. But memories are so short, and as Zion continues its inexorable march toward a precarious and uncertain future, its leaders and politicians thunder glibly on.

Israel has lost this battle. The West should pray that Israel does not lose the war.

Olmert government must fall

Never in the annals of mankind has a major battle unfolded wherein unintended targets have not been struck. With every modern military technical convenience at her disposal, Israel attempted to avoid, as best it could, civilian casualties in its recent conflict with Hezbollah. Unfortunately, the state of warfare is not such that zero civilian deaths is an achievable standard. Although satellite-guided ordinance is helpful in preventing civilian casualties, it's the nature of warfare that bombs go aside or that wrong targets are hit. I am not aware of any military operation anywhere, ever, that has put such emphasis and effort on minimizing civilian casualties, to the lasting credit of the Israel Defence Forces.

In nine months of fighting in 1944-45, Allied forces caused 120,000 French civilian deaths in retaking France from Nazi Germany. Entire villages were flattened to get at but a couple of dozen Wehrmacht soldiers.

As painful as it might be, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's government must fall. Selflessly, Olmert, Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and Defence Minister Amir Peretz must collectively assume the blame for the failure to strike a dizzying and lasting blow to Hezbollah. The IDF must be exonerated and conclusively shown that it was held back by indecisiveness and misplaced efforts at diplomacy with a group whose stated and unabashed aim is the eradication of all Jews everywhere. Presently, nothing may be as important to the future safety of our soldiers as recovering the IDF's reputation of invincibility.

Education fund not postponed

In reference to the article "War postpones launch of $100M Jewish education fund" (CJN, Aug. 17), I wish to point out an error.

The launch of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's education endowment fund could not have been postponed because no date had yet been set to begin this important initiative.

For UJA Federation, Jewish education is a matter of urgent and utmost concern. Extensive discussions about the education endowment fund, a bold venture to which we are deeply committed, will be taking place while the Israel Emergency Campaign is underway. The existence of an Israel Emergency Campaign does not diminish the crucial importance of initiatives such as the education endowment fund. While all of us in the community are concerned about the situation in Israel, long-term planning for core needs never ceases. Indeed, the needs of Jewish education are always paramount. Without Jewish learning, there will be no responsive community in the future.

No knockout, but Israel still wins on points

By URI DROMI
JTA

After a month of fighting, a ceasefire under the auspices of the United Nations has left all of us wondering: Is Israel better off than before the war with Hezbollah began?

The answer depends on whether you're an optimist or a pessimist – but I, for one, am a sworn optimist, and believe that recriminations aside, Israel has come out ahead.

It's true that the expectations Israeli leaders raised at the outset were exaggerated. Utterly destroying Hezbollah was an unrealistic goal. This is not a regular army with fixed targets that can be hit easily either from air or through ground operations. Rather, Hezbollah is a unique creature – a terrorist organization that uses guerrilla tactics, with a secure territorial base in southern Lebanon and the backing of two states, Iran and Syria.

In the six years since Israel evacuated southern Lebanon, Hezbollah managed to build a well-equipped, elusive army that could launch thousands of rockets from the yards of houses and mosques, using Lebanese civilians as human shields.

By amassing rockets that can be launched with simple timers, Hezbollah managed to outwit Israel's military superiority and harass northern Israel pretty effectively.

"Israel will not agree to live with rockets fired on its citizens," Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said when he addressed the nation on July 17 for the first time since the war began. But we must admit that even on the last day of fighting, Hezbollah launched 250 rockets – its single-day record during the war – with thousands more still ready to launch.

Of course, there was a way to put an end to the Katyusha threat: All we had to do was declare that every Lebanese village from which a rocket was launched would be turned into a heap of rubble.

But a democracy – even when fighting against an enemy that takes advantage of that democracy's sensitivity to human life – shouldn't aspire to resemble its enemy. Therefore, the Israel Defence Forces had to try to distinguish between Hezbollah fighters and simple Lebanese citizens.

Even with these self-imposed restrictions, the results were impressive: most of Hezbollah's long-range rocket launchers were destroyed, together with the group's operational and logistic infrastructure, which it had built up meticulously over the years; armed drones launched against Israel were shot down; and approximately 500 Hezbollah fighters were killed, perhaps a quarter of Hezbollah's fighting force.

Yet Hezbollah's immediate losses are only part of the picture. With UN Security Council Resolution 1701, the situation in Lebanon has changed: Hezbollah was forced to accept the Lebanese army's deployment in southern Lebanon, augmented by a multinational force, something the group had resisted for years.

Israeli troops are still deployed in southern Lebanon, ready to act if Hezbollah refuses to disarm — as, indeed, it indicates that it will.

The two Israeli soldiers kidnapped by Hezbollah on July 12, sparking the war, haven't been returned, but Israel took captive enough Hezbollah fighters to make a swap possible.

Voices in Lebanon now openly blame Hezbollah for the destruction it brought on the country, which had been rebuilding and returning to prosperity after 15 years of civil war.

Last but not least, Hezbollah's reckless adventure damaged its patron state, Iran: Not only was Iran's forward outpost weakened, but the world is now much more aware of Iran's sinister plans in the region.

Israel suffered more than 150 casualties and a lot of physical damage. Yet contrary to Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah's prediction that Israel would prove as weak as a spider web, it didn't collapse. Despite 4,000 rockets launched on their cities and towns, Israelis – both on the home front and the battlefield – turned out to be as resilient as ever.

As for Israeli deterrence, Israel has shown it still has the will to strike back. And if Syria or any other enemy should conclude that Israel has lost its military edge, they're in for a bitter surprise: Chasing little pipes called Katyushas, hidden in garages, is one thing; destroying military formations and infrastructure, shooting down aircraft and hitting tanks is totally different.

We don't have a Six-Day War here, with Arab armies entirely defeated in a matter of hours, or an Entebbe raid, where a problem is swiftly and neatly solved. Israel didn't score a knockout, as its leaders rashly promised at the outset of the war, but it definitely won a victory on points.

Of course, that won't stop Nasrallah from declaring victory himself. But it's noteworthy that he did it from his hiding place, and only time will tell whether he will ever again be able to address his followers in city squares, or whether he'll end up like Saddam Hussein, or even meet a different fate altogether.

Meanwhile, Olmert declared in the Knesset last week that Israel would continue to chase Hezbollah's leaders and make them pay for their aggression. That may be true, but if I were Olmert, I'd subscribe to the memorable line from The Good, the Bad and the Ugly: "When you have to shoot, shoot. Don't talk!"

How can we help?

I am writing this column in Jerusalem, keenly aware of its serene beauty and Israel's frightful vulnerability.

It feels awkward to write this column weeks before you read it. How can I express my feelings when every few days the world shifts and so much happens.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

I began this column sitting with my mother and husband on a plane to Israel, having flown out of New York right before they closed JFK down due to the terror threat in Britain. We planned this trip months ago. My entire family, including children and grandchildren, is coming to celebrate my mother-in-law's 90th birthday. It's a great moment, worthy of elaborate plans and so many travellers.

Yet, we travelled with trepidation as Israel remained in a precarious situation, struggling in an awful conflict. It's a dangerous time. And still we came, praying for a great celebration. As you read this, remember back three weeks and then two weeks. What were you feeling? Were you one of those who told me not to go? Or were you as naive as I, cheering us on, sure that things would be OK? They have to be.

I remember well our fears in 1967. How could Israel fight the vast Arab armies massed on her borders? But Israel was victorious beyond our wildest dreams. We saw a wonderful army and worthy soldiers at work. We learned to rely on their strength as we relied on Israel's presence for our continued national viability.

After spending a wonderful Shabbat in Jerusalem, I am more than ever conflicted. We were safe, secure and quite happy together, with both our mothers, alive and well. Yet when the day was over, nine soldiers were dead. Joy and sadness intermingled. The losses are so great and everyone is connected to some tragedy.

Can we win?

Will our confidence in Israel's army and military skill falter as they face an impossible task. Fighting an intractable and irrational enemy, Israel faces a world of immoral public opinion. What kind of world judges only Israel while giving terrorists a free pass. How is it possible that the liberal left is so blind? How can they encourage kidnapping and anarchy? And why do terrorists attack? What do they care for our little piece of land? We don't even have oil.

Like you, I have spent many hours each day reading articles and listening to the news. Confused and angry, I wondered at our powerlessness and the media's prejudices.

What can we do?

Come here, send money, have confidence. In just 58 years, Israel has managed to carve out a democracy, achieve unprecedented economic growth, scientific renown, cultural creativity, and humanitarian accomplishments. This is a wonderful country. Come!

Some basic lessons for drunk Hollywood stars

It's time for some lighthearted thoughts. While having lunch with a Catholic friend of mine, we lighted on the topic of Mel Gibson's latest outrages. We decided there needs to be a "Celebrity 101" course that everyone in Hollywood must take before they venture into the entertainment biz.

Joan M. Gerber in Vancouver

First, we devised our syllabus:

Topic 1: What to do when stopped for drunk driving, with guest lecturer Nick Nolte – in case Mel Gibson is still in rehab.

Topic 2: Kabbalah, with guest lecturer Madonna.

Topic 3: TV talk shows – dos and don'ts.

Topic 4: How the Italians control Hollywood – and you thought it was the Jews! (Guest lecturers TBA, but hopefully we can snag Nicholas Cage, Quentin Tarantino, Francis Ford Coppola and others.)

Topic 5: Names given to children of celebrities. Apple and Jesus will give a followup lecture when they're old enough.

For the final exam, we decided to use multiple choice, so celebs only have to know how to check off boxes. No essays required.

1. What should you do when stopped by a cop for drunk driving?

(a) Say nothing until your publicist/lawyer shows up.

(b) Say nothing until your publicist/lawyer shows up.

(3) You should have taken a limo, dummy.

2. How do you ascend to a higher plane of consciousness?

(a) Take lots of those little pills they pass out at parties with bottles of water.

(b) Practice saying the alphabet backwards while holding your breath and counting to 10.

(c) You can't.

3. What should you say on TV when asked about your latest love-in/live-in/main squeeze:

(a) Smile, dummy (see question 1).

(b) Thank the host for caring, but you're not sharing.

(c) Show pictures of the two of you sharing a soda.

(d) Jump up and down on the furniture and slobber.

4. Fill in the following words (OK, we lied about multiple choice, but it's only a little lie. It depends on your definition of multiple choice. And lie.)

Hollywood is not dominated by the _____. The media is not dominated by the_____. The government of Canada is not dominated by the _____. The government of the United States is not dominated by the _____. There is no international _____ _____ (hint: two words, beginning with Z and C, respectively). World War III will not be started by the _____. The _____ and the bicyclists are not responsible for the ills of the world.

5. (a) What will you name your first boy? Choose one.

- Nebuchadnezzar
- Pomegranate
- Idi Amin
- Seymour Irving Sheldon Harvey – take that, Gibson

(b) What will you name your first girl? Choose one.

- Ophelia
- Kumquat
- Stella Dallas
- Mary Backstage Noble Wife

Note: Students, if you haven't smartened up by now, you should not have any more children.

Lunch was almost over – remember we were at lunch? – and we had to get serious.

With rockets falling on Israel, with our enemies practically hysterical with glee at the body count – theirs, not ours – it seemed like a good time to take a moment to remember that laughter is not the best medicine – I reserve that description for antibiotics and chicken soup – but it did help. A little. Then I went home to the latest reports from the Middle East, heartened only by the 1,600 people who turned out for our local rally in support of Israel.

Some of the rally organizers were rather nervous, given the attack in Seattle the Friday before our rally. But Jews came with their children and grandparents, non-Jews came to show us they cared and understood, and we heard a most generous and supportive message on behalf of the government of Canada.

So, one in the eye for you, Hezbollah, and one in the eye for you, Mad Mel.

Finally, the latest from Hollywood: Mad Mel wants to do tshuvah with the Jews. Well, we have one more suggestion: buy back all the video copies and distribution rights to that slasher Jesus flick. Then take the ludicrous amount of money you made on it and donate it to, oh, I don't know, how about resettlement of the Falasha Mora in Israel, or to repairing all the damage done by Hezbollah rockets.

I hope that someone out there has schlep with Hollywood University and gets Celebrity 101 underway soon.

Israel in conflict

So much has been said and written about the current state of hostilities between Israel and Hezbollah that I am not sure if I or any local commentator can make a further, significant contribution to this discussion.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Despite the rhetoric of Hezbollah and other Middle Eastern anti-Israel protagonists, this conflict has nothing to do with the plight of the Palestinains or the desire for a Palestinian state. What unifies the enemies of Israel is the obsessive and driven desire to destroy that geographically tiny enclave of freedom and democracy. Israel embodies western culture and values and does so in a Jewish milieu – all of which is anathema to the largely undemocratic and totalitarian environment that defines the region. And regimes such as Iran and its unprincipled leadership are highly hateful, grossly anti-Semitic and disseminate fallacious views of the Holocaust.

It is sad and disappointing that internationally recognized nations have an agenda to destroy a fellow nation. But that is the reality of the modern Middle East. It has been said many times that Israel must win each and every conflict because the consequences of losing even one war would lead to its destruction. No right-thinking person should ever countenance or even contemplate that horrific possibility.

With the recent hostilities occurring between Israel and Hezbollah in southern Lebanon, the United Nations and many nations around the world are calling for an immediate ceasefire. It is, of course, understandable that people do not want further death, injury and destruction and want the area restored to a quiet, peaceful state of affairs.

But that is short-sighted, naive and misses the very point as to why there are active hostilities in the first place. Consider Hezbollah. Hezbollah foments violence and hostility by kidnapping and ambushing Israeli citizens during incursions into Israel and then sits back to watch the world condemn Israel for protecting its citizens and defending its sovereignty.

Clearly Hezbollah is a vicious terrorist organization and not a sovereign state. Its sole objective is the absolute destruction of the State of Israel. It cares little, if at all, about the long-standing Israeli-Palestinian impasse. It masquerades as a humanitarian organization by providing schools and assistance in rebuilding the homes that are destroyed by Israeli bombs. Yet it launches missiles from civilian enclaves without regard for the inevitable and tragic toll of civilian deaths that predictably follow from a preventative and/or retaliatory action by the Israeli Defence Forces

Hezbollah is armed and supported by Syria and Iran, two countries where freedom, democracy and human rights are alien concepts. Despite their respective religious differences, Hezbollah has recently received the support of Al Qaeda, essentially creating an axis of evil consisting of terrorist bedfellows.

So what would a ceasefire accomplish? It is a temporary solution. Hostilities might stop for a while, but this will give Hezbollah time to re-strategize and rearm in its efforts to destroy Israel. A ceasefire will serve to placate those who want temporary peace at any price, but the price would be the eventual restoration of renewed hostility and the continuation of a reign of terror.

The Al Qaeda experience has told us that the fight against terror is no less than a war. A ceasefire would hamper Israeli attempts to crush Hezbollah once and for all and would create, at best, a temporary cessation in this war on terrorism.

Hezbollah, Al Qaeda, Iran and Syria (and, for that matter, Hamas) are all players in the anti-Israel campaign. A ceasefire will permit them to rest, rearm and restore their aggressive conduct. We all want peace. We all want to protect civilians. But at what cost?

At the time of writing this column, the UN Security Council drafted a resolution proposing an immediate ceasefire together with the deployment of an international force. I hope that by the time this article is published there will be meaningful, sustainable and lasting peace in the Middle East. But realistically, this can only be achieved by the eventual disarmament of anti-Israel terrorist elements.

The Kirshner File

War in Lebanon ends on inconclusive note

As Israelis took stock of the month-long war in Lebanon, which ended on an inconclusive note on Aug. 14, Israel's defence minister, Amir Peretz, announced that he had appointed a committee to study the performance of the Israel Defence Forces. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert had already conceded that "mistakes" had been made and that an inquiry was required.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Benjamin Netanyahu, the Likud leader, put it more bluntly when he declared that there had been many shortcomings – "failures in identifying the threat, failures in preparing to meet the threat, failures in the management of the war… and on the home front."

Netanyahu's harsh comments reflected a widespread perception that Olmert and Peretz fell considerably short of the mark in managing a war that most Israelis supported as a just and unavoidable one foisted upon their country by reckless Hezbollah aggression.

In Israel, commissions are always set up when wars go awry. The Agranot Commission was struck in the aftermath of the 1973 Yom Kippur War, which caught Israel largely flat-footed. The Kahan Commission, which was appointed following Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon, investigated allegations that Israel was complicit in the Phalange militia massacre of several hundred Palestinian civilians in the Sabra and Chatilla refugee camps.

The panel charged with examining the latest war in Lebanon may well conclude that Israel was more or less surprised by the enormity of Hezbollah's military resources, preparations and training, and that it was ill-prepared for the challenge of swiftly overpowering Hezbollah on the battlefield.

Hezbollah had six years to gather its strength for the war, which broke out on July 12 after a cross-border ambush during which three Israeli soldiers were killed and two were kidnapped. Right under Israel's nose, Hezbollah – a state-within-a-state, like the PLO prior to 1982 – fortified southern Lebanon with a maze of bunkers, tunnels and emplacements and acquired sophisticated equipment – notably rockets and anti-tank missiles – from its allies, Iran and Syria.

Thanks to fairly accurate intelligence, Israel was generally aware of these developments, but having been scarred by the 1982 war, Israel chose to exercise self-restraint and observe the status quo. Israel, however, failed to grasp the true scope of the looming threat and the extent to which Hezbollah had embedded itself into the fabric of the Shiite population in southern Lebanon. Israel also seems to have underestimated the threat posed by Hezbollah's bristling arsenal of short-range and long-range rockets.

In the spring of 1996, around the time the Israeli army and air force bombarded Lebanon in Operation Grapes of Wrath, Israel and the United States agreed to develop a laser shield to destroy Katyusha rockets in flight. Having been periodically hit by Katyushas since 1968, Israel was in dire need of a system to effectively counter such rockets. Work went ahead, but it was cancelled last September, in large part due to prohibitive costs, after $300 million (US) had already been spent on the project. Nevertheless, Israel and the United States continued to test the Arrow system, which is designed to intercept long-range missiles.

Once the war in Lebanon was underway, Israel – a nuclear power with the strongest army and air force in the Middle East – found itself essentially defenceless in the face of Hezbollah's indiscriminate daily rocket barrages aimed at towns, cities and villages in the Galilee. Hezbollah launched 3,790 rockets, killing 42 Israeli civilians and, in one particularly horrific incident in Kfar Giladi, 12 soldiers. Several of the rockets landed as far south as Hadera, though none were fired at Tel Aviv, as Hassan Nasrallah, Hezbollah's secretary-general, had threatened.

Strangely enough, Israel did not activate the Arrow system to intercept Hezbollah's long-range missiles. But the air force was extensively deployed in what would be a futile attempt to neutralize the steady rain of rockets. The chief of staff, Gen. Dan Halutz, the former commander of the air force, strongly believed that his F-15s and F-16s could seek out and knock out the rocket launchers. Indeed, Israel claimed to have hit scores of launchers.

But much to Israel's frustration, Hezbollah was still fully capable of firing salvo after salvo of Katyushas at will, thereby paralyzing northern Israel and inflicting untold damage – $4 billion (US) and counting – on its economy, especially the tourist sector. Israelis who sought refuge in bomb shelters – mainly the poor and the elderly, who lacked the means to flee southward to safety – were disconcerted by the bombardments, but they remained resilient, thus confounding Nasrallah's fantastical analogy that Israel is like a delicate spider web, ripe for the plucking.

Until the final hours of the war, which was stopped by a United Nations ceasefire co-sponsored by the United States and France, Israel dithered when it came to launching an all-out ground offensive to complement the air campaign.

During the early phases of the war, Israel carried out limited raids close to the border, but the pace was sluggish and the going was tough. Hezbollah fighters fought back hard and fanatically, picking off Israeli troops and blowing up Merkava tanks. Towns that Israel claimed to have captured were not actually pacified. Grimly watching these setbacks unfold, Halutz dispatched his deputy, Gen. Moshe Kaplinski, to assist Udi Adam, the general in charge of the northern front. Not since the dark days of the Yom Kippur War had Israel resorted to such a drastic measure.

Having failed to crush Hezbollah in short order, as it had vowed, Israel mobilized some 30,000 reservists for a decisive push. But by then, the United States – which supported Israel's war aims of expelling Hezbollah from the border region and freeing its prisoners– called for a truce, having apparently reached the conclusion that Israel would not achieve a clear, outright victory.

Israeli soldiers return from battles in Lebanon.

In a last-ditch attempt to solidify its position in advance of a truce and the entry of international peacekeepers and the Lebanese army into southern Lebanon, Israel advanced as far north as the Litani River, in a reprise of the 1978 campaign.

On the last day of the war, Hezbollah, in keeping with Nasrallah's promise to unnerve Israel, whipped out yet more "surprises," sending two Iranian-made, explosive-laden drones, as well as a truck filled with dynamite, toward Israel. The drones were shot out of the sky, and the vehicle was blown up en route to Metulla.

By war's end, Israel had not accomplished its major objective, having failed to eradicate Hezbollah, let alone disarm it. Nor did Israel win the release of its two prisoners of war, who will probably be freed fairly soon.

But Israel – which lost 118 soldiers in the fighting – appears to have killed several hundred Hezbollah fighters, destroyed its military infrastructure near the Israeli frontier, created what may be a Hezbollah-free zone in southern Lebanon, and put its enemies on notice that they can expect fierce retribution if they attack.

Olmert claimed that the "strategic balance" had been changed, but Nasrallah boasted that he had achieved a "strategic and historic victory" over Israel, a claim triumphantly reiterated by President Bashar Assad of Syria and President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran. In fact, Israel and Hezbollah seem to have fought to a draw, and Hezbollah's refusal to disarm may touch off a fresh round of warfare in the future, as Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni suggested last week.

What is certain is that Hezbollah's survival will encourage Palestinian extremists, who are currently locked in a bitter struggle with Israel in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank. A recent opinion poll shows that support for Hamas – and Hezbollah – among the Palestinians has increased, and that the number of Palestinians who believe in peace with Israel has dropped precipitously. On the Israeli side, support for Olmert's plan to unilaterally withdraw from the West Bank has declined. In light of Israel's unilateral pullout from Lebanon in May 2000, Israelis now wonder whether Palestinians will emulate Hezbollah by firing Qassam rockets into Israel after much of the West Bank is relinquished unilaterally.

Meanwhile, the low-intensity war in Gaza – which preceded the conflict in Lebanon by about two weeks – rages fitfully. But after almost two months of periodic Israeli ground incursions and missile and artillery strikes, which have killed more than 200 Palestinian combatants and civilians, Israel's settlements adjacent to Gaza are still being hit by showers of Qassams, and the abducted soldier, Gilad Shalit, still remains a prisoner, concealed somewhere in Gaza. But there may be hope. Mahmoud Abbas, president of the Palestinian Authority, claimed last week that Palestinian factions are ready to suspend attacks against Israel.

Canadian youths leave home to join Israeli army

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Israel has been part of Aaron Draper's life since he took part in a birthright israel trip in 2002.

He has returned to the country since then, and he thought he would get it out of his system, "but I only became more interested," he said.

Several weeks ago, Draper, 25, a York University graduate and a trained teacher, joined a group of about 130 young Jewish adults from North America, the United Kingdom and New Zealand who are joining the Israeli army through the Tzofim Garin Tzabar program.

The program – supported by Israel Scouts, the Ministry of Absorption, the Jewish Agency and the Israel Defence Forces' Nachal Corps – involves the recruits living together on a kibbutz for three months and then serving individually in the army.

The kibbutz will become the group's home in Israel even after they join the army, and they can return there for Shabbat and holidays. "We'll be serving in the army as individuals, but we will continue to have group support," Draper said.

The process leading up to the move to Israel included five seminars throughout the year in which participants learned about their duties in the army and their rights as citizens of Israel, and created support relationships with peers.

Draper's flight, which was paid for by the Jewish Agency, marked the first time a group – about 30 are in the contingent, and half are from Canada – has left from Toronto, said Dina Gidron, outgoing regional director of Israel Aliyah Centre, which is affiliated with the Jewish Agency.

Aaron Draper

"Last year, seven or eight people [from Canada] joined the New York trip, but this is [a significant indicator] of the aliyah growth from Canada," she said.

Draper's grandparents were Holocaust survivors, he said, "and that was a motivator in my decision. I don't want Jews to experience another Holocaust event. Israel provides a safe place for world Jewry. I feel that they look out for us."

He made his plans well before the current situation in Israel, but he said that it "reaffirms that it is the right thing for me to do. It is a difficult time now, but [Israel] is always a difficult place to live."

With a background in competitive sports – he played AAA hockey in Richmond Hill and was a referee for six years – Draper said he is well suited to be a combat soldier, because "I enjoy physical and mental challenges."

Speaking several hours before his flight was set to leave, Draper said he anticipates that his biggest challenge will be learning conversational Hebrew and increasing his vocabulary.

"I've had my last pizza dinner at home, and I'm ready to go. I'll miss my parents, my two sisters and my dog, but because I'll be a lone soldier, I'll be able to return to Canada for three weeks every year."

His mother Scarlett, a teacher with the Toronto District School Board, said she and her husband Tom are proud of Aaron, "but full of apprehension. I believe, though, that they will look after our kids."

Tagar fosters Zionist pride on campus

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

Working to counter the anti-Israel propaganda that's all too common on university campuses these days is no simple task. But that's precisely what the Betar-Tagar student activist movement aims to do.

The Tagar Zionist student activist movement was founded in 1983 as an extension of the Betar Zionist Youth Movement, which itself was founded by right-wing Zionist pioneer Ze'ev Jabotinsky in 1923.

There are Betar-Tagar groups on campuses throughout Ontario, and the organization has branches worldwide in countries such as Uruguay, Argentina, France and Australia.

Betar-Tagar is committed to countering anti-Israel propaganda and fostering a positive image of Israel, something that's especially important in the current climate, says the past president of its University of Toronto chapter.

"Betar in World War II helped smuggle Jewish refugees out of Germany and Poland, and now in a different sort of war, a war of ideas, Betar is needed more than ever," said Josh Rosenblum, 22, who served as the president of the U of T Betar-Tagar chapter last year and plans to start up a chapter at McGill University, where he is headed this fall for his master's degree.

Rosenblum said that thanks to Betar-Tagar's efforts at U of T, the atmosphere on campus for pro-Israel students has changed.

"I feel like we've made campus a safer place for Jews who believe in Zionism and for Zionists," he said.

These days it may not be fashionable for university students to strongly support Israel, but Betar-Tagar aims to teach Jewish youth that it's OK to be pro-Israel and that it's OK to be open about voicing your support for the Jewish state.

"What Betar teaches is that your convictions do not have to be apologized for," said Rosenblum. "We do not owe anyone apologies for the way we feel and for what we believe and that's my mission personally and that's Jabotinsky's as well – that we don't have to apologize for how we feel and that's the kind of leadership that Betar-Tagar can offer."

Betar-Tagar provides Jewish youth with an opportunity to cultivate leadership skills, according to Rosenblum.

"Leadership in the sense that one can go out and express one's convictions, one's personal attitudes without fear of censorship, without having to apologize for the actions of our adversaries," he said.

The organization is very clear about its focus and remains true to the guiding principles of its founder.

"This is not a social movement. This is a political agenda to develop and foster Zionist leaders, and that's what makes it different," said Rose Lax, chair of the advisory board for Betar-Tagar and president of Herut-Likud Canada.

"It's a group that is trying to develop on Canadian campuses future leaders with strong Zionist values. It is a loud, vociferous student voice for Zionist and Jewish activism."

The group's activities vary from campus to campus. Lax said each campus chapter determines what its needs are, and the advisory board provides it with support for its activities.

For example, the Betar-Tagar group at U of T organized "Know Radical-Islam Week" last February in response to "Israel Apartheid Week," which was spearheaded by the Arab Students' Collective at U of T.

Josh Rosenblum

Each day of Know Radical-Islam Week centred around a specific theme and the group brought in nine speakers during the week, of which five were Muslim.

Know Radical-Islam Week proved to be a success and was covered in the media, including the Toronto Star and the National Post.

These sort of events help educate students who may not know much about Middle East affairs, while also making campus a more comfortable place for students who are sympathetic toward Israel, Rosenblum said.

"The most important part of activism, I find, is that other students can see that people like them are supporting something for which they maybe have never thought of from another perspective," he said. "It's to put a human face on it."

Many students are afraid to speak out in support of Israel, Lax said, adding that a large part of this is because they haven't been given the knowledge or the support to speak out.

"This is not the fault of Jewish youth and this is not a lack of bravery or conviction in Jewish youth – they haven't been given the tools to do this," she said.

"They need to understand that they have backing, that they have adult backing and what they're thinking and what they're feeling is real. They need to be reinforced.

"We as a community need to send a very clear message to our kids that this is your world. You need to understand that what you're doing now sets the tone for what your world is going to look like in the next 10 or 20 years, and you have to have responsibility for the development of that world, but the rest of us have to help," she added.

With the anti-Israel voices on campus becoming increasingly louder, a group that isn't afraid to speak out in favour of Israel may invite some unwanted labels, she added.

"People tend to think that if you're willing to stand up for your rights, that you're radical," Lax said. "This is not radical – this is common sense. For a group to say 'We are Jews, we're proud of that fact, we support Israel as our homeland, we support Jerusalem as our capital, we want to be a free people without any of this kind of stuff'– to say that that's radical is to miss the point."

And with the situation in the Middle East more volatile than ever, it's vital that people take a stand, she added.

"It's very important that Jews understand that while at certain times it is important to blend in with the population and not to rock the boat, this is not one of those times. Now it's time to stand up and say 'Enough is enough' and we need to foster a very strong leadership," Lax said.

Stolen and found

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Included in the many tragedies of war are those in the economic sphere. While loss of money pales in comparison to loss of life, the economic hardships are nonetheless real and painful. Lost jobs, ruined businesses, broken contracts and an expected economic slowdown are sure to be some of the effects of the latest Middle East war.

This unfortunately is not a new phenomenon. Those lucky enough to survive the Holocaust were rendered largely penniless. As the remaining survivors age, many face the frightening prospect of poverty. The indignity of many aging Holocaust survivors forced to beg, with only limited success, for assets that were stolen from them just adds insult to injury. Above and beyond our obligation to help all those in need, there is a special obligation to ensure that survivors can live out their remaining years in relative comfort.

The effects of poverty are much harsher to those who have been previously blessed with material success. It's this psychological need that's the basis of the law that in giving tzedakah, one must restore the person to their previous lifestyle. With so many other pressing needs, this law has perhaps been relegated to our theoretical canon, yet the concept that lies behind it must always be kept in mind.

In recent years, attempts have been made to try to recover property looted from Jewish people during the Holocaust. While from a moral perspective, all such items should surely be returned to their original owners or their heirs (or in the many cases where families were completely wiped out, to the Jewish community at large), it's far from clear that a legal obligation to do so exists.

While a thief must return a lost object – and Judaism has no concept of a statute of limitations – those who acquire stolen goods from the thief, whether innocently or not, are not necessarily so obligated.

Interestingly, the fate of a stolen object itself is determined by the mindset of the victim. Jewish law maintains that a change in ownership, coupled with the victims' despair of ever recovering a stolen object (yeush), can convey legal title to the purchaser. This is so regardless of whether or not the purchaser knew, or should have known, that an object was stolen. While it's strictly prohibited to transact with a thief or his property, being an enabler of sin is first and foremost a moral wrong that may at times have few legal ramifications. The difference between the good-faith purchaser and the accomplice to the crime revolves around compensation to the victim. In the latter case, the purchaser must fully compensate the original owner, whereas the innocent purchaser faces no such financial penalty.

In such case where an owner does not despair of recovering a stolen item, upon discovery of such, the owner may take possession even from an innocent buyer. Nonetheless, to ensure that those who act in good faith suffer no monetary loss in their market dealings, the original owner must pay the purchase price to the innocent third party and then attempt to recover the money from the thief. The bad-faith purchaser would, of course, receive no compensation.

Unfortunately, it's fair to say that Jews who had their property looted by the Nazis most likely despaired of any potential recovery. There was no such thing as justice for Jews in Europe of the 1940s. Yet it's hard to imagine that many purchasers of looted material were unaware of the nature of their purchases. Jewish teachings demand that blissful naiveté give way to asking questions to ensure that our business dealings be conducted with the utmost integrity.

Alternative Israeli voices

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we looked at ways to keep up with events from the Middle East by checking out Israeli blogs. Beyond blogs, a virtually endless stream of photos, videos and podcasts will tell you how Israelis – and the rest of the world – view the Israeli/Hezbollah conflict. What makes these sites interesting are the raw emotions that are freely expressed. You are bound to come across ones that you disagree with.

Carol Warady is angry at her government. She makes that clear when you listen to her Israelisms podcast. She feels that Israel was wrong to allow Hezbollah make it fight "a guerilla war on their terms." Her husband Charley's tone is a bit more moderate, but he is clearly upset that "they sucked us in to having to take civilian life… And they're responsible for it, but they knew we'd get blamed for it… And we fell for it hook, line and sinker." [www.israelisms.com/]

That theme continues with Yoram Getzler and Steve Ornstein at the IsraelSeen.com podcast in which Getzler predicts an Israeli soul-searching similar to the one that followed the Yom Kippur War. Other IsraelSeen podcasts since the beginning of the war have included interviews with author Yossi Klein Halevy and with Joe Hyams of Honest Reporting. [www.israelseen.com] And for the view from Beth Shemesh, check out what Dave and Erika have to say at the Israellycool podcast. [http://israellycool.libsyn.org]

When you visit Flickr, you feel like you are dipping into thousands of photo albums from around the world. The key to this massive photo-sharing site are "tags" or keywords that are assigned to the photos and allow for easy searching. For example, almost 150,000 photos are tagged with the word "Israel," when I narrowed the search terms to "Israel Lebanon," I got about 6,000 photos ranging from anti-Israel demonstrations to panoramas of northern Israel. When I tried "tzahal," I got shots of soldiers on duty as well as quite a few of them praying in tallits and tfillin. The best way to explore the site is to plug your own keywords into the search engine and see where they take you. [www.flickr.com]

What Flickr is to photos, YouTube is to video. But for the most part, the video you find there isn't homemade but is culled from news reports, TV shows or other websites. Not surprisingly, many of the recent videos tagged "Israel" either support or condemn either side in the war with clips of protests, raw military footage and late-night talk-show monologues. [http://tinyurl.com/zc4gh] Beyond recent events, you'll find a huge range of material in the Israel section of YouTube including:

- A homemade (bootleg) video of David Broza performing at Masada [http://tinyurl.com/f6rvk]
- A 45-minute History Channel documentary on the Six Day War [http://tinyurl.com/zs6rk]
- Senior Israel Defence Force officers singing a tribute to a former commander [http://tinyurl.com/rvwr5]
- A two-minute film titled Passover Noir. Shot in the Old City of Jerusalem in the style of a Humphrey Bogart film, it tells of a Pesach-time nemesis who's gonna burn. [http://tinyurl.com/zhg97]

The videos you find at the next site are bound to elicit a different reaction. MEMRI TV, the Middle East Media Research Institute TV Monitor Project, is a Washington-based organization that monitors and translates Arabic and Farsi broadcasts. The MEMRI page on Lebanon war has lengthy clips of Hezbollah's leader Hassan Nasrallah as well as a recent clip in which Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad proclaims, "Death to Israel." Although you may have seen some of these clips as news bites, it is particularly interesting to watch them run for several minutes. [http://tinyurl.com/hp5b9]

The Wikipedia entry on MEMRI TV says the site is praised for being a unique resource and criticized for taking a selectively negative view of Arabic-language media. [http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/MEMRI]

If after all these alternative sources of Middle East news you are still hungering for mainstream Israeli media, then I recommend Hebrew and English offerings from the Israel Broadcasting Authority [http://tinyurl.com/zznnh] and Hebrew-only newscasts from Israel's Channel 2. [www.reshet-tv.co.il/] (Note to Mac users: you may need to download the latest version of the free Flip4Mac program in order to view these broadcasts. [http://tinyurl.com/jxwnp])

Canadian student works to improve Israel's image

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Richmond Hill native Robert Walker didn't spend his summer the way most 20-year-old students do: Walker made a commitment to improve Israel's image in the media by becoming involved with The Israel Project (TIP).

Walker was selected as one of 30 media fellows of TIP, "a non-profit organization devoted to educating the press and the public about Israel while promoting security, freedom and peace."

Walker said that Jennifer Laszlo Mizrahi, who founded The Israel Project in 2002, felt the press coverage regarding Israel was unfair and wanted to do something about it.

"We are the only organization working to improve Israel's image in the media," said Walker, who is a student in a joint journalism program at the University of Ottawa and the Algonquin College of Applied Arts and Technology.

"We exist as a resource for journalists to provide them information about Israel to allow them to better do their job."

Walker said that he believes that the reason Israel gets press "that does not demonstrate the full complexity of the conflict," is because journalists don't have the information they need to write fair and balanced articles.

"I don't believe there is a vast conspiracy to discredit Israel. I'm sure there are some journalists… with that agenda. But this is a complex conflict, and it can be very difficult for journalists to connect with the information they need. With [a number of sources] telling them something different, with facts and numbers that can easily be confused, I think it makes our job all the more important."

He said that TIP differs from other organizations such as Honest Reporting, which he said does good work as a media watchdog.

But rather than respond to the coverage in newspapers and on television, TIP provides journalists with the information beforehand.

"We like to think we're proactive. We have very different mandates… We're not making arguments – we're presenting the information… At the end of the day, this improves Israel's image, because people have accurate information and they are not basing it on a press release from Hezbollah," Walker said.

Walker, who did research, organized media tours, press conferences, and more, was stationed at the Washington D.C. office with nine other interns, while 10 more were placed in Jerusalem and another 10 in New York City, where Yossi Olmert, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's brother, is the New York office coordinator.

He said that the first week of his 2½-month internship included a seminar where they met with media figures such as Washington Post ombudsperson Deborah Howell, Al Jazeera's David Marash, as well as CNN's Wolf Blitzer.

During his summer internship, which ended earlier this month, TIP organized press events with political figures such as the Israeli Ambassador to the United States, Dani Ayalon, and the Israeli Ambassador to the United Nations, Dan Gillerman.

Walker said that this kind of work is important to change general misconceptions about Israel.

"People should understand that Israelis are much like Canadians, that we share values, that we have a common understanding. We are more similar than one might think," he said.

"Israel is a democracy. In Canada we hold our multiculturalism so closely, and Israel is a multicultural, multiethnic society where women, Arabs, Muslims, and Christians all have the same rights in parliament… A lot of people don't know that and I think it is very important people understand."

Jewish Life

The best back-to-school gift

This time of year makes me nostalgic. When I was a kid, getting ready for school meant new patent-leather shoes and a haircut, not a new iPod and thousands of dollars in designer clothes.

I grew up in the world of the 1950s: we worked a 40-hour week, and the top disciplinary problems in schools were gum, noise, dress code violations, littering, and running in the halls. Family rituals included family dinner, family gatherings and drives in the country. There were 16.1 incidents of juvenile violent crime per 100,000 teenagers.

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By RABBI ELYSE GOLDSTEIN

Fast forward. Today the work week is 45 to 50 hours. The top disciplinary problems in schools are drugs, alcohol, pregnancy, suicide, rape, robbery and assault. Family rituals are TV and vacations at Disney World. The rate of juvenile violent crime is 75.8 incidents per 100,000 kids.

In 2003, Richard Tremblay authored a startling study that argued children are born naturally aggressive and must be led away from a propensity toward evil. Human nature is to be aggressive from the womb, and our job as parents is to teach children how to curb this aggression, he argued. The Torah suggested that centuries ago. In Genesis 8:21, we read: "The inclination of the human heart is toward evil, from very youth." The two inclinations – yetzer hara, the innate desire to do the wrong thing and yetzer hatov, the innate desire to do the right thing – fight each other from our earliest age.

I still don't know if the issue is nature or nurture, but I do believe Jewish parents and grandparents should be rededicating ourselves to teaching children lasting spiritual values.

Everyone is a teacher in some way. It doesn't matter if you are a parent, grandparent, aunt or uncle. You may be a doctor, dentist or store cashier, but you're also a teacher of children, because children are watching everything you do and how you do it, from seeing how you react to traffic to hearing you yell at a clerk. In Hebrew, the word for parents, horim, comes from the same root as teacher (moreh) and teaching (Torah.)

Here are some bits of Torah-inspired wisdom that we can impart to our children:

- Serve the community – not for the hours that you receive "school credits" for, but for the doing of mitzvot.
- Teach them to say "I have enough" and the difference between "I need" and "I want."
- Have evening meals together without the TV or phone.
- Be a support system to other parents around you who say no to their kids and set strong limits.
- Don't accept bullying in any form.
- Don't expect or reward overachievement. (This is perhaps the first generation of kids to use the word "stress" to describe their lives as children.)
- Don't accept the "boys will be boys" mythology and wipe the word "wimp" and "sissy" from the vocabulary of boys.

I know that the 1950s were far from perfect. Those years had tremendous societal and economic problems. I also know that you can't go backward, but for our generation, maybe going forward means going backward just a little bit. That's the back-to-school gift I'd like more kids to get this year, especially the ones going off to Jewish schools, which should espouse these values as part and parcel of a "Jewish" education.

Israeli reservist feels for buddies in combat

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

At the height of Israel's war with Hezbollah, the Israel Defense Force (IDF) would send small groups of commandos to engage the Lebanese terrorist group on its home turf. Fighting at close range in villages, towns and farms, the IDF units were often ambushed and suffered high casualties. Critics wondered why Israel, with all the firepower at its disposal, would not simply level the building, village or town being used by Hezbollah instead of risking the lives of its soldiers.

Shalev Nemenov, 22, understands where the criticism is coming from, but he also understands the mindset and values of Israeli fighters. He was discharged from military service last March after completing a mandatory three-year stint and after turning down an offer to continue his career in officers' school.

Israeli soldiers are prepared to go house to house to root out Hezbollah fighters, Nemenov said. "Our soldiers appreciate lives, including civilians.

"No one wants to see civilians dead. You can't just bomb every house and cause civilian deaths," he said.

Nemenov, who is in Toronto visiting friends, said Israeli soldiers are trained to restrain their fire even though their foes, whether Palestinians on the West Bank or Gaza or Hezbollah in Lebanon, use civilians as shields.

A reservist with an elite combat unit, Nemenov said that while in active service his unit was assigned to Jenin, a hotbed of Palestinian terrorism. He said soldiers were under strict orders: "You cannot shoot them even if they hold a gun.

"Only if they shoot at you can you shoot back and only then, try not to kill them. You shoot at their legs."

While patrolling Jenin, his unit saw refrigerators thrown at them from roof tops, Molotov cocktails laced with glue – "so the fire sticks to the car" – thrown at them, and even worse.

Nemenov said he witnessed a surveillance tape in which an armed Palestinian fleeing Israelis troops grabbed a terrified, unwilling child of under six and held him with one hand while he used his free hand to shoot at his pursuers.

"They use kids as shields," he said. "They know we're not going to respond if kids are around."

Likewise, he said, Hezbollah "shoot from among civilians and go back to civilian houses."

Nemenov gets upset when he hears world leaders and pundits accuse Israel of going too far in responding to the initial Hezbollah provocation.

"It makes me so angry to hear that," he said. "It is so easy to point a finger and blame without actually looking at what's happening. I'd tell the leaders of the world that those who blame Israel should look at history. The Allies in World War II bombed civilians. In Kosovo, 10,000 civilians were killed, and countries killed so many and their country was never attacked."

Furthermore, he said, Israel was the innocent party in the conflict. It was at peace with Lebanon when two of its soldiers were kidnapped, eight killed and missiles rained down on civilian targets. "What would you expect a country to do except stop the attack?" he asked.

Nemenov has been in touch with friends from his old unit and other reservists who had been called up to active duty. Three of his buddies were wounded, though none seriously.

"Most of the time they are depressed, tired. You see a lot of motivation in the army reserves because everyone believes in this war."

But when he saw soldiers returning from the front, "you see the sadness in their eyes. You see they experienced their friends getting hurt, they were up for 48 hours, they had little to eat.

"It is a bad feeling when you're seeing other soldiers getting hurt...It's emotionally draining on me and it's affecting me."

Still, he said, the war was extremely popular among the troops. Speaking before the ceasefire took effect, he said, "I've talked to guys and everyone thinks we should go in and finish it once and for all."

The kind of disruption and destruction meted out by Hezbollah rockets was making life in northern Israel intolerable, he said. A native of Karkom, a village 20 kilometres from the Lebanese border, Nemenov said life in the north was turned upside down by the war. Ninety per cent of the northern "yishuvim" (communities) were struck by katyusha rockets and only luck prevented Karkom from being hit. One rocked fell in an open area only 100 to 150 metres from his parents' home.

Even the ones that missed inhabited areas caused tremendous damage. Most of the north's forest have been burned and Nemenov said it will take years for the greenery to come back.

United Church rejects divestment from Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A United Church of Canada resolution that rejects divestment and economic sanctions against Israel has been welcomed by the Canadian Jewish Congress.

At its 39th General Council meeting in Thunder Bay last week, the church – Canada's largest Protestant denomination – approved a "pro-investment" strategy that promotes "peaceful pursuits" in the Middle East.

The policy discourages investment in Canadian and foreign firms involved in Israel's occupation of the West Bank, but promotes investment in companies that contribute to the security and economic viability of Israel and a future Palestinian state.

In addition, the policy discourages members and congregations from investing in companies complicit in providing services and products to governments and organizations that refuse "to recognize the legitimate rights of the State of Israel, including its right to exist as a Jewish state."

The president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ed Morgan, said the church's new position is indicative of its understanding that "the refusal to recognize [Israel] is one of the fundamental reasons" for the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Manuel Prutschi, Congress' vice-president, said that, with this decision, the church has effectively consigned divestment to the dustbin.

In June, the church's Toronto chapter endorsed a resolution adopted by the Canadian Union of Public Employees' Ontario branch that backed divestment and sanctions against Israel until it recognized the right of Palestinians to self-determination.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, chair of Congress' inter-religious affairs committee, also expressed satisfaction at the new resolution.

"We are heartened by the constructive direction embraced by the United Church, to work together with those dedicated to peace and harmony, in a climate of mutual respect and recognition between Palestinians and Israelis, between Jews, Christians and Muslims."

He added: "It is through these kinds of efforts that we can contribute jointly and significantly towards ending the conflict."

Decision welcomed by Congress

Prior to the General Council meeting, 12 rabbis sent a letter to delegates condemning divestment as "unfair, wrong-headed and terribly unhelpful."

In rejecting divestment, the church took the concerns of the Jewish community into account, said Victor Goldbloom, chair of Congress' national executive.

Paul Dilworth, a member of the church, suggested that the Toronto chapter's endorsement of the CUPE Ontario resolution was unacceptable.

In an e-mail sent to The CJN before the latest policy was ratified, he wrote, "As a Christian, I believe this document is un-Christian, anti-Semitic, racist and supportive of terrorism."

Beth Radom cantor wants to involve congregants

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Cantor David Rosen truly feels like he has returned home since he took on the role of cantor and director of education at Beth Radom Congregation at the beginning of August.

A native of Toronto who graduated in 2003 from the School of Sacred Music of Hebrew Union College – Jewish Institute of Religion in New York, the 29-year-old tenor, an alumnus of York Mills Collegiate Institute, now shares the bimah with Rabbi Steven Schonblum, his one-time bar mitzvah teacher.

Rabbi Schonblum, the former ritual director at the Pride of Israel Synagogue, was also a mentor who gave Rosen the opportunity to read Torah regularly and to teach bar mitzvah students himself.

A friend of Rosen's father's thought he had potential and put him in touch with Cantor Benjamin Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple. Rosen, then 18, began studying with Maissner every week, but initially didn't see himself pursuing chazzanut as a career.

A psychology student at York University at the time (he also has an advanced certificate in Hebrew and Judaic studies), Rosen had been considering a career in law. He even thought about becoming a rabbi at one point, but his love of music led him in a different direction.

After York – where he met his wife, Ilyse Glickman, now a rabbi, in a Hebrew class – Rosen spent four years in the HUC cantorial program, the first year in Jerusalem and the last three in New York.

Rosen – who enjoys opera and musical theatre, and has performed in The Merry Widow, Yentl, Camelot and Fiddler on the Roof at Leah Posluns Theatre – completed his senior thesis and master's recital on contemporary Canadian composers including Ben Steinberg, Cantor Benjamin Maissner, and the late Srul Glick.

Both Rosen and Rabbi Glickman, who also attended Hebrew Union College, did student internships at Temple Sinai shortly after their marriage four years ago. Before returning to Toronto this summer, Rosen served as cantor and music director of Temple Emanu-El in Livingston, N.J., and Rabbi Glickman was director of education at a Manhattan synagogue.

On "the very rare occasion" the pair has led services together, it was "a real treat," said Rosen, who replaces part-time cantor Rudy Bromberg.

Rosen said Beth Radom, with its approximately 360 families, is "a wonderful community." The congregation, which is unaffiliated but Conservative in practice, has become "very progressive" in recent years, said Rosen, referring to its "woman-friendly" ritual practices, which now include counting women in the minyan.

Among Rosen's projects at the synagogue, he is organizing a youth choir for the High Holy Days, and would like to form an adult choir as well.

Cantor David Rosen

Although he enjoys performing the occasional recitative, he says that, as a cantor, he's "not a performer. I'm the messenger of the people's prayer... My biggest passion here is to get people involved."

As director of education, Rosen is inaugurating a religious school program this fall. "Jumpin' for Judaism" consists of small weekly group tutorials held either in the synagogue or in private homes; the arts-based "Jewish Living" program runs every other Sunday for 15 sessions, and includes some parent/child sessions. Both are geared for children from grades 1 to 6.

Although Rosen said people are "starting to realize the traditional models of Hebrew schools are not working very well," he said he himself had a positive experience at Adath Israel Congregation's congregational school.

Now he wants to help other Jews feel connected to their roots and be a resource so that others can "make Judaism part of their everyday life."

Jewish school leaders welcome education fund

Having "the leadership of the federation and the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools [helping to get] government funding for day schools in Ontario would be an unbelievable way to reduce tuition pressures," Smiley said. "But I'm also hoping that monies from whatever superfunds created are going to be used to assist the accessibility of the day schools for the community."

Smiley said that one of Toronto's "unique blessings" is that a much higher percentage of Jewish kids attend day schools here than in most U.S. cities. "We have 33 per cent of our kids using the day school system, and in the U.S., the average barely hits 15 or 17 per cent," he said.

Jewish leaders should see part of their role as "ensuring the continued accessibility of the day school system for parents who want it for their kids, as well as investing in other forms of Jewish education for families who want other modes for Jewish education," he said.

Smiley hopes that part of the endowment money can be used "not only to ensure the integrity of the financial assistance program, but to follow other communities that are trying to go after the problem of middle income families."

The emotional journey to a new life in Israel

Toronto aliyah flight lifts off with 150 on board

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Last week, an historic flight carrying Canadian olim left Toronto's Pearson Airport for the long trip to a new home. UJA Federation's Dan Horowitz was aboard the flight and provides this special report to* Jewish Toronto.

TEL AVIV- It's been suggested there's strength in numbers. If that old refrain is, in fact, true, then Israel's fortunes are clearly on the upswing following a devastating month of terror at the hands of Hezbollah.

Three specially chartered flights departing from Toronto, the U.S. and the U.K. with close to 600 North American and British Jews making aliyah landed concurrently in Tel Aviv on Wednesday, August 16th, resulting in a record-setting week for Western immigration to Israel.

The global aliyah campaign is a project of Nefesh B'Nefesh, which works in close cooperation with the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), UJA Federation's overseas partner, and in Toronto with the Israel Aliyah Centre.

According to Nefesh B'Nefesh, only 80 Canadians made aliyah in 2002, while over 400 will do so this year.

I was fortunate to be one of the 150 participants on the Toronto flight, although I was probably the only one on board with a return ticket to Toronto. Participants included new olim from all streams of Judaism and all ages, ranging from 2 months old to 66 years old - plus two dogs and one cat.

For Sam and Saisan Levkov, the decision to make aliyah was inevitable. Saisan was born and raised in Israel and met Toronto-born Sam there. They've lived in Toronto the past two years, but making it their home just wasn't in the cards.

"Israel is meant to be our home," said Saisan, and I told my husband, 'let's go home,' and that's what we're doing today."

Fortunately, Sam shares his wife's passion for Israel. "I've been there a few times, originally on birthright israel," said Sam. "While the last month has made our decision a bit harder on my family, it did nothing to deter us. Sadly, political unrest has been a part of Israel's history, and I think it will always be so. That's just the way life is there. You learn to live with it."

Sam & Saisan Levkov

The sentiments expressed by Sam were echoed by Dina Gidron, the Director of Toronto's Aliyah Centre at a send-off celebration prior to the departure.

"Perhaps, because of the situation in Israel over the last month, your friends and family asked you to reconsider or at least postpone your aliyah, but here you are, ready to make Israel home, and I am so proud of you," she said.

Israel's Consul General Cobie Brosh

"After such a hard month for Israel, to see all of you going home to Israel is such a proud moment for me," said Israel's Consul General, Cobie Brosh. "Canada and Israel have always had much in common in terms of our shared values, and now we have this in common. I salute you all."

"I so admire all of you and your remarkable strength, courage, conviction, and unrelenting commitment to Israel," added UJA Federation President Ted Sokolsky. "The sacrifice you are about to make for our beloved Israel is truly awe inspiring."

For Phil Maerov and his wife Elana, the decision to make aliyah was never a question of if, only when. "The decision was many years in the making," said Phil, who met Elana eighteen years ago while both were at Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

"Ever since then we always wondered how we could come back and live there. It just took time to get everything in order, and although we both have great lives in Toronto, we knew it was time to make the move."

Phil & Elana Maerov with their children

Karen and Dr. Robert Goldberger & family

Toronto's Dr. Robert Goldberger who, along with his wife Karen and their four children, is making aliyah, downplayed his family's decision.

"It's been a gradual process. It's probably taken us ten years to get to this point. It just seems like a very natural thing to do. Our furniture is currently somewhere on the Atlantic Ocean, with the port of Haifa closed, but what can you do? When it gets there, it gets there."

Perhaps one of the happiest and proudest faces aboard my flight belonged to Ora Zahavi, 25, an El Al flight attendant who was working her first aliyah flight.

"I look at the people on this flight and I see in their faces so much happiness and excitement and so many other emotions," said the Haifa-born and raised Zahavi. "I saw one woman crying and I asked her if I could help her, but she said no, I'm crying tears of joy about making aliyah. As an Israeli, I am so proud that these people want to live in Israel, the land I love so much. I'm especially happy to see so many young children on this flight because they will grow to become Israel's future."

When the three planes landed in Tel Aviv, there was a huge airport celebration featuring Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. "The last month has not been easy on us. Thankfully, a large part of the international community, including America, Canada and Great Britain, supported us. But there is still no greater support than the support you've shown us by deciding to make aliyah," he said. "When you come here as new olim, you are telling the world that we are afraid of no one and that we trust in Israel."

UJA Federation emergency campaign funds at work in Israel

Campaign receives donations from wide spectrum of community

By HOWARD ENGLISH
UJA Federation

With more than $12 million pledged toward relief efforts through UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign – chaired by Ariella Rohringer and Fred Waks - the money is already working on behalf of Israeli residents who are struggling to restore homes, jobs and peace of mind. Over 3,500 rockets fired by Hezbollah caused death and destruction throughout northern Israel.

The goal of UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign is $20 million above the regular campaign total. Campaign funds already transferred to Israel provided significant relief for war-weary northern Israeli residents through initiatives undertaken by UIA Federations Canada, the Jewish Agency for Israel and the Sacta Rashi Foundation. Among them were:

- Safe summer camps for children from the north, benefiting 30,000 young people
- Bomb shelter kits containing emergency lighting, first-aid equipment, sanitary items, fans, electric kettles and cleaning items
- Care for vulnerable immigrants who were relocated to absorption centres in central and southern Israel
- Respite retreats for 8,000 families who were given a four day break in southern and central Israel
- Day-trips for families who were treated to a day away at water parks and fairgrounds
- More than 200,000 hot meals provided to people living in shelters and community centres

Now the Israel Emergency Campaign focus has turned to reconstruction and recovery, with funding committed to, among other initiatives: trauma care and counselling; temporary housing for the uprooted; vocational counselling for the newly unemployed; specialized assistance for new immigrants, the elderly and those with special needs; and re-equipping community facilities.

The campaign's outpouring of generosity has extended to many non-Jewish community members as well.

According to Floy Doull, Israel is doing something that is very important for the entire Western world.

"Israelis are taking the brunt of the terrorist threat and really doing something concrete about it at a great cost to themselves," said Doull.

The same sentiments were echoed by Ted Nikolau. "What's happening there is a fight for all of us, not just the Jews, and I thought that this was the best way to help," he observed.

Elizabeth Domik's motivation for donating is even more personal. "I made a donation because I love the Jewish people," she said. "I'm a Roman Catholic, raised in a Jewish area, and I have always loved them, they have been good to me and to my parents."

One of the more inspiring stories of cooperation during the war took place at a summer camp for children from northern Israel near the Arab-Israeli village of Abu Ghosh, close to Jerusalem. There, Israeli-Arab teens joined their Jewish counterparts as counselors for the northern kids.

"This is the first time that we have been with Jewish kids," said 16-year-old Sammar Jaber. "It was lots of fun."

UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign is part of a massive North American emergency fundraising drive, conducted by Jewish Federations on Israel's behalf.

"The words elude me to describe the love, devotion, involvement, caring, generosity and openheartedness we received from you," said Jewish Agency for Israel Chair, Ze'ev Bielski.

Toronto teachers meet beleaguered northern Israel children

By ERIC GOLOMBEK
Principal at Associated Hebrew Schools

Recently, the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE) led a delegation of Toronto Jewish school teachers on a mission to Eilat, UJA Federation's partnership region. There they worked at a summer camp with children from northern Israel who, thanks to Israel Emergency Campaign funds, had been relocated from Israel's north, which was under constant terrorist rocket attack. In this article, written before the ceasefire, principal Eric Golombek describes the camp experience of the Toronto delegation.

At most camps, when the number of kids goes down, people start to worry. But for all of us, delegates to Eilat from Toronto, a reduction in numbers was only good news. This is because the camp we are helping to run is for children from Israel's north, children who fled the barrage of katyusha rockets which destroyed many of their homes and shattered their lives. With the ceasefire more or less holding, many families from the north have returned to begin the process of rebuilding.

The community centre camp is one of a number of projects that we have been involved with. Our group, under the leadership of USDS teacher Adi Sugarman-Maidany, has come on a mission to work with the children of the north, providing them with programming to distract them from the trauma they are going through. At the camp, we are running a range of activities, providing much needed relief to the overworked staff who remain at camp, despite August being their vacation month.

In addition to our daily work at the camp, we are involved in leading a variety of programs for displaced families who are staying at the Goldwater High School.

To see families living in such poor conditions is difficult, indeed shocking, for all of us. Typically, four families are crowded into one classroom. Mattresses have been spread on the floor for the adults, and children generally lie on the floor itself. The mood at the high school is depressing. Most of the adults sit in their rooms all day, or in communal areas, smoke cigarettes and watch the news of the destruction back home and the much anticipated ceasefire.

This situation has left many of the children undersupervised and with little to do. For these children, we have set up arts and crafts tables. We have run evening programs such as airplane, golf and casino. Ora Goldin, a percussion instructor and teacher at Beth Torah, is running rhythm workshops for a variety of groups, and CHAT teacher, Zev Steinfeld, is leading groups in song with his guitar.

"Never have I worked so hard," said Zev. "But, it's totally worth it. These kids so desperately needed us. I am so grateful that I had a chance to really make a difference."

This sentiment is shared by all the participants of our group. Each evening, the group debriefs and plans the next day's activities, a process which often lasts into the early hours of the morning.

"You watch the news on TV in Toronto and you feel helpless," said Associated kindergarten teacher, Lisa Hemi, at one of these meetings. "That's why being here is so important to me. It has given me a chance to do something, however small, to help."

The group is unanimous in its gratitude to BJE and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto for creating the opportunity to help Israel in its time of need.

Visually impaired student heads to Grade 2 at USDS

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Amanda Shekarchi is looking forward to returning to United Synagogue Day School in September to enter Grade 2.

The seven-year-old girl, a good student who enjoys drama, math and Jewish studies, won an award this year for exemplary citizenship and growth. She has an affinity for music that was evident at her Grade 1 siddur ceremony, when she played Oseh Shalom on the keyboard at the grade-wide event.

But there is one aspect of her educational experience that is a first for a USDS student: Amanda is visually impaired because of a congenital eye condition.

Although Amanda has been at USDS' Beth Tzedec branch since junior kindergarten, Grade 1 brought new challenges because she was no longer in a "contained" space, said school head Lucy Cohen, referring in part to the need for older children to negotiate stairs. But with the help of teachers and fellow students when she is not using her cane, Amanda gets around the school without undue difficulty.

Amanda Shekarchi, left, sits with Ariella Garmaise, her Grade 3 reading buddy at a Friday morning Shabbat service at USDS earlier this year. [Frances Kraft photo]

Her Grade 1 Jewish studies teacher, Ora Senior, said she was excited to have Amanda as a student last year. The veteran educator, who has been at the school for 30 years, said she found it "stimulating" to have Amanda in her class, and she believes it was good for all the students.

Last summer, Senior bought plastic and wooden aleph-bet letters so Amanda could learn to identify them by touch while her classmates were learning visually. Senior said she wanted to make learning easier, and fun, for Amanda. Senior said she is just part of a team. Michal Gill, campus principal, said Amanda's Grade 1 general studies teacher, Jennifer Berger, also took initiatives to make Amanda's learning "more experiential," and added that her young classmates have a sense of her needs, and help her "in a nice and welcoming way."

Amanda, for her part, has visited grades 7 and 8 classes to share some of her Braille experiences, and explained to a visiting reporter how she uses her Brailler to create dots that form letters.

The school emphasizes the importance of helping friends as part of tikkun olam, Gill added.

USDS is trying to help Amanda and her family in a different way, by raising funds to facilitate Amanda's continued education at the school.

Amanda's mother, Sigal, and her father, Jimmy, who also have a younger daughter, are committed to providing Amanda with a Jewish education.

Their costs for next year, above and beyond tuition, include a three-hour-a-day Braille teacher and a special computer system to scan and read Amanda's homework, then print it in Braille. Her parents anticipate similar costs in the years ahead, which could triple the cost of her tuition.

"We are by nature very private people," said Sigal, who works with her husband in his automotive-parts business. However, the costs for Amanda's educational needs are daunting.

In publicly funded schools in Ontario, students who use Braille are entitled to an itinerant vision teacher for one to 10 hours a week, depending on their situation, said Carol Farrenkopf, co-ordinator of the vision program at the Toronto District School Board.

Specialized equipment – such as a tactile globe or atlas, or a Braille printer – may be purchased by the public school. A manual Braille writer runs about $1,300, and an automated one between $4,000 and $6,000, Farrenkopf said. The local school board pays the first $800 of an equipment claim; the rest is paid by Ontario's Ministry of Education.

Government funds, through one of the province's Community Care Access Centres, have enabled a "shadow" to assist Amanda for part of the school day, but specialized equipment and itinerant vision teachers are not provided for children in private schools.

The UJA Federation of Greater Toronto Board of Jewish Education provides subsidies for tuition relief, but there are no subsidies that would provide ongoing support for specialized equipment or staff, said the Board of Jewish Education's Debbie Gladstone, who has also tried to provide support in terms of locating financing. "We have a very small contingency fund for exceptional needs. They're one-off needs… but it's not an ongoing thing."

"We all believe in Amanda," said Cohen, "and in a larger way [in providing the same opportunities] for any exceptional child."

USDS is accepting donations on behalf of Amanda through its Above and Beyond Excellence Fund. Call Sheila Miller at 416-224-8737, ext. 140, or e-mail her at sheilam@usds.ca.

Court rules against two Nazi suspects

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A Federal Court judge has determined that Josef Furman and Jura Skomatchuk obtained Canadian citizenship by lying to authorities about their service in Nazi SS units during World War II.

The decision means they may lose their citizenship and be deported from Canada, though only two Nazi suspects who have lost in court have ever actually been removed.

In a judgement released late last week, Judge Judith Snider rule that Furman, 87, "was an SS guardsman of the Third Reich, during which time he was engaged in the elimination of the Warsaw and Bialystok ghettos and as a concentration camp guard. He failed to disclose that information to immigration officials at the time he came to Canada. In other words, Mr. Furman obtained his Canadian citizenship by false representation or fraud or by knowingly concealing material information."

In a separate judgement, Snider found that Skomatchuk, 85, "was an SS guardsman of the Third Reich and as such, was engaged as a concentration camp guard." Skomatchuk, too, failed to disclose that information to Canadian authorities. Furman was born in Ukraine and immigrated to Canada from Germany in 1949, where he had lived since 1942. He became a Canadian citizen in 1957. He currently resides in Edmonton in a long-term care facility and suffers from dementia.

Skomatchuk was born in Zabje, a town that is now part of Ukraine but was Polish territory at the time of his birth. He arrived in Canada in 1952 and became a citizen in 1957. Long retired, he worked in the mining industry. Neither suspect attended court during their trials.

With the court's decision against them, their files will now be turned over to Citizenship and Immigration Minister Monte Solberg. Under Canadian immigration rules, the minister makes a recommendation regarding revocation of citizenship, which is then considered by the federal cabinet. During that time, Furman and Skomatchuk can make submissions arguing why they should not lose their citizenship. Since 1995, 21 Nazi-era suspects have been brought before the justice system.

David Matas, senior legal counsel for B'nai Brith Canada, noted that "to date, there are four cases that are currently awaiting a decision of cabinet regarding revocation of citizenship where Federal Court rulings found the individuals entered Canada by deception. They are Wasyl Odynsky, Vladimir Katriuk, Jacob Fast and Helmut Oberlander. Eight others have died at various stages of the proceedings. We hope these decisions will pave the way for the immediate revocation of citizenship of these two individuals, leading to their swift deportation," Matas said. "Unfortunately, we have observed all too often in the past foot-dragging and lack of resolve to bring to justice Nazi criminals who have lied their way into Canada and have received safe haven in this country."

Matas suggested that "Canada's dysfunctional system for dealing with Nazi-era cases has made it a magnet for modern day war criminals."

Fraternity, sorority help students connect with heritage

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

AEPi members pose with their flag at a fundraising effort called a Steak-a-thon.

Jewish youth who want a new way to maintain a connection to their cultural background may want to look into the fraternity Alpha Epsilon Pi (AEPi) and its sorority counterpart Delta Pi.

"We provide something that has a strong cultural background and strong Jewish values, but is not overly religious or in-your-face Judaism," says Paul Hertz, 21, the outgoing president of AEPi and a biology major at York University.

"It's giving the middle ground that I don't think exists anywhere else."

Melissa Krackovitch, a York student and outgoing president of Delta Pi, says that while the sorority has both religious and secular members, it manages to meet somewhere in the middle.

"Everybody is really interested in getting to know about religion, but some people are more comfortable getting further into it than others," says Krackovitch, 23.

"There's not too much in the middle, but Delta Pi and AEPi offer that."

Delta Pi and AEPi's activities go well beyond typical frat and sorority fare such as all-night keg parties and mixers.

Members are more interested in learning about Judaism while putting into practice the Jewish principle of tikkun olam through extensive charity work, she says.

"Students join AEPi and Delta Pi because they're interested in connecting with their heritage."

Hertz says he lost a bit of his connection to Judaism after his bar mitzvah, and feels that's the case for a lot of the guys who join AEPi.

"When they get to university, they're a bit older, so they can decide for themselves what exactly they want, and I think what we have appeals to a lot of people.

"It's not overly religious, but you do get the cultural connection and you do meet a lot of people with the same kinds of interests, philosophies and ideas that you have," he says.

While there are a few Orthodox members of AEPi, most members are not extremely devout or observant.

"It's more of a cultural kind of connection that we have as opposed to a religious connection," says Hertz.

At Delta Pi, there is also a strong emphasis on connecting with Judaism on a cultural level and on learning about the religion in an open environment.

Krackovitch says that she joined the sorority because she was looking for a way to access her religion and culture while meeting new people and making York University "a little bit smaller."

She says Delta Pi appeals to young women "looking for a comfortable and fun way to access Judaism with people who are relaxed and want to do things on their own terms."

Krackovitch says that Jewish youth are interested in learning about their roots, but it can be difficult to find outlets that enable them to access their religion and culture in a comfortable environment.

"I think it's hard to find places that are comfortable if you haven't had a strong background in Jewish education," she says.

"It's not something where you have to know everything about Judaism or you have to know a certain amount and we just throw you in – it's something that we all do together," she says.

Both AEPi and Delta Pi bring in guest speakers for their members, and offer Jewish activities like Chanukah and Purim parties.

"We have a lot of Jewish events and we still kind of fine tune our events towards Judaism, but we don't go to synagogue and we don't have a Passover seder," says Hertz.

"We keep the traditional Jewish values and the cultural and those aspects of it without so much the religion."

Unlike AEPi, the girls of Delta Pi hold a seder every year, although it's a seder with a bit of a twist.

"Our favourite is the chocolate seder we have every year – we set it up like a seder and everything is chocolate," says Krackovitch.

The members of AEPi and Delta Pi are involved in charity work and contribute to both Jewish and non-Jewish charities.

Hertz says AEPi raises money on both a local and international level. A while back, the fraternity held a steak-eating contest to raise money for victims of Hurricane Katrina.

They've also raised money for Magen David Adom and recently they were a benefactor to two Ethiopian Jewish community centres in Israel.

At the local level, AEPi works with Baycrest, Ve'ahavta, UJA Federation, the United Way and the Canadian Breast Cancer Society. The fraternity also does a lot of work with Hillel.

"We try to keep our hands in philanthropy because we realize we're a large group of guys – we're Jewish men trying to be responsible for ourselves and trying to make a difference so we try to act on that as much as possible," says Hertz.

Delta Pi is also involved in charity work. The sorority raises money for Jewish organizations such as Ve'ahavta and non-Jewish organizations too. They hold an annual charity auction and all the proceeds are donated to Princess Margaret Hospital's breast cancer division. The sorority girls also participate in the Walk for Breast Cancer every year.

Although both AEPi and Delta Pi define themselves as a Jewish fraternity and Jewish sorority respectively, they are open to non-Jewish members.

The York University chapter of AEPi is 100 per cent Jewish, but overall the membership of the fraternity – which has about 130 chapters across North America – is about 95 per cent Jewish, according to Hertz. The York University chapter has about 50 members.

Delta Pi, which only has a chapter at York University, has about 30 members, of which four are non-Jewish. Membership is also open to non-York university students who are looking to join a Jewish sorority.

What links all the members is a shared desire to connect to Judaism in a way that's fun and relaxed, says Hertz.

"I think the traditional kind of Judaism doesn't have the same kind of attraction that it used to have," he says.

"People just don't see it as being necessarily that relevant - I just don't think people can relate to it as much."

He also sees young Jews as being somewhat polarized.

"Most of the people I know are either very religious or very non-religious. They're very observant or don't practice at all," says Hertz.

Krackovitch agrees there's not much in the middle. She sees Delta Pi and AEPi as filling that gap for young people in the community.

"We offer a comfortable atmosphere to learn more but at your own pace and at your own comfort level," she says.

Interpretations of Halachah becoming more stringent

Especially troubling to them are Rabbi Slifkin's assertions in The Science of Torah that the world was created not in six days, but over millions of years.

However, the young rabbi's profile remained relatively low in Toronto until his recent visit.

At that time, Rabbi Shlomo Miller, rosh kollel and av beis din (head of the institution and its rabbinical court) of Kollel Avreichim, issued "a letter of admonishment" stating that Rabbi Slifkin's opinions on the six days of creation were "definitely heretical," even "boorish."

Located on Coldstream Avenue in the heart of the haredi community near Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue, "the Kollel," as it's commonly known, is the leading haredi post-yeshiva educational institution in Toronto, and its rulings have come to exert significant influence in the Orthodox community.

(Rabbi Miller declined to speak directly to The CJN, saying that the media has misquoted and misunderstood him. However, he authorized Jonathan Ostroff, a computer science professor at York University, to speak on his behalf.)

Against the view of the Kollel and other haredi voices, Rabbi Slifkin and his supporters argue – to little avail – that rabbinic scholars from many years ago, including the Rambam, were the first to posit these ideas.

In Toronto, the controversial trend toward more stringent interpretations of halachah has been ongoing, with a decision this summer by the Toronto Vaad Hatzdokah, an independent board that certifies Jewish charity collectors, not to endorse any future female applicants, despite having done so before. The Vaad said the collection of tzadakah by women is halachically problematic for reasons having to do with modesty. In addition, moves by the Vaad Harabonim, Toronto's Orthodox rabbinic umbrella organization – such as challenging the city's longstanding eruv, a physically demarcated boundary around the city that allows Jews to carry things in public on Shabbat and Yom Tov – are being seen as an attempt to bring the community more in line with haredi ideals.

Jonathan Ostroff

Making the situation more volatile, many people in the Orthodox community are troubled by what appears to be a refusal of non-haredi rabbis and other Orthodox leaders to speak out against the situation.

Several people interviewed for this series expressed the view that many Orthodox rabbis and leaders are afraid of being censured by Rabbi Miller and the haredi community, and these sources contend this fear is behind the silence of Orthodox leaders.

It is this context – and our belief that issues that generate such vehemence should be discussed openly – that has led The CJN to investigate the situation.

Joseph Fried used to give charity "across the board" to all types of Orthodox institutions. But the 57-year-old Toronto lawyer no longer finds common language with much of the haredi community. An alumnus of Ner Israel Yeshiva, he says, "my mind is firmly in the Modern Orthodox camp, but alas, my soul is still tugged by the haredi world."

Fried likes to say that he is "intolerant of those that are intolerant." In January, he notified principals of two religiously right-wing Jewish schools that he was not prepared to continue providing them with pro bono legal services without "an unequivocal letter" indicating their support for Rabbi Slifkin.

In the preceding year, Fried did "a significant amount" of free legal work for the institutions, he said.

One school offered to pay him for his efforts, but he said he refused. "It's not about money," he insists.

"There is a distinct undercurrent of discontent and frustration among certain segments of the Orthodox community," said Fried, who maintains an active e-mail correspondence with several hundred people about issues in today's Orthodox world.

In Fried's view, the Slifkin affair is just one symptom of a larger, troubling move to the right in the Orthodox world, characterized by a haredi "delegitimization and intolerance of those – even if from their own community, like Rabbi Slifkin – who subscribe to views grounded in traditional rabbinic sources but not in consonance with current haredi ideology."

Although Fried is disheartened by the direction Orthodoxy has taken in recent years, he is not turning his back on observance. He is selective, however, about which Orthodox synagogues he will attend. But, he said, he has learned "not to confuse Judaism with certain haredi rabbinic authorities."

Fried believes that the current situation would not have been possible when Rabbi Gedalia Felder was alive, an opinion echoed by others interviewed for this article. The late Rabbi Felder – the former spiritual leader of Shomrai Shabbos Chevrah Mishnayos Congregation and the former rabbinic chair of the COR kashrut agency – had an "authoritative and tolerant voice" and "engaged the whole community," Fried said.

He added that he fears that the current trend toward conformity and stifling of centrist Orthodox opinions limits the possibility that haredi yeshivas will produce great thinkers or great religious leaders.

Rabbi Joseph Kelman, father of Rabbi Jay Kelman (who co-founded Torah in Motion) and rabbi emeritus of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, a traditional Conservative congregation in North York, remembers when Orthodox, Conservative and Reform rabbis sat together on a joint board in Toronto and discussed issues of mutual concern, including Israel, Russian Jewry and Jewish education. "Every pulpit rabbi in town was a member. We took turns serving as president. There was a feeling that we were part of the community, and that doesn't exist any more."

The elder Rabbi Kelman, a graduate of New York's Yeshiva University, widely considered the seat of Modern Orthodoxy, says the rightward shift in the Orthodox movement – in New York and other cities including Toronto – can be traced to the increased influence of non-pulpit rabbis and roshei yeshiva who have come to be regarded as "teachers and guides" to many Orthodox rabbis.

Rabbi Jay Kelman

In a 1994 article in Tradition magazine, which is now available online, Jewish history professor Haym Soloveitchik traced the origin of the "swing to the Right." He noted that during the course of the 20th century in North America, the lessening of "otherness" felt by Orthodox Jews, whose lifestyles and values increasingly came to mirror those of their non-Orthodox neighbours, resulted in a perceived need for greater observance in order to maintain distinctiveness.

In the process, traditional home practice, which was previously the main authority for religious observance, came to be re-evaluated through closer scrutiny of Jewish texts, which in turn led to more and more previously haredi stringencies being adopted by mainstream Orthodox Jews.

Some Orthodox rabbis are troubled by the current situation and would be interested in opening a dialogue on the issues.

> 'Modern Orthodoxy is 100 per cent committed to halachah but accepts the validity of both [the religious and the secular] worlds'

"I would have loved for Rabbi Miller or one of his supporters to have come and spoken in a respectful way on why he feels Rabbi Slifkin is wrong," said Rabbi Jay Kelman, referring to the program this past winter at Torah in Motion. "Our philosophy is to explore the issues that need exploring."

The Jewish people cannot afford to be divided, he said. "The pressure being borne is ultimately hurting our community. It's not allowing issues to be talked about. It's creating ill will."

His goal in addressing the issue publicly is "to try to make the situation better, and have an awareness in the community," he said. "I want to do what I believe is right. Only God is the ultimate judge."

The younger Rabbi Kelman believes that Modern Orthodoxy provides an important alternative to the haredi approach. "What I vehemently object to is saying that [haredi Judaism] is the only acceptable approach. For those who can't or don't want to live by that approach, we have to have a Modern Orthodox approach."

He says he understands but doesn't share the haredi approach of "ghettoizing" the Orthodox community.

Modern Orthodoxy is "100 per cent committed to halachah but accepts the validity of both [the religious and the secular] worlds," Rabbi Kelman said. And although he acknowledges the "real challenges" that exist in the secular world, he said there is also "much to be gained" from it. As well, he believes that "the more you engage with that, the more you have to be aware of the challenges, so you can properly deal with them."

Rabbi Kelman said he recalls a face-to-face meeting he had with Rabbi Miller four years ago, when the haredi leader tried unsuccessfully to persuade him not to appear on a panel with non-Orthodox rabbis on the subject of Torah being given from heaven. Their meeting was conducted "in a respectful way," Rabbi Kelman said.

"There are disagreements in the Orthodox world as to whether Orthodox rabbis should engage in dialogue on these issues," said Rabbi Kelman.

"Many of us feel, especially in today's world, that it's very important to explain to people an Orthodox view… Obviously I disagree with [the other panelists'] views. That's why I'm there."

• • •

Jonathan Ostroff, Rabbi Miller's spokesperson, said that Rabbi Miller had no connection with the original ban on Rabbi Slifkin's books, and had only issued his own "letter of admonishment" as a result of requests for his opinion on the subject from his own community. The letter was intended only for his followers, and not for the general Jewish community, Ostroff said.

Rabbi Slifkin's "misrepresentation" of the six days of creation, as described in the book of Genesis, compromises the core beliefs of Judaism, Ostroff said. Rabbi Miller, therefore, objects particularly to his work in kiruv (outreach). "Would you want your children to be taught by someone who misrepresents a core belief of Torah?" Ostroff asked.

Rabbi Miller, Ostroff said, is a follower of the Vilna Gaon, the 18th-century Talmudist, and thus is not opposed to science, as some have said, but is very interested in it. Ostroff said the rabbi, however, distinguishes between "operational science" and "origin science." Operational science, which Rabbi Miller accepts, examines how things work in the universe, while origin science looks at what caused things to begin. "It's the difference between building a bridge, and who came up with the original idea of a bridge," Ostroff said, adding that Rabbi Miller "objects to origin science, because it can't be studied empirically."

He said that in the rabbi's, and the Torah's, view, the world was created by supernatural means, by God, in six days. By the seventh day, when He rested, everything, from light and darkness to land and the seas to plants and animals to man, was in place. That, Ostroff said, is when operational science came into play.

* * *

One member of an Orthodox synagogue, who declined to be named, says he has never felt more alienated from the Orthodox community.

"The yeshiva world has taken over Orthodoxy," he said. "There is a drive within the yeshiva-oriented haredi establishment toward total self-isolation – socially, religiously and culturally – and the effect of this is to try and re-engineer the Orthodox community so that it is split between 'true Orthodoxy,' and 'go hang everyone else.'"

Evidence, he said, can be seen in the "overwhelming value" placed on conformity when it comes to attitude, belief, dress and behaviour. "Anyone in the Orthodox community who does not conform is clearly and increasingly an outsider."

He sees the controversy over Rabbi Slifkin as an example, suggesting that "to be an accepted member of the Orthodox community involve[s] a total rejection of contemporary science and the adoption of… a total suspension of reason… actually a hostility toward modern knowledge.

"The Orthodox community has a sort of atavistic tendency which seems to make the rejection of modernity an article of faith and a test of membership."

Haredi Judaism also rejects other aspects of contemporary life, including literature, openness and tolerance, he said.

"It's not a respectful refusal to engage. It is [that] the outside world is false and liars."

He added that he finds the recent emphasis on the kashrut of certain vegetables "scary."

Last year, 30 rabbis, mostly from North America and including Toronto's Rabbi Miller, issued a notice that even sealed packages of certain types of prewashed lettuce and salad mixes with rabbinic certification are "forbidden" unless they are thoroughly checked by "an expert in the specific types of bugs that infest these vegetables," because "insect infestation" has been found in these products.

'Anyone in the Orthodox community who does not conform is clearly and increasingly an outsider'

"[COR is] promoting the idea that this is the new and only acceptable standard of kashrut," said the Orthodox shul member, who wonders why this was not an issue for Jews before pesticides were developed.

Rabbi Mordechai Levin

But Rabbi Mordechai Levin, the executive director of the Kashruth Council of Canada, which issues the COR hechsher, said that changing times, changing technologies and changing public attitudes are responsible for what appears to be a more stringent approach to kashrut in Toronto.

He added that these stringencies on vegetables only apply to restaurants and caterers. "There are different issues at home [because of the smaller quantities of food involved]. At home, you can do what you want to."

The main reason that insects have emerged as a key problem, he said, is the drastic reduction in the use of pesticides in the past few years, resulting in many more bugs being found in raw fruits and vegetables. Some smooth-skinned fruits, such as apples, can be dealt with by careful washing, but many vegetables, including broccoli and romaine lettuce, are seen as problematic because bugs can become lodged in crevices.

Also, since there are many more kosher products available than there used to be, "we don't have to rely on leniencies, like we used to be able to," Rabbi Levin said. Also, he noted, Jews are more educated Jewishly and demand more strictness.

On the general subject of stringencies, Ostroff said that 80 years ago, Orthodoxy was moving to the left. Today, it's moving to the right. As an example, he noted that religious Zionists, including some in the Modern Orthodox camp, are questioning whether they should say Hallel, the psalms of praise said on Jewish holy days, on Yom Ha'atzmaut. "They are moving closer to the opinion of the haredim. It's all part of God's plan."

Stricter kashrut guidelines are part of this trend. Kashrut standards in the wider Orthodox community are moving closer to haredi views on questions such as the dangers of insect infestation in fruits and vegetables, Ostroff said. "This may appear to some to being a stringency. In fact, it is exactly what the Shulchan Aruch demands."

'No one was hiding behind their nationalities'

"For example, Palestinian researchers in Bethlehem are now surveying students about their knowledge, attitudes and sexual practices, at four major Palestinian universities. In Israel, we're trying to link up to that, because we've never really studied the university population. We've never really developed the tools or the instruments."

When asked about the political context of what he called an "unprecedented and quite unusual" meeting, Schenker stated it simply.

"We had Iran, Israel and Egypt at the same table. No one was hiding behind their nationalities. We are not politicians, we are researchers," he said. "We live in our respective countries and put our politics aside. I have my own views about the conflict, but that is irrelevant. What is more relevant is the ability to maintain a researcher's point of view and take it as far as possible when there is a true reason for co-operation – and there is."

While the Middle East may dominate headlines, the existence and spread of HIV/AIDS is relatively understudied by academics and NGOs, Dr. Sandy Sufian of the University of Illinois at Chicago told a GNR-MENA press conference the day after the meeting. As a result, donors pay little attention to the region, and political and financial resources are generally very low for care, education and prevention.

The number of HIV infections documented by UNAIDS in the Middle East and North Africa has risen from 210,000 in 1998 to 510,000 in 2005, a jump that GNR-MENA calls "alarming".

As well, women comprise 55 per cent of the cases, and the likeliest modes of transmission are heterosexual sex and intravenous drug use.

Iranian-born Dr. Navid Madani, a biochemist at the Harvard Medical School's Dana-Farber Cancer Institute, explained the importance of studying the epidemic in terms of the international community.

"Different types of HIV have been identified around the world, but we have not yet identified the type of HIV that exists in the Middle East and North Africa," Madani said.

"In order for us to have a comprehensive vaccine that can be used globally, we need to identify all types of HIV that are existent," she added. If all forms of HIV are not identified, then the global vaccine that scientists are trying to develop will not protect against HIV in the Middle East.

The scarcity of information about HIV in the region has to do with social realities in the Muslim world. "There is an enormous reluctance of governments to address sensitive issues, meaning looking at sexual behaviour of young people, whether they're married or unmarried," said Dr. Jocelyn DeJong of the American University of Beirut.

Dr. Ahmed Khamis, a recently graduated doctor from Egypt and director of reproductive health for the International Federation of Medical Students' Associations, is trying to recruit medical and other students around the world who are interested in doing HIV/AIDS research in the region under the auspices of GNR-MENA's youth division.

"Youth involvement is quite essential," Khamis said. "Sexual health education is underdeveloped [in the Middle East and North Africa] and youth are not getting the proper information, or no information at all."

In Iran, activities for HIV/AIDS education and prevention "are considered to be one of the best in the region," said Dr. Amir Reza Morad, a member of the Iranian National AIDS Committee and managing director of the Iranian Positive Life NGO.

In Iran's larger cities, such as Tehran and Shiraz, "there are therapies for intravenous drug abusers, educational programs for street children – especially on HIV/AIDS and sexual reproductive health – and education of university students," Morad said. "But in rural areas, we don't have many NGOs working, due to a lack of human resources and funds."

Dr. Eisa Hamouda, director of surveillance, monitoring and evaluation for the Sudan National AIDS Control Program, said that about three per cent of the general population of Sudan lives with HIV. "We have to depend on external funding, because the [Sudanese government's] political commitment is not translated into funds," Hamouda said.

Schenker of Hebrew U told The CJN that Israel is unique in the Middle East when it comes to HIV/AIDS research.

"We know a lot more about HIV in Israel because a) we are a more open society, b) there is more in terms of research, and c) there is a surveillance system in place which is not in place in other countries," he said.

In fact, Israel was one of the first 12 countries to implement a comprehensive AIDS education program in its school system, in 1987, Schenker said.

"But the Israeli situation is very particular in another way. Israel is the only country in the world that actively brings a huge population from Africa into its borders [from Ethiopia], of which quite a large number are infected with HIV – and we know they are infected – and Israel gives them free treatment."

In the Palestinian territories, though, HIV is a big stigma, Schenker said. "Homosexuality is illegal in PA areas. With this conflict situation, then of course comprehensive treatment is not high on the agenda of the Palestinian Authority's ministry of health."

Vancouver hosts JCC Maccabi games

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to the CJN

VANCOUVER — Last week's JCC Maccabi Games in Vancouver marked the first time that Western Canada was given the chance to host the annual event.

Some 1,600 teenage athletes converged on the city for the 24th games, coming from from as close as Los Angeles and as far away as Australia, Israel, the United Kingdom and Mexico for what is the largest annual gathering of Jewish teens in the world. (To add perspective, the 2010 Winter Olympics in Whistler are expected to host approximately 2,500 athletes.)

The Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver was one of three hosts for this year's games, sharing the honour with JCCs in Phoenix and Stamford, Conn. A fourth host, the JCC of New Orleans, was forced to cancel its participation after Hurricane Katrina.

"Seeing all these Jewish teens from around the world was fascinating," said Alex Fleshner, 14, a Beverly Hills teen who competed in basketball. "Everything about it was great… it was just a great experience"

Ranging in age from 13 to 16 years, the athletes took part in 13 sports – including basketball, soccer, golf, baseball and hockey – at the Aug. 13 to 18 games.

They also spent time away from sports to immerse themselves in activities aimed at promoting tikkun olam, a concept that is essential to the spirit of the games. The activities included visiting senior centres and a recycling facility, discussing ecology and weeding ivy with members of the Stanley Park Ecological Society.

Members of the Vancouver Jewish community supplied host housing for the athletes, while the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver created an efficient bus service that schlepped kids to and from the various events. Some 800 volunteers of all ages from Vancouver's Jewish community helped out with the games.

Colin Powell salutes Harper's pro-Israel stand

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The honoree was billionaire builder and philanthropist David J. Azrieli, but most of the accolades went to Stephen Harper at last week's Jewish National Fund of Montreal Negev Dinner.

Guest speaker, former U.S. secretary of state Colin Powell, praised the Canadian government for its support of Israel in its battle against Hezbollah, and Public Works Minister Michael Fortier received a standing ovation for reaffirming the prime minister's stand. Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker also thanked Harper for his support.

"As the former secretary of state, I am not authorized to speak for the government, but I will anyway. We have the deepest admiration for the courageous position [Harper] has taken by standing steadfast with Israel," Powell said.

He said that Israel had the right to respond with force against the "terrorist" Hezbollah's threat to Israel's sovereignty.

"The ceasefire agreement will only be meaningful if the Lebanese government takes hold of the country's south, the United Nations forces are effective and not like the failed UNIFIL mission, and Syria and Iran can be persuaded through all political pressure that it is not in their interests to be supporting terrorists."

He thinks that Israel will continue to have strong support, not only from the U.S. government, but from the American people because of their "deep-seated" faith in the region's sole democracy.

"Let us pray that gifted statesmen can come together and push the peace process. No one's child, in Israel or Lebanon, should be fearful of a rocket or terrorist attack. All children should have a better future without war. Shalom."

Powell, who left the White House in January 2005, commented briefly on the approximately 200 demonstrators on the street outside the Queen Elizabeth Hotel, who angrily denounced him as a war criminal for allegedly misleading the United Nations on the presence of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, which was a pretext for the American invasion, and for speaking at an event in support of Israel.

"The demonstrators should feel very privileged to be in a country where such demonstrations are permitted. That is what we are fighting for around the world," he said.

But he also stressed the importance of the United States remaining welcoming to Muslim immigrants because they will "learn our real value system" in that way.

Powell, who underwent surgery on a torn Achilles tendon the day before, almost didn't make it to Montreal. "The doctors ordered me not to travel, but I said, 'No way; I'm going to Montreal." He was brought into the ballroom in a wheelchair and sat during his address.

He said his single greatest wish is to see a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. He still hopes that "the responsiblity of governing" will moderate Hamas' violent ways.

On Iraq, Powell suggested the American public is "reaching the limit of its patience" in seeing its troops dying in what has become "sect-on-sect violence," but that the United States cannot withdraw until the Iraqi government is strong enough to contain it themselves.

On tensions with Iran, he surmised that the solution will "ultimately be diplomatic."

Appearing relaxed and exhibiting a sense of humour that contrasted with his stern public image while in office, Powell gave a wide-ranging talk on his encounters with world leaders, the adjustments he has made in returning to private life, and the challenges of aging.

Particularly pleasing to the audience of 700 were his reminiscences about the kindness and influence of his Jewish neighbours while growing up as the son of Jamaican immigrants, in New York's South Bronx. He demonstrated that he had not lost the Yiddish he picked up while working as a youth for a Russian-Jewish store owner for seven years, a man he credits with being the most influential in his life after his family.

In a brief encounter with reporters, Powell commented that he respected the demonstrators' right to protest but was concerned by the presence of Hezbollah flags among the crowd.

Over the course of the noisy but orderly two-hour demonstration, at least four Hezbollah flags were observed, along with the Lebanese, Palestinian and Iraqi flags. The protesters also called for JNF's charitable tax status to be removed because they charged that it has confiscated land from Palestinians and has been engaged in "ethnic cleansing" since the creation of the Jewish state.

Police presence was heavy, including officers in riot gear, but there were no incidents. The demonstration was organized by PAJU (Palestinian and Jewish Unity) the same group that has held weekly vigils outside the Israeli consulate for more than five years.

The only public figure present was Amir Khadir, a founder and spokesperson for the new provincial political party, Quebec Solidaire.

At the dinner, Fortier reiterated that Israel had every right to defend itself after Hezbollah's unprovoked aggression inside Israel's borders. "Those who choose to build will always win over terrorists who choose to destroy."

He ridiculed the opposition's response to the conflict as "obscure doctrines that, to put it generously, are absurd.

"Being friends with everybody regardless of the circumstances is not sound foreign policy. At best, it's a sound-bite."

He said the international community "cannot tolerate Hezbollah's acting as a state within a state" and that Canada "must always stand up for Israel's safety in secure borders."

The evening got off on a political note when, to enthusiastic applause, JNF Montreal president Joe Kislowicz said that "my traditional political allegiances that I grew up with were shaken when our new prime minister had the moral courage to look terrorism in the eye and call it what it is" and to maintain his pro-Israel position despite "unrelenting political pressure," as Liberal Senator Yoine Goldstein, a longtime JNF leader, looked on from the head table. Federal ethics commissioner Bernard Shapiro, the Negev honoree two years ago, was the master of ceremonies.

Proceeds from the evening will go toward the construction of a 2,000-seat outdoor amphitheatre in Be'er Sheva for the holding of concerts and other cultural events.

Azrieli said he chose a project in the Negev, where he has been a developer for some 20 years, because of its rapid growth due to immigration. It currently has no such facility. The amphitheatre will be the centrepiece of the new 11-km Be'er Sheva River Park.

Azrieli, 84, is credited with changing the skyline of Israeli cities over the past quarter-century, from the building of the country's first western-style shopping mall in Jerusalem to his crowning achievement, Tel Aviv's triple-towered Azrieli Centre, the tallest manmade structure in the Middle East.

"Israel's pioneering days are not over," Azrieli said, adding that the modern chalutz is not draining swamps and planting trees. Today's chalutz is anyone who is making Israel more competitive in global markets, whether by advancing technology, designing better products or selling Israeli goods abroad.

"Israel is often-described as threatened, besieged, isolated. But that is far from the truth. Israel is a modern society with a mind-boggling infrastructure. And Jews are a people of hope, and also hard work, and dedication," he said.

It was announced that next year's Negev Dinner honoree is Sylvain Abitbol, a past president of FEDERATION CJA

Hezbollah is about hate, not resistance

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In the immediate aftermath of the conflict between Israel and Hezbollah, as a fragile UN-brokered ceasefire moves into place, we are seeing a distinction between news reports that often describe Hezbollah as a social movement committed to helping Lebanese who have lost their homes and analytical pieces that delve deeper to identify the terrorist aims of an organization committed, with the backing of Iran, to the eradication of Israel and the murder of Jews.

Typical of the news coverage is an Aug. 15 report on the National by the CBC's Nahlah Ayed: "Last week, Hezbollah was shooting rockets into Israel. Today it was in the role of benefactor to the Lebanese. It chose its stronghold in shattered southern Beirut to begin its new campaign. To the thousands who lost so much in the conflict, the group has made a promise: their homes will be rebuilt and their rent paid until that happens."

Viewers are then shown a Hezbollah official, identified as a "council member," who promises that "we'll rebuild the good life that we seek."

Ayed adds: "It will be a huge job and it will take time. The tab will be in the billions and money won't fix some of the damage."

Yet Ayed avoids the harder questions: Where will the "billions" of dollars come from? And if Hezbollah sought a "good life" for the Lebanese, why did it provoke a war with Israel? For answers, we need to look elsewhere.

In "What Hezbollah wants" (National Post, Aug. 5), Robert Fulford writes: "The warriors of Hezbollah, Party of God, are serious men fighting a serious war, but what inspires them? Among guerilla gangs, they are top of the class: obedient, clever, efficient, secretive and of course, willing to sacrifice themselves and their families. They are not afraid of death, nor do they show pity for neighbours killed when they hide military operations among women and children. Clearly, the Hezbollah are driven by much more than salaries received from Iran."

As Fulford explains, the members of Hezbollah are driven by a religious fanaticism: "Hezbollah wants an Islamic world and believes such a world is worth killing and dying for."

Melanie Phillip's column "Hezbollah cells await Iran's orders" (the Spectator, Aug. 5) clearly describes Hezbollah as "a military force funded, trained by and answerable to the Islamic Republic of Iran. The Iran that is pledged – as it has been since the Khomeini revolution of 1979 – to the destruction of Israel and the genocide of the Jews, as a prelude to destroying the West and infidels everywhere."

This criticism should be extended to others, such as Beirut Daily Star editor-at-large Rami Khouri, whose Aug. 16 Globe and Mail opinion piece, "On a clear Mideast day, you can see the furies to come," describes Hezbollah as "an anti-occupation resistance group" in addition to being "a political party" and an "Islamist movement." Khouri's omission of Hezbollah's primary involvement in violence and terrorism is glaring.

In May 2000, Israel withdrew from Lebanon in accordance with United Nations resolutions. So what exactly is Hezbollah resisting? Phillips writes that Hezbollah's "principal targets… are Jews. This is in accordance with the core belief that drives the global jihad: that the West is a conspiracy to destroy Islam and that the puppet-masters of the West and the embodiment of cosmic evil who must therefore be obliterated are the Jews."

Some journalists may continue to romanticize Hezbollah as a benevolent liberation movement. But they should bear in mind the racist declaration by its leader, Hassan Nasrallah, that Phillips cites: "If we searched the entire world for a person more cowardly, despicable, weak and feeble in psyche, mind, ideology and religion, we would not find anyone like the Jew. Notice I do not say the Israeli."

Future of historic cottage under discussion

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

BRONTE, Ont. — The future of Glendella House, a historic cottage in Bronte, Ont. that once served as a summer rest home for Jewish mothers and children from Toronto, is under discussion as the Ontario Municipal Board (OMB) decides whether to allow a developer to move the 161-year-old heritage structure to accommodate two proposed high-rise towers.

Built in 1845 in what is now west Oakville, the large cottage is located directly opposite Bronte Heritage Park on the Lake Ontario waterfront. It served for generations as a hotel and stagecoach stop and in the 1920s and '30s as the Mothers and Babes Summer Rest Home for poor Jewish families from Toronto.

The town of Oakville designated Glendella as "a property of historic and architectural value and interest" in 1987. Even so, the OMB opened a hearing into the cottage's fate in July but postponed it until October to allow time for completion of a heritage report.

Mary Ann Joyce, the widow who once owned Glendella, rented it and two smaller cottages to the Hebrew Maternity Aid Society each summer, beginning in 1922.

The facility offered "a ray of hope" to the hundreds of mothers and children brought there from their "cramped quarters in the poorer districts of our city," according to a society report of the '20s.

The volunteer-run facility could accommodate about 60 mothers and children at a time; about 900 visited during its first five summers, most for a stay of 10 to 14 days. The hope was that they would receive enough "good food, scientific care, healthful air and pleasant surroundings" to tide them through the winter.

Glendella Cottage
[Courtesy Milton Historical Society]

The moms and babes enjoyed organized picnics, concerts, games with prizes, Yiddish folk-singing circles, story hours, health talks and other activities. By the end of their stays, they were "sent home improved in health and spirit to once more enable them to go through their trials in life."

The society worked hard to raise funds for the home, which also received support from the Toronto Star Fresh Air Fund. In 1926 president Dora Till raised about $5,000 and the Star donated another $2,000.

Ethel Raicus, a former principal of Holy Blossom Temple's Hebrew school, told the Oakville Beaver about her memories of the home in November 2005. Raicus, who died in April 2006, recalled that her mother was one of only two paid staff at the home and had been employed there as a cook from 1927 to 1939. She had taken the job "because she wanted me to have fresh air and this was her way of doing it," she recalled.

Many undernourished women would gain up to 10 pounds during meals in Glendella's three large dining rooms, Raicus said. "They were hungry the rest of the year. My mother used pure butter in her cooking and we would go out on the pier to get fresh fish."

The children also arrived hungry and ate heartily, she remembered. "The whole idea of this camp was to give these women an opportunity to gain a little strength. The kids were kept away from their mothers as much as possible so they could get some rest."

By 1940 the rest home's situation had become anything but restful, according to a letter from the Hebrew Maternity Aid Society to the United Jewish Welfare Fund, preserved in the Ontario Jewish Archives.

It wasn't just that the building had deteriorated. Far more troublesome was that the Jewish tenants had become "the target of growing anti-Semitic comment and action" during the '30s.

"The Mothers and Babes Rest Home is situated on the public highway in the very centre of the town, thereby attracting the constant attention of the townspeople," the society noted, adding that some people had attempted "to force the owners to refuse rental of the property to us."

Simultaneously, the society had evidently been barred from renting other sites: "With the advent of Hitlerism we were faced with growing land restrictions on sites which we considered desirable."

In 1941 the society terminated its relationship with Glendella in favour of another property on Lake Simcoe. Sixty-five years later, the cottage's significant period of service to the Jewish community still deserves to be remembered.

Some heritage-minded citizens assert that Glendella is too important to be moved from its present location on Ontario and Jones streets to another spot on the parcel of land known as the Bronte quadrangle.

"Until that [heritage] report comes in, no one knows what will happen, whether the house will stay in its present location or be moved elsewhere on the site," said Liz Behrens, executive director of the village's Business Improvement Area. "Either way, it's definitely staying. It's just a question of where."

Argentine named head of Wpg. Bonds office

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Ariel Karabelnicoff, a native of Argentina who made aliyah in his teens and was once an aide to an Israeli cabinet minister, is the new director of State of Israel Bonds' Winnipeg office.

Karabelnicoff spent 14 years in Israel before coming to Winnipeg via Argentina in 2002. For the past couple of years, he has been working for an investment firm in the city.

"I'm very excited about the opportunity to work for Israel Bonds," said Karabelnicoff who started his new position Aug. 1. "I consider myself an Israeli who is living here, and I welcome the chance to help Israel, particularly in this time of need."

Karabelnicoff made aliyah when he was 18 and later studied political science at Hebrew University. In 1993, he returned for a period to Argentina with his wife, Gabriella, to work in marketing.

The couple then spent a year in England, where Karabelnicoff studied English and business. They returned to Israel in 1996, and Karabelnicoff underwent army training and served in the reserves in the territories.

In the late 1990s, he worked as a political aide and researcher for Labor politician and cabinet minister Shlomo Ben Ami (who was later appointed Israel's ambassador to Spain). Karabelnicoff said he helped prepare legal drafts having to do with day care and was involved in foreign policy issues and election reform.

In 2000, he left government service to become the marketing director for a major international company. A year after taking on the job, the firm went through a reorganization that resulted in him being let go.

Karabelnicoff then set himself up as a management consultant, but his father-in-law invited him to come back to Argentina to join him in his auto parts business.

"We arrived back in Argentina on Sept. 4, 2001," Karabelnicoff said. "Then the twin towers were attacked and everything changed. My father-in-law put his expansion plans on hold."

With Argentina soon undergoing economic and social turmoil, the Karabelnicoffs looked to Canada for a fresh start.

"We had heard about the Winnipeg Jewish community's efforts to attract Argentinian immigrants," he said.

"Canada seemed like the kind of place where if you had the talent, you could make something from nothing. I like the challenge of starting new."

Karabelnicoff said he's looking forward to the challenge of increasing sales of Israel Bonds in Manitoba.

"Last year, we sold $1.5 million in bonds in Winnipeg," he said. "I would like to double that figure. I am working on some new marketing strategies."

Karabelnicoff views this period as a critical time in Israel's history, the most difficult time since 1948. "I feel that I have been entrusted with a mission coming to work for Israel Bonds," he said.

Post columnist accused of defaming all Quebecers

Alleges an independent Quebec would not designate Hezbollah as terrorist

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste has lodged a complaint with the Quebec Press Council against the National Post because of an Aug. 9 column by Barbara Kay in which she speculates that an independent Quebec would not designate Hezbollah as terrorist in part because of the historic anti-Semitism of the province's intellectual class.

Jean Dorion, president of the ultra-nationalist, sovereigntist SSJB, said Kay has defamed all Quebecers.

Under the headline "The rise of Quebecistan," the Montreal-based Kay accused the Quebec politicians who took part in the large antiwar Aug. 6 rally in Montreal and who endorsed its prior statement condemning Israel of "stok[ing] fires of enthusiasm for Hezbollah" for political gain, especially among the growing number of Arab groups.

Her main targets were Parti Québécois leader Andre Boisclair and Bloc Québécois leader Gilles Duceppe, as well as the new left-wing sovereigntist party, Québec Solidaire. Federal Liberal MP Denis Coderre also participated in the rally, which Kay characterizes as "pro-terrorist," although only a small number of the flags and other images of Hezbollah were present in the rally of some 15,000 people.

She suggests that these politicians are following in the tradition of the left-wing Quebec intelligentsia. "Their cultural and historical sympathy for Arab countries from the Francophonie – Morocco, Algeria, Lebanon – joined with reflexive anti-Americanism and a fat streak of anti-Semitism has marbled the intellectual discourse of Quebec throughout its history, has made Quebec the most anti-Israel of the provinces, and therefore the most vulnerable to tolerance for Islamist terrorist sympathizers."

She accuses the Quebec politicians of being "not too morally fussing" and of selling their souls to get votes.

"This article is a a case of pure defamation against an entire people," Dorion said. "Its author seems to ignore that the legislature of Lower Canada (today's Quebec) was the first in the whole British Empire to recognize the civic equality of Jews, at the instigation of the nationalists led by Louis-Joseph Papineau.

"She also appears to equally forget that the anti-Semitism that soiled all Western societies between the two world wars was more virulent and violent in English Canada than in Quebec, as many authors have shown."

Dorion added that Kay did not take into account the participation of Jews in the rally, "many of whom were very identifiable, and whom the crowd roundly applauded."

Dorion was referring to the participation of a group of haredi Jews associated with the anti-Zionist Neturei Karta faction who marched prominently in the rally. One held aloft a prayer shawl with the words "defiled by Zionism's crimes" written on it.

According to Dorion, the "tiny" number of Hezbollah flags among a demonstration by 15,000 people, many of whom were mourning the bombardment of their country of origin, does not give Kay the right to denounce Boisclair, Duceppe and the others as "shameless Quebec politicians who led the pro-terrorist rally."

Dorion noted that the attempts by some in the rally to get others to join them in pro-Hezbollah chants fell flat.

Kay told The CJN that she received a large amount of e-mail, almost all of it from Quebecers, after the column appeared, and "90 per cent of its very angry, some of it you could call hate." One suggested Jews should not be permitted to own newspapers in Canada, an apparent reference to the Asper family's ownership of the Post.

Most accused her of disparaging Quebecers in general, but what disturbed her most is the "profound and depressing ignorance" many respondents showed about Israel and the nature of its conflict with Hezbollah.

"Most see Israel as responsible for mass killings on the flimsy pretext of two soldiers being captured. They don't have a clue about the wider issues, and not one mentioned Iran or Syria," she said.

Her column was the subject of a radio talk show and many of those who wrote to her apparently had not actually read what she wrote, she said.

Kay added that she did not receive a single communication from anyone who is identifiably Muslim or of Arab origin, nor did she hear from representatives of the BQ or PQ.

She remains critical of the politicians because "not one took the trouble to dissociate themselves" from the pro-Hezbollah presence in the rally. Particularly worrisome for Kay is the "silence" of the federal Liberal party on its endorsement of an anti-Israel statement issued by the organizers of the rally beforehand.

The Post's comment pages editor Jonathan Kay, who is Kay's son, wrote in an e-mail that the SSJB's complaint "appears to be a rebuttal to the substance of the article in question. But the SSJB doesn't seem to be making a case that the contents of the article were actually racist or hateful, which is usually what is alleged in this sort of complaint."

The Quebec Press Council is a watchdog panel that can issue decisions based on complaints about member papers. Its rulings carry no legal weight.

In a related development, veteran Quebec actor Julien Poulin issued an apology for being photographed waving a Hezbollah flag in the rally. In a statement issued through his agent Marcel Hubert, Poulin said he had been waving a Quebec flag and was apparently photographed by the media after a Hezbollah sympathizer switched flags with him for "a brief instant."

Poulin, who has starred in the popular Elvis Gratton movies, said he supports neither Israel nor Hezbollah, and took part in the rally to show solidarity with the Montreal Al-Akhrass family, whose members were killed during Israel's bombardment, and other Montrealers who have lost relatives in the conflict, as well as to support a ceasefire.

JNF to train aboriginals in greenhouse operation

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Under the leadership of Rami Kleinmann, Jewish National Fund's shaliach for the Prairie provinces, the organization has forged strong relationships with the Italian community, Christian groups and business leaders.

Along with local JNF leadership, Kleinmann, JNF's national shaliach for the past year, has also been involved in negotiating a research partnership agreement between JNF Canada and the governments of Alberta and Manitoba.

With the visit late last month of Dr. Avi Gafni the JNF Israel research consultant to four northern Manitoba aboriginal communities, the latter agreement is about to bear its first fruits.

Gafni is recommending that in northern communities the JNF assist in establishing greenhouses that would produce fresh vegetables for the local inhabitants.

By selling the produce outside the aboriginal villages they could also generate cash flow.

"We strongly believe that this technology can be adopted in many First Nations locales. It could build the market [and increase] awareness of the benefits of freshly produced, highly nutritious vegetables," he wrote in his report following the trip north.

Gafni was accompanied on his trip by Graham Dixon, JNF president for the Prairie provinces, and Gordon Wakeling, senior government official in charge of the First Nations affairs.

The three-man mission visited the communities of Fisher River, Grand Rapids, Norway House and Lynn Lake.

In his report on the trip, Gafni noted that their goals were: "to acquaint ourselves with the most urgent needs of the First Nations people in the domains of the environment, water, soil conservation, agriculture, forestry, fishery and social life; to obtain basic knowledge of the geographical, physical and environmental conditions of each of the four First Nations communities considered for a pilot project; to decide on the project with the greatest economic potential, social, health and other welfare benefits for the Aboriginal communities; and to create working relationships with the chiefs and counsellors of the First Nations."

Gafni commented on the hospitality the three visitors received as well as the depressed state of the economy in the communities.

Despite that, he wrote, "There is an inherent, yet dormant ambition to bolster the local economy, raise the standard of living, and build the people's trust in their own human resources and in the potential of the natural resources in their territory."

He said the community leaders were highly motivated people with a sincere drive to alleviate the social, economic, health and environmental conditions of the communities they represent.

He noted that "the deteriorating health situation is of great concern to health workers, parents and the leaders."

He also suggested that the first of the greenhouses be established as a pilot project at Grand Rapids because of its location and the proximity to a free energy supply compliments of a Manitoba Hydro hydroelectric plant nearby.

Both Gafni and Graham Dixon singled out Grand Rapids' Grand Chief Ovide Mercredi – the former Grand Chief for Canada – for his enthusiastic support of the greenhouse idea.

Dixon said Mercredi sent an e-mail "telling us how happy he is to have such friends. He is ready to go to Israel with some of his people for training as soon as we can arrange it. The only thing holding this project back is that the people who have to approve it are on summer holidays."

Dixon reported that a meeting with the provincial government is scheduled for later this month. Gafni sees the pilot project in Grand Rapids only as a start and as an ideal place to demonstrate the merits and the potential of the greenhouse technology.

"Once the first greenhouse project proved successful and working relationships are established between Israel and Manitoba, there is room to consider other collaborative projects for the benefits of both parties, he noted.

"The potential domains of co-operation are unlimited. Forestry, groundwater exploration, water treatment, fishery, ameliorating green technologies and soil conservation are just a sample."

Kosher wine shortage hits Russia

By YASHA LEVINE
JTA

MOSCOW — As a result of a bureaucratic blunder, new regulations are keeping imported wines and spirits off the Russia market this summer.

While the shortage may only be a minor problem for the mostly vodka-drinking Russian population, it could turn into a real issue for religiously observant Russian Jews.

Until the ban on Georgian and Moldovan alcohol imports was implemented earlier this year, the Russian Jewish community relied on a steady source of inexpensive Moldovan-produced kosher wine.

Since the ban, Jews have had to switch to Israeli and French kosher wine because Russia doesn't produce any homegrown kosher wine.

The shelves at Moscow's Chabad-run kosher supermarket are now devoid of kosher wine. The extensive selection of kosher wines that once occupied a large portion of the store's shelf space is now taken up by bottles of kosher grape juice.

The store's importer promised a wine shipment by July 20, but the date came and went without any new wine.

But at recent Shabbat services at Marina Roscha, Moscow's largest synagogue and community centre, rituals proceeded as usual. Other synagogues across Moscow also have enough wine for their kiddush cups.

According to a source within Marina Roscha, the synagogue has enough old stock to keep going for some time, although technically, its use may not be entirely legal.

But no one seems to mind.

Artem Vitkin, a young Moscow filmmaker and a religiously observant Jew, doesn't consider the lack of kosher wine from Moldova a problem.

"We don't drink [kosher wine] because we love wine," Vitkin said, explaining that his family uses it mostly for ritual purposes.

So far, his stock has lasted. But if he runs out, he could call upon the small kosher wine black market – if it can be called that – that has sprung up in Moscow's religious circles.

Vitkin hinted that kosher wine could be obtained easily in a local synagogue.

But for those squeamish about breaking the law, there is nothing wrong with drinking kosher grape juice instead of wine to sanctify Shabbat or other Jewish holidays, says Aaron Gurevich, an Orthodox rabbi who heads two small Jewish communities on the outskirts of Moscow.

With the wine shortage, that should mean that bottles of kosher grape juice are selling like hotcakes. But according to a salesclerk at Moscow's only kosher supermarket, the $3 bottles, imported from Israel, have not seen any increase in sales. This is likely a sign that either observant Jews have stocked up in preparation for the wine crisis or have sanctified the shadowy kosher wine economy for the sake of honouring Shabbat.

The new law was enacted in good faith to fight corruption, and the snag is sure to blow over.

But the situation isn't likely to be resolved for several weeks.

According to experts in the importing business, all imported alcohol, including kosher wine, is expected to start appearing on the market in September.

And when it does, it's expected to rise in price by 30 per cent.

Barley is a whole grain wonder that tastes great

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Barley is an especially good grain to include in your diet because it's a great source of both soluble and insoluble dietary fibre. It's good for the digestive tract because it supplies roughage, and its soluble fibre helps lower blood cholesterol levels.

Barley provides a good source of energy since carbohydrates constitute 80 per cent of the barley kernel.

All this is a plus to the fact that barley just tastes great no matter how you make it. The following recipes should give you a head start on increasing your grain intake as well as giving you a tasty alternative to potatoes and rice.

APPLE BARLEY KUGEL

8 oz. plain yogurt (low fat may be used)
1 cup lowfat cottage cheese
¾ cup egg substitute or 6 egg whites
¼ cup light corn syrup
1 tsp. vanilla
1 tsp. cinnamon
3 cups cooked barley
1½ cups finely chopped apples
1 cup raisins
2 tbsp. sugar

In a large bowl combine yogurt, cottage cheese, egg substitute, corn syrup, vanilla and ½ tsp. cinnamon; mix well. Stir in barley, apples and raisins; mix well. Spread into greased 11-x-7 in. baking dish. Sprinkle evenly with combined sugar and remaining ½ tsp. cinnamon. Bake about 35 minutes at 350 or until edges are set and knife inserted in center comes out clean. Let stand 30 minutes. Serve warm or cold. Store covered in refrigerator. Serves 10 to 12

BAKED BARLEY WITH ALMONDS

1 cup barley
2 cups chicken broth
vegetable cooking spray
1 cup chopped onion
2 cups mushrooms, sliced
1 cup celery, diced
½ cup green pepper, diced
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper
3 tbsp. slivered almonds, toasted

Preheat oven to 350. Spread the barley on a non-greased baking sheet and bake at 350 for 8 min. until lightly browned. In a sauce pan combine the toasted barley and chicken broth and bring to a boil. Cover, reduce heat, & simmer until barley is tender & broth is absorbed. Coat a nonstick skillet with cooking spray. Add vegetables & saute until tender. Combine barley, vegetables and the salt and pepper in a 1½ qt. casserole coated with cooking spray. Cover and bake at 350 for 50 min. Let sit for 3 minutes, top with the toasted almonds and then serve. Serves 6 to 8

BARLEY AND PINE NUT CASSEROLE

1 cup pearl barley
¼ cup + 2 tbsp. margarine – divided
⅓ cup pine nuts
1 medium onion – chopped
½ cup fresh parsley – minced
¼ cup fresh chives – minced
¼ tsp. each salt and pepper
3½ cups beef or chicken broth (or vegetable broth)
fresh parsley sprigs

Preheat oven 350. Rinse barley in cold water; drain well. Set aside. Melt 2 tbsp. margarine in a medium skillet over medium heat; add pine nuts and cook until lightly toasted, stirring constantly. Remove pine nuts with a slotted spoon; set aside. Heat remaining ¼ cup margarine in skillet until melted; add reserved barley and onion. Cook, stirring constantly, until barley is lightly toasted and onion is tender. Remove from heat; stir in toasted pine nuts, parsley, chives, salt and pepper. Spoon barley mixture into a 1½ qt. casserole.

Barley and Wild Rice Pilaf as seen in The Healthy Slow Cooker by Judith Finlayson, Robert Rose publishers.

Bring beef or chicken broth to a boil in a medium saucepan; pour broth over barley mixture in casserole and stir well. Bake, uncovered, at 375 for 1 hour and 10 minutes or until barley is tender and liquid is absorbed. Garnish casserole with fresh parsley sprigs, if desired. 6 to 8 servings.

ASIAN BARLEY PILAF

2 tbsp. olive oil
1 medium onion – chopped
1 tsp. garlic – minced
1½ cups pearl barley
½ tsp.sesame oil
2 cups vegetable broth or chicken broth
¼ cup soy sauce
¼ cup water
1 tbsp. margarine
8 oz. fresh mushrooms, sliced
1tbsp. minced fresh thyme or 1 tsp. dried
1 tbsp. broth for deglazing pan – (1 to 2)
3 green onions – sliced, include half the dark green stalks freshly ground black pepper

Preheat oven to 350. In an oven proof casserole or Dutch oven, heat 1½ tbsp. of olive oil on medium heat. Add onions and garlic; cook until softened, about 4 minutes. Increase heat to medium-high and add barley. Cook, stirring frequently, for 5 minutes. Increase heat to high; add sesame oil and 1½ cups of broth and all the water and soy sauce. Bring the mixture to a boil. Remove from heat, cover and place in preheated oven. Bake for 30 minutes, or until liquid is absorbed. Meanwhile, heat margarine and ½ tablespoon olive oil in a skillet on medium-high heat. Add mushrooms and saute until mushrooms are lightly browned, softened and any liquid has evaporated. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Set aside. Remove pilaf from oven. Add remaining ½ cups broth and thyme. Cover and return to oven for 30 more minutes, or until all liquid is absorbed. Remove from oven. Add 1 to 2 tbsp. broth to pan and scrape bottom of pan to loosen rich brown bits that cling to the bottom of the pan. Toss pilaf with mushrooms and green onions. Taste and adjust seasoning. Note: If using as a side dish and you want a fancier presentation, pack cooked pilaf into custard cups or timbale molds. Invert on plate and, with luck, it will unmold and keep its shape. Garnish with fresh herbs. 8 servings. (note: if the pilaf seems really dry when you add the last ½ cup of broth and thyme you may add an additional ⅓ cup water or broth).

BARLEY AND BLACK BEAN SALAD

3 cups cooked pearled barley
2 cups canned black beans drained
1¼ cups frozen corn kernels – thawed
1½ cups diced tomatoes
1cup frozen green peas – thawed
1 cup avocado – peeled and chopped
¼ cup fresh cilantro – chopped
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
1¼ cups water
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
1 tbsp.grated onions
1 tbsp. vegetable oil
2 tsp. garlic – minced
6 romaine lettuce leaves
1 cup avocado – 18 slices
1 medium tomato – cut into 18 wedges

Combine the barley, black beans, corn, 1½ cup diced tomatoes, peas, 1 cup chopped avocado, cilantro, salt and pepper in a large bowl and toss gently. Set it aside. Combine the water and the lemon juice, grated onions and vegetable oil in a jar with a lid that covers tightly, shake vigorously. Pour the dressing over the barley mixture and toss it gently. Serve with a slotted spoon on lettuce-lined plates. Garnish the salad with the additional avocado and tomato. Serve warm or at room temperature. Serves 8 to 10. This can be doubled or tripled.

BARLEY BELL PEPPER AND CORN SALAD

1 cup barley
1 cup red bell pepper – chopped
1½ cups fresh corn – or frozen, thawed
½ cup fresh parsley – finely chopped
2 tbsp.white wine vinegar – (plus 1 tsp.)
⅓ cup olive oil

Rinse and drain barley. Sprinkle the barley into a large saucepan of boiling salted water, stirring, and boil it, skimming the froth, for 30 min, or until just tender. Drain the barley, rinse it under cold water, and let it drain until cool. Transfer barley to a large bowl; add bell pepper, corn, parsley, and salt and pepper to taste. In a bowl whisk together the vinegar and more salt and pepper to taste, add oil, whisking till dressing is emulsified. Toss the salad with the dressing until well combined. The salad may be made up to 8 hours in advance and kept covered and chilled but the parsley should not be added until just before serving. Serves 6

FOUR GRAIN CASSEROLE

¼ cup uncooked millet
¼ cup uncooked wheat berries (available in natural foods stores)
¼ cup uncooked barley
½ cup uncooked brown rice
1½ cups water
1 tsp. olive oil
1 medium onion – coarsely chopped
2 cloves garlic – minced
1 rib celery – coarsely chopped
1 small red or green bell pepper seeded and coarsely chopped
1 carrot – coarsely chopped
2 cups canned tomatoes drained and chopped
¼ cup toasted pine nuts – optional
½ tsp. ground nutmeg
½ tsp. ground savory
1 tsp.curry powder
1 tsp.dried thyme
salt
ground black pepper
⅓ cup shredded cheddar cheese (optional)

Preheat oven to 350. Toast uncooked millet, wheat berries, barley and brown rice in heavy pan over medium heat about 5 minutes or until nutty aroma emerges. Stir frequently while toasting. Add water; cover and cook over low to medium heat 40 minutes or until tender. Heat oil in large skillet over medium-high heat. Add onion, garlic, celery, bell pepper and carrot; saute until onion is soft but not browned, about 5 minutes, adding water as needed to prevent scorching. Remove from heat. Add tomatoes, pine nuts, nutmeg, savory, curry and thyme. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Combine with cooked grains, mixing well. Spoon into lightly oiled 9-by-13-inch casserole or baking dish. Top with cheese if desired. Cover and bake for 30 minutes. 4 to 6 servings

3 GRAIN VEGETABLE BARLEY SALAD WITH CILANTRO CREAM DRESSING

1 cup long-grain brown rice
⅓ cup pearl barley
¼ cup wild rice
2½ cups vegetable stock or water
1 tbsp. virgin olive oil
2 small yellow zucchini – diced
2 small green zucchini – diced
2 peeled seeded cucumbers -- diced
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice

Olmert rules out talks with Syria

Jerusalem Post

Shoots down his own minister's suggestion

JERUSALEM — Syria is the "single most aggressive member of the axis of evil," Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Monday, ruling out a resumption of negotiations with Damascus at this time.

"I am the last person who will say I want to negotiate with Syria," Olmert said in unusually harsh comments. In a visit to northern Israel, Olmert noted that rockets that hit the region in 34 days of Israel-Hezbollah fighting came from Syria.

According to Olmert, "When Syria stops supporting terrorism, when it stops giving missiles to terror organizations, then we will be happy to negotiate with them."

His comments were made hours after Internal Security Minister Avi Dichter said that he was in favour of withdrawing from the Golan Heights in return for true peace with Syria.

"We have paid similar territorial concessions in the past when we signed peace treaties with Jordan and Egypt," the former head of the Shin Bet told Army Radio.

"Any diplomatic initiative is preferred over war, whether in Syria or Lebanon," Dichter said. "With regard to Lebanon, conditions are even more welcoming than they are with Syria. Lebanon can today begin talks with Israel without the Syrians."

According to the minister, "Talks with Syria are legitimate. If there is someone to talk to on the other side, we should talk. Israel can initiate this or turn to a third party."

In response, Olmert said, "I recommend not to get carried away with any false hopes."

He added, referring to Syria: "We are not going into any adventure when terror is on their side. We're not going into any negotiations until basic steps are taken that can be the basis for any negotiations."

Syrian Information Minister Mohsen Bilal said there was "no significance" to talk of peace with Israel as long as Israel does not withdraw from all territory it conquered in 1967. He stressed that Syria would accept an Arab peace initiative proposed by Saudi Arabia along those lines only after an independent Palestinian state is established with Jerusalem as its capital.

Dichter's comments also elicited a flurry of responses from MKs – among them National Union-National Religious Party MK Effi Eitam, a Golan resident, who said that "withdrawing from the Golan Heights will only endanger the security of Israel.

"Syria associates itself with the evil axis of Hezbollah and Iran, and its goal is to destroy Israel," Eitam said, declaring that Syria "cannot be a partner for discussion."

Fellow NU/NRP MK Aryeh Eldad said that "by the same logic, Dichter will certainly suggest we give the Galilee to Iran if they would be so kind as to shoot 4,000 rockets at us. Whoever doesn't understand that the equation 'land for peace' never worked and has only brought about more bloodshed would do better not to give advice on security matters."

Meretz MK Ran Cohen, however, supported Dichter's calls for talks with Syria, demanding that the government "discuss immediately the initiation of negotiations with Syria and Lebanon for peace agreements."

He added, "We must not sit and wait for the next war. A [peace] agreement in exchange for giving back the Golan would disconnect Syria from Iran and disarm Hezbollah."

Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres said Monday that the time is not right to resume talks with Syria, arguing that Israel is too busy dealing with Lebanon and the Palestinians.

Peres said he believes it's unlikely that Syrian President Bashar Assad is even contemplating a return to talks. "The Syrians, if they are serious [about peace talks], should come and say 'we are interested in holding negotiations,'" Peres said. "I don't see Assad doing this."

Last week, Assad warned Israel that peace is not the only way to achieve Syrian goals, referring to the Golan, which Israel captured from Syria during the Six Day War.

Defence Minister Amir Peretz suggested the possibility of talks last week when he said the conflict with Hezbollah may have created a new opportunity for renewed dialogue with Syria.

Peacekeeper force hits a snag as Israel carries out raid

By JTA Staff

NEW YORK — A ceasefire might be in place between Israel and Hezbollah, but the conflict between the two sides is far from being resolved.

That fact was made clear over the weekend after Israeli troops carried out a raid on southern Lebanon.

During Saturday's raid, an Israeli officer from an elite commando unit was killed and two others injured. Israeli sources said the operation was aimed at preventing ammunition and rockets entering Lebanon.

A firefight ensued and four Hezbollah members were reportedly killed.

A statement from the office of UN Secretary General Kofi Annan called the raid a violation of the UN-brokered ceasefire, which went into effect early last week.

Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora called the raid a "flagrant violation" of the ceasefire.

The Lebanese government has threatened to stop the deployment of Lebanese forces to the south of the country if it does not receive satisfactory explanations for the raid.

But an Israeli government official speaking on condition of anonymity told Israel Radio that neither UNIFIL nor the Lebanese army has shown any willingness to enforce the embargo on supplying arms to Hezbollah or any readiness to confront those who violate the embargo.

Also Sunday, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said that Israel would not accept peacekeepers in southern Lebanon from countries that do not have diplomatic relations with Israel.

Three Muslim countries that are in that category — Indonesia, Malaysia and Bangladesh — are among the countries to have offered troops for the expanded force, considered key to reducing tensions in southern Lebanon.

Olmert reportedly spoke Sunday with Italy's president, Romano Prodi, about the possibility of Italian troops leading the force.

Meanwhile, the Israeli army's chief of staff declared an Israeli victory in the war with Hezbollah.

But cabinet members suggested the results were murky at best.

Lt.-Gen Dan Halutz told the cabinet on Sunday that Israel had won the war on "points" even if there had been no "knockout." Halutz pointed to Israel's damage to the Hezbollah infrastructure as evidence of victory. Cabinet ministers, however, pointed out that Hezbollah's prestige within the Arab world had soared and that Iran and Syria remained committed supporters of the group.

Also, Israel failed to win the release of two soldiers kidnapped by Hezbollah, the ministers said.

Ceasefire brings little relief to missing soldier's family

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — With the ceasefire between Hezbollah and Israel in effect, there is relative calm in northern Israel.

People have vacated the bomb shelters, and stores and restaurants have reopened.

Gilad Shalit

But the halt in hostilities has brought little relief to northern residents Noam and Aviva Shalit, and their children Yoel, 23, and Hadas, 16. They live in Mitzpa Hila, a village four miles south of the Lebanese border. Their life was turned upside down weeks before the Katyushas landed.

The Shalits are the family of Gilad Shalit, the Israeli soldier kidnapped by Palestinian militants in a cross border raid on June 25.

Noam Shalit's anguish is palpable as he speaks to The CJN in a telephone interview just days before his son's 20th birthday on Aug. 28. "It is very tough for us. We are living a nightmare."

To date there has been no official news about Gilad since his capture, says Shalit. "The Red Cross had no opportunity to see him. The kidnappers would not allow it."

However, he notes that the Arabic media are reporting that Gilad, who is being held captive in Gaza, is alive. "From all indications he is being treated well and according to Islamic law."

Last week, Shalit says he appeared on Channel 2 television with a spokesman for Hamas – a moderator did the Arabic-Hebrew translation – who said that Gilad could not be released without an exchange of prisoners. "The man was friendly but not helpful."

While he speaks to Prime Minister Ehud Olmert from time to time, Shalit says that two weeks ago, the government assigned a special person to work with the families of three Israeli POWs. Ehud (Udi) Goldwasser and Eldad Regev are the two soldiers kidnapped by Hezbollah on July 12. Their capture triggered the war with Lebanon.

He says the situation for the family became more difficult when the war erupted and "the national agenda shifted to the north" eclipsing the plight of his son.

According to Shalit, discussions about freeing Palestinian prisoners in exchange for his son's freedom are ongoing. An international team includes mediators from Egypt and France because the Israeli government will not negotiate directly with Hamas.

He feels that France should take a stronger stand because Gilad has dual citizenship. "France is involved, but I feel they should be more productive because Gilad is French. I believe they have the power to be more helpful. After all France is one of the major world powers."

Shalit explains that he has French citizenship through his mother and he was able to pass it on to his children.

When asked what Canada can do to help, he urges the Canadian government to withhold funding to the PA until his son's situation is resolved.

Shalit describes Gilad as an "introverted" kid who loves sports, particularly basketball, and who was a very good student in high school. "He graduated with distinction. He was very interested in math and physics."

Shalit laments that his son, who has only been in the army for 11 months, did not have any time between completion of high school and his military service.

His commitment to the military has always been very strong, says Shalit. "Gilad liked the army. He chose to go into a combat unit."

He says that his son's health and fitness report – he has a slight, wiry build – was "borderline" vis a vis the streaming of army recruits according to physical prowess, and that he could have served in a less vulnerable unit.

But Shalit stresses that it was very important for Gilad to be in to be in a combat unit. "He wanted to go to the tank unit."

Shalit – he's employed by Iscar, a high precision metal working company in the north – says he continues to work and he even went in every day during the war despite the threat of rocket fire.

The family slept in a bomb shelter, but overall his village was not badly hit.

He says they have been getting support from family and friends. "Lots of people are calling us and coming for a visit."

For now the family must continue to live with the uncertainty of their son's fate, says Shalit. "We are trying to survive. We have some hope and that gives us strength to carry on."

A concert dedicated to Gilad Shalit on his birthday will be held in Toronto at the Kiever Congregation 8:30 p.m. Aug. 27.

Hundreds of reservists protest war

Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — With public pressure mounting for the establishment of an independent committee of inquiry to look into the management of the Israeli-Hezbollah war, hundreds of reserve soldiers who served in Lebanon sent a letter of protest addressed to Defence Minister Amir Peretz and Israel Defence Forces Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Dan Halutz on Sunday, while two reservists led a protest march to the prime minister's office in Jerusalem.

In the letter, they described a severe breach of trust between the leadership and the soldiers. "The management of the war," they wrote, "caused us to feel that they were spitting in our face."

The letter expressed frustration with the "indecision" that, the soldiers say, characterized their assignment in Lebanon. It also stated that the lack of a clear mission for their brigade in the final days of the war needlessly endangered their lives, Army Radio reported.

In a private meeting between Halutz and the commanders of the reserve Alexandroni Brigade, which fought in the western sector, the officers of the brigade criticized the army's management over the last month.

Among other things, they described serious trust issues with the commanders, and told Halutz, "We need to rebuild the soldiers' trust in the system before it is too late." Many officers spoke about the inadequacy of the food and water supply in the battlefield.

On Sunday, Chief Infantry Officer Brig.-Gen. Yossi Hyman was the first senior IDF officer to admit the failure of the war in Lebanon. "I did not succeed in preparing the infantry well enough for war," he said, adding, "Sometimes we were guilty of the sin of vanity."

It appeared on Monday that a majority in the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee supported setting up a state commission to investigate the war.

With the exception of members from Kadima – such as Knesset member Otniel Schneller, who said that "the time is not right to devote our attention to an investigation committee, when the IDF and the state have to prepare for the next round" – the remaining committee members voiced their approval of setting up a state commission to probe the failures of the war.

'I'm talking about [change in] the army and the government,' Tzvangenboim declared. 'The prime minister, the defence minister and the chief of general staff all have to go'

Only the government has the power to appoint a state commission. However, the foreign affairs and defence committee's approbation would put another layer of pressure on the government to form such a commission.

As of this report, 11 foreign affairs and defence committee members were in favour of the commission, and only three were against it.

Meanwhile, reservist Roni Tzvangenboim and his friend Assaf Dovidov led a protest march from the Castel on the outskirts of Jerusalem to the prime minister's office on Monday morning.

"We're not leaders – we're just the ones shouting first," Tzvangenboim said in an interview with Army Radio. He added that he believed many others would join them in the march.

Tzvangenboim said that the problem with the war was on a much wider scope than the issue of the inadequate food and weapon supply that other protesters were raising.

"The problem," he said, "is that there's no leadership. There's a strong army, with all the best technology in the world, with the bravest soldiers in the world... but there's no one who knows how to operate it."

In 1973, Capt. Moti Ashkenazi launched a national protest movement after the Yom Kippur War, as prime minister Golda Meir and defence minister Moshe Dayan sought to place all the blame for Israel's refusal to prepare for Egypt's invasion on the IDF. Ashkenazi's demand for accountability forced Meir and Dayan to resign and set the conditions for the Likud's rise to power in 1977.

"I'm talking about [change in] the army and the government," Tzvangenboim declared. "The prime minister, the defence minister and the chief of general staff all have to go."

Tzvangenboim admitted that he still didn't know what he was going to do when he arrived at the prime minister's residence. His goal, he said, was to change the leadership, adding, "If the one that comes after it doesn't do what needs to be done, I'll walk again – that's what I can do."

Cotler slams UN over ceasefire resolution

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Liberal MP Irwin Cotler said UN Security Council Resolution 1701, which put into effect a ceasefire between Hezbollah and Israel, is riddled with problems.

The former justice minister recently returned to Canada after a weeklong mission in Israel aimed at gaining a greater understanding of the region's conflicts.

One problem, he said, is that the resolution does not detail a mechanism for the return of the kidnapped Israeli soldiers Yair Goldwasser and Eldad Regev by the Lebanese government. "The return of these soldiers will be the first litmus test of the whole security council resolution."

Nor does Resolution 1701 mention the dissolution of Hezbollah as a terrorist militia, and there is no provision for the effective enforcement of Security Council Resolution 1559, which called for the disarming and disbanding of Hezbollah, and has never been implemented, Cotler said. "If Resolution 1559 would have been enforced, this war never would have happened in the first place," he said

Cotler was the first representative from the Canadian government to visit the area since the war between Hezbollah and Israel erupted on July 12. He met with senior academics, Israeli government officials, including Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres and Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, and NGOs in Israel and the Palestinian territories.

Cotler was not sure that the 1701 stipulation to mobilize a multinational protection force to secure the buffer zone between the Litany River and the Israeli border could be put into effect. "We have seen the UN fail to implement resolutions of this ilk before," he said.

Hezbollah's refusal to disarm is particularly worrisome to Cotler, given that Hezbollah is not just a terrorist militia. It's a terrorist militia with a genocidal and anti-Semitic ideology, he said.

"The fact that the Hezbollah, which supports a transnational totalitarian brand of radical Islam – the successor to Nazism and communism – has not been recognized for what it is by the UN is extremely problematic."

The UN, however, revealed its true colours when the Human Rights Council called for the establishment of an inquiry into Israeli war crimes, Cotler said. Although Canada voted against the UN's investigative inquiry against Israel for war crimes, he said, Canada's demonstration of non-support is not enough.

"We need to do more. We need to speak out in favour of the construction of an international assembly with integrity, one that promotes fairness rather than eroding the authority of international law and making a mockery of human rights."

Replying to those who said that Israel's response to the Hezbollah attack was "disproportionate," he said that the statement ignores the whole stretch of history since Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon in 2000. After that, Hezbollah attacked Israel several times, he continued, but Israel didn't respond, either because it was preoccupied with both internal issues and the disengagement in Gaza, or because it was demonstrating restraint.

"The abduction of the Israeli soldiers was only the proximate cause of the war with the Hezbollah," said Cotler. "Israel's reaction to the Hezbollah's kidnappings and rocket attacks represents a culmination. In context, Israel's reaction emerges as not disproportionate, but if anything, late."

The UN's obvious bias can also be seen in Resolution 1701's call for a massive postwar reconstruction of Lebanon's damaged areas, and not of Israel's, Cotler said.

But the most obviously absent item from Resolution 1701 is the Iranian factor, he said. "Iran is not just a principal actor, but the choreographer behind the Hezbollah's war against Israel. This war has revealed just how much Iran is involved in the training, financing and instigation of Hezbollah forces. Without Iran's involvement, Hezbollah could not have fought a war at all."

Until he arrived in Israel, Cotler said he didn't realize the degree to which Iran was involved with the Hezbollah. "I was shocked to learn of the extent of the weaponry, not only the number of rockets and missiles that Iran is supplying the Hezbollah, but the sophistication of those weapons, and the training of Hezbollah terrorists by Iran."

He noted that "Canada has made it a crime to facilitate the work of a terrorist organization. [It] has taken the right position. But in order to succeed we need the international community to act in concert. Canada's foreign policy should be international foreign policy."

He said it's Canada's special positioning that makes it a potentially strategic partner in solving current problems in the Middle East. "Canada is well respected by many different parties in the Middle East, including Israel, the Palestinians and Lebanon."

On this trip, Cotler visited Ramallah, where he met with Palestinians across the political, judicial and academic spectrum. "The Israeli-Palestinian conflict was not on the radar before I left [Canada], but it certainly is now," he said. "That front will assume its front-and-centre place shortly, and there is no ceasefire resolution for Gaza."

On the Palestinian-Israeli front, Cotler said Canada should reaffirm its support for a two-state solution, but only in the event that the Hamas government can provide demonstrable evidence that it has repealed its covenant to destroy Israel. "You can't support a two-state solution if one state doesn't recognize the other's right to exist," he said

"The Harper government has indicated that it wants to play a robust diplomatic role in the Middle East," he said, "and I am fully in support of that."

One year after 'the storm,' New Orleans Jews rebuilding

By GAIL NARON CHALEW
JTA

NEW ORLEANS — One year after "the storm," as New Orleanians refer to Hurricane Katrina, Jewish communal leaders describe the health of the community with certain expected terms – loss, trauma, devastation and challenge.

Unexpected is the word "blessed," used repeatedly in reference to the outpouring from the American Jewish community of financial support, volunteerism and donations of everything from teddy bears to challah covers.

Funds from the United Jewish Communities, the umbrella of the North American federation system, and the national religious movements have kept New Orleans' Jewish agencies and synagogues afloat this past year and are expected to do so through 2007.

To date, the UJC has contributed more than $17 million to the rebuilding efforts; the Reform movement has contributed some $800,000 to local Reform congregations, with another $800,000 available for recovery efforts not covered by insurance. Other movements have sent funds as well, though exact figures were not available.

What will happen in 2008 and beyond is the worry that both drives many planning meetings during the day, and keeps communal leaders up at night.

"Fortunately, the Jewish community has not had to depend on the help of government, given its failure at all levels," said Allan Bissinger, president of the New Orleans federation. "UJC has taken the place of what the government should normally have done."

Roselle Ungar, interim executive director of the federation, said, "What UJC and the many generous contributions from individuals across the country have given us is the opportunity to take a deep breath, step back and take the time to make the hard decisions that will be necessary, so that in 2008 we can stand on our own two feet again."

A community-wide task force is in the beginning stages of implementing a recovery plan. The plan focuses on such issues as how to retain current residents while encouraging new ones to resettle here. It also is determining how the organized Jewish community can work smarter to make the best use of limited dollars.

One of the positive outgrowths of the storm has been the burgeoning spirit of co-operation among all the New Orleans Jewish institutions. Beth Israel Congregation, the Orthodox synagogue that took on 10 feet of water, is now holding a Shabbat minyan at the Reform Gates of Prayer Congregation.

The Anti-Defamation League is sharing federation office space. Interagency programs are on the upswing, and a Hebrew free loan program is in the works. The JCC is getting needed revenue by renting out its facilities to community groups.

Tackling the population issue will not be as easy. Current estimates are that the Jewish community will stabilize at about 65 per cent of its pre-storm strength of about 10,000 individuals.

Although there are no hard and fast data about the population exodus, the increasing number of "For sale" signs attests to residents' continued impatience with the slow pace of recovery, frustration with the government and concern about the rising crime rate. And it would be difficult to exaggerate the impact another hurricane would have on people's decisions to move.

Although all age groups have joined this exodus, one particular cohort – those in their 60s and 70s with grown children in other communities – has been leaving in large numbers.

Communal officials count the loss of these individuals particularly troublesome because these are the big machers – those with the money and the time to make significant contributions. Every institution has lost some of its biggest donors and officers.

At the same time, each of the five synagogues surveyed has reported new members, mostly young people drawn by the pioneer spirit of rebuilding and the opportunity to make a difference.

Indeed, despite the loss of members, synagogue attendance seems to have remained stable. As Rabbi Andrew Busch of the Reform congregation, Touro Synagogue, put it, "In their new lives after the storm, people have a greater need to come together in the synagogue."

Rabbi Ted Lichtenfeld of Shir Chadash Conservative Congregation agreed. "Though I have not had people battering down my door for pastoral counselling, in a sense, the storm underlines everything. Fortunately, very few of my congregants lost family members to the storm, but most are rebuilding their homes and almost everyone's job was affected in one way or the other. That is taking up so much of their energy. They come to synagogue to be in community."

Undaunted by the storm, Chabad-Lubavitch of Louisiana has committed to build a new student centre at Tulane University; the cornerstone ceremony is scheduled to be held Aug. 27, two days before the storm's anniversary.

The New Orleans Jewish Day School, a community school supported by the federation, has been hit hard by the population exodus. From a pre-storm enrollment of nearly 90 children in kindergarten through eighth grade, it will begin the coming school year with 23 children in just two classes: a combined kindergarten-first grade and a second-third grade class. This precipitous decrease comes despite a halving of tuition, made possible by outside contributions.

Israel Briefs

Withdrawal plan shelved

Israel's government has frozen plans to pull out from parts of the West Bank. Officials confirmed an Aug. 18 report in Ha'aretz that Prime Minister Ehud Olmert shelved for now the plan to unilaterally realign Israel's borders by pulling troops out and dismantling settlements. The plan lost favour after Israel's conflict in Lebanon. Israel's unilateral pullout from Lebanon in 2000 and Gaza last year failed to stop rocket attacks and cross-border raids.

Gaza rocket hits Ashkelon

A rocket fired by Palestinians in the Gaza Strip reached deeper than ever into Israel. The Russian-made Katyusha hit the Ashkelon marina Aug. 14, causing damage but no casualties. Officials said the strike, 15 miles from northern Gaza, marked a new record for Palestinian terrorists who have been trying to extend the range of their rockets. Israel's air force bombed the launcher in the Gaza town of Beit Hanoun, killing three Palestinians.

Iran issues another threat

A senior Iranian cleric said his country would fire missiles at Tel Aviv if attacked. "If they militarily attack Iran, they should be afraid of the day when our missiles with 2,000-kilometre range will hit Tel Aviv," Ahmad Khatami told state TV. Khatami is a member of the Assembly of Experts, a clerical body that supervises Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. Khatami described the ceasefire that ended the war in Lebanon as a triumph for Hezbollah, which Iran sponsors, "I congratulate Hezbollah for its victory, which was the victory of Islam. This was a disgraceful defeat for America and the Zionist regime," he said.

Justice minister resigns

Justice Minister Haim Ramon said Aug. 18 that he will resign in the wake of sexual harassment charges. The resignation was to take effect Sunday. Israel's attorney general said he plans to indict Ramon on charges he forcibly kissed an 18-year old soldier at an office party July 12, the day fighting started between Israel and Hezbollah.

Sharon worsens

Ariel Sharon's condition has worsened. Doctors at Sheba Medical Center in Tel Hashomer said Aug. 14 that the former prime minister's brain function has worsened and he's developed pneumonia in his lungs. He's been in a coma since a Jan. 4 stroke.

Breast implants save a life

An Israeli woman wounded in a Hezbollah rocket attack was saved by her breast implants, a Nahariya hospital spokesperson said. Doctors found shrapnel only inches from the 24-year-old's heart, embedded in the implants. "This is an extraordinary case, but the silicone implants prevented her from a more serious and deeper wound," the spokesperson told Israel Army Radio.

Meshal targeted: report

Israel reportedly botched a second attempt to assassinate Hamas' supreme leader. Al-Jazeera reported Aug. 16 that the Mossad sent assassins into Syria last month in a bid to kill Khaled Meshal. The report said the agents were disguised as aid workers from Lebanon. Meshal escaped unharmed after being tipped off, the satellite station said. Israel had no comment. The Mossad is believed to have kept Meshal high on its hit list since a failed attempt to poison him in Jordan in 1997.

War affected zoo animals

Animals at the Haifa Zoo got stressed and fatter during Israel's month-long conflict with Hezbollah. Ha'aretz reported that the zoo's carnivores had been moved inside to keep them safe from rocket strikes and to prevent their escape in case a rocket hit the zoo's outer wall. A zoo manager said the lions gained weight during their time indoors, and the baboons suffered from stress.

Ethiopian staff plays key role in Falash Mora aliyah

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

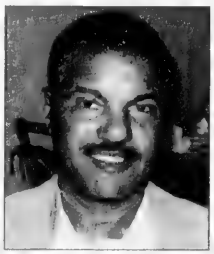
ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia — Outside the walled compound of the Israeli embassy in Addis Ababa, hundreds of Falash Mora live patiently, waiting for the chance to convince a small group of interrogators that they are eligible to immigrate to Israel.

Among those they must convince is Adugna Biruk Farade, 58, an Ethiopian-born Israeli who speaks the same language of the applicants and understands just where they are coming from – both literally and figuratively.

Farade is a native of Guyna, a village of nearly 500 people near Gonder, historic home to the Jews of Ethiopia. Unlike the Falash Mora, whose ancestors adopted Christianity two, three or even seven generations before, Farade and his family remained Jews.



Adugna Biruk Farade

The family celebrated Passover, Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur, ate kosher meat and "prayed for our own land," he said.

As a youth, after a few short years in school, Farade worked as a "cowboy," tending the family's many head of cattle. In addition to the cattle herd, the family owned lots of oxen and sheep. Many in his extended family were farmers but others were weavers. Some worked clay to make pots and his uncles laboured as blacksmiths.

As a young man, he learned from members of his family and from local rabbis all about the Jewish faith and his people's – the Beta Israel – ties to the Holy Land.

Ethiopians in general, not just the Beta Israel, were interested in Israel, but Jews in his village were so desperate for news about the Jewish state "people went 35 to 40 kilometres by foot to a town to hear the news about Israel," he recalled.

From a young age, Farade wanted to make the journey to Israel, and he began his journey well before most Ethiopian Jews considered it a feasible proposition. In 1971, he moved to Asmara, a city in Eritrea that was then part of Ethiopia and had access to the Red Sea.

At the time, Asmara had a functioning synagogue, rabbis and teachers, and it was Farade's hope that he would use it as a base to find a ship to bring him to Israel. Once there, he would attempt to reunite the family in the Holy Land.

Unfortunately, Farade was not able to collect enough cash to pay the bribes needed to acquire an Ethiopian passport, so when he took ill, he returned to Gonder, where he spent 11 months convalescing.

When he recovered, he got a job in a hotel in Gonder where he worked for years. In 1991, he moved to Addis and was hired by the American Association for Ethiopian Jews. Six months later, he got a job with the Jewish Agency.

It was the time of the second large exodus of Ethiopian Jews – Operation Solomon. He was intimately involved with the effort that brought 14,000 Beta Israel to Addis from Gonder and from there to Israel in a massive two-day airlift.

Farade, his wife and four children were on the last two planes to depart Addis for Israel. As it happened, the family was separated at the airport and his wife and one child took off on the second-last flight. Farade and three children were put on the last plane, which was delayed waiting for stragglers from a hospital as the deadline for the airlift came closer and fighting in a civil war threatened to upset the airlift.

After a nerve-racking two-hour wait, the plane took off and Farade finally arrived in the promised land. Unfortunately, his family had been taken to an absorption centre in Tiberias, and it took two weeks for the Jewish Agency – with his brothers and sisters helping – to track them down.

Six months after his arrival, Micha Feldman, the Israeli government official who co-ordinated Operation Solomon, helped get Farade a job in Tel Aviv looking into the cases of 36 Falash Mora families who had remained behind. They were not Jewish and so were not part of the airlift, but their relatives in Israel were pressing for their reunification.

In 1996, Farade was hired by the Israeli Ministry of the Interior to work on the Falash Mora file, and in 1997, he returned to Addis for the first time on a temporary basis. In 2000, he moved back full time, but he returns to Israel every three months for a couple of weeks to visit with family.

Based on his experience, he believes the Falash Mora now moving to Israel at the rate of 300 a week will experience "some difficulties. In Israel you have freedom, not like here… It's a big adjustment.

"Also, you feel it's your country, your motherland," he said.

* * *

Birhanu Yiradu Zeleke, 56, was one of the first Ethiopians to witness international efforts to integrate the country's Beta Israel into the wider Jewish world.

In the early 1970s, Zeleke was working as a cab driver in Gonder when a visiting Israeli, Levi Gershon, asked him to drive him to the village of Amibober in the Wagara area of northern Ethiopia. The Israeli was intent on visiting the Beta Israel, and Zeleke, who grew up as a Christian but who had many Beta Israel friends in school, was ready to assist him.

At one point Zeleke spent 20 days driving Gerson from village to village. The two got along so well, the Israeli eventually brought a Land Rover from Addis to Gonder to make the trips more convenient.

Gershon would open schools for Beta Israel in several villages, and Zeleke would go on to a 30-plus- year career working for Jewish organizations in Ethiopia.

He recalled that his career choice upset his relatives at the time. "When I started the job, my family said, 'why work with Beta Israel? They have the evil eye.' I said, 'Why? They have no evil eye. They're nice people.'"

Today, he is an employee of the government of Israel working to determine which Falash Mora will receive permission to move to Israel, but over his career, he has worked for the Falasha Welfare Association, ORT, individual Jews helping the Beta Israel and the Joint Distribution Committee.

He can recall the first big exodus from Ethiopia that went through Sudan, even as Ethiopian dictator Mengistu Haile Mariam persecuted the Jews. Beta Israel on that occasion were given a special chai necklace to identify them to Israeli agents who arranged their passage to the Jewish state, he said.

Zeleke's loyalty to the Beta Israel has been rewarded by the Israeli government, which in 1984 allowed him to travel to Jerusalem's Hadassah Hospital for surgery and rehabilitation on his leg after a serious car accident.

In later years, four of his children were given permission to move to Israel, where they became citizens. Three converted to Judaism after three years of study and one subsequently moved to Detroit.

One of his sons has moved back to Ethiopia to work for an Israeli agricultural company, while one of his daughters is about to enter nursing school in Israel and another is dating a Beta Israel boyfriend.

Zeleke expects that when his turn comes and he returns to Israel for good, he, too, will convert. "I like Beta Israel people," he said.

Costa Rican embassy decision angers Israel supporters

By LARRY LUXNER
JTA

MIAMI — The condominium along Diskin Street is rather upscale, with little distinguishing it from the other apartment buildings in Jerusalem's Kiryat Wolfson neighbourhood, except for a few cars bearing diplomatic license plates parked out front.

Those cars belong to the Costa Rican Embassy. Along with El Salvador, the government of Costa Rica for years has been alone in the world in officially recognizing Jerusalem as Israel's capital by placing its embassy there, rather than in Tel Aviv.

But last week, President Oscar Arias upset Israel and angered Costa Rica's 4,000 Jews with his announcement that he would close the embassy in Jerusalem, and transfer Ambassador Noemi Baruch and her staff to Tel Aviv.

"The decision is consistent with the obligations of international law and the resolutions of the United Nations, which for 24 years Costa Rica has disregarded by maintaining its diplomatic representation in Jerusalem," said a communique issued Wednesday in San Jose by Costa Rica's Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

In fulfilling a promise he made before being elected president earlier this year, Arias said that moving the embassy to Tel Aviv "would rectify a historic error that has hurt our reputation on an international level and has deprived us of friendship with the Arab world and Islamic civilization, which shares our values of liberty, democracy and human rights."

Veteran Costa Rican diplomat Jaime Daremblum said he was deeply saddened by the news.

"As a Costa Rican of the Jewish faith, I think there is much more at stake here than just moving an embassy," Daremblum told JTA. "There is a big struggle in the world, in which Israel has been the victim of international terrorism, and the timing of this decision by the Costa Rican government was really deplorable."

The decision came less than 48 hours after the ceasefire between Israel and Hezbollah in Lebanon took effect, and barely a week after Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez threatened to break diplomatic relations with Israel in the wake of its monthlong conflict in Lebanon.

Daremblum, Costa Rica's ambassador in Washington from 1998 to 2004, said the move should come as no surprise for those who have followed the speeches of Arias, who won a Nobel Peace Prize in 1987 for his efforts to bring peace to war-torn Central America.

"About five years ago, some news agencies reported that President Arias had indicated to audiences in the Middle East that if he became president again, he would move the embassy out of Jerusalem," said Daremblum, now a senior fellow at the Hudson Institute. "What he wants is anybody's guess. Apparently he wants to push for a Costa Rican seat in the UN Security Council."

Reaction from Jewish organizations in the United States was swift and angry.

"We are profoundly disappointed by Costa Rica's decision to move its embassy in Israel from Jerusalem to Tel Aviv," said a statement issued by the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations. "Costa Rica and Israel are sister democracies with a long history of good bilateral relations, a fact which only deepens our disappointment. To make such an announcement after Israel has spent a month in intense combat with Hezbollah, when democracies must stand together against Islamic terror, sends the wrong signal to the world."

At one time, 12 Latin American countries and the Netherlands had their embassies in Jerusalem. In 1980, the United Nations passed Resolution 478, calling for the removal of all embassies in Jerusalem. Costa Rica's Foreign Affairs Ministry complied, but the ambassador at the time procrastinated for 1½ years.

For a six-month period, Costa Rica maintained a phantom embassy in Tel Aviv. But after Luis Alberto Monge was inaugurated as president in May 1982, his first official act was to move the embassy back to Jerusalem.

Two other countries – Paraguay and Bolivia – have maintained embassies in Mevasseret Zion, a suburb of Jerusalem, but only Costa Rica and El Salvador had embassies in the city itself.

Despite Costa Rica's pending departure, El Salvador says it won't follow its neighbour's example for the moment – even though the country's president, Antonio Saca, is of Palestinian descent.

Ashkenaz celebrates resurgence of Jewish culture

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Ashkenaz, the biennial festival of new Yiddish culture, set to take place Aug. 29 through Sept. 4 at Harbourfront Centre, Toronto, is incredibly contemporary, yet grounded in the past, says its producer and artistic director.

"The music, theatre, art, dance, literature, cabaret and film being offered, melds the traditional spirit of eastern Europe with the new, radical art being created in a contemporary resurgence of Jewish culture. It's connected, but it features a break from tradition," says Mitchell Smolkin, 28.

An actor, singer, and "Yiddishist" who is producing his third Ashkenaz, Smolkin says he first got involved with the festival because of his grandmother, a native of Poland.

"She is elderly now, and it is very hard to reconcile that for all intents and purposes, we are about to lose her culture.

"Ashkenaz is an opportunity to show ourselves on the rich, cultural landscape of Toronto, and [give] Yiddish a home."

Smolkin, who studied Yiddish at the University of Vilnius in Lithuania, and met his wife while studying the language at Columbia University, says he buried a program of a past Ashkenaz festival at his grandfather's grave because, "I knew he would have loved to see it. He would have enjoyed the intensity, the sadness and the levity."

Yiddishists are part of a very intense subculture, says Smolkin. "They connect around the idea that although it is not a living language, we have to make sure we do everything we can to make sure we preserve it. There are thousands of artists around the world devoted to [promoting] Yiddish."

Ashkenaz events – a few take place at Earl Bales Park and Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre – are mostly free, although some special events require a ticket.

Musical programs include East Travels West: All Stars of the Former Soviet Union; Retro Ashkenaz: Klezmer en Buenos Aires; Yiddish Barbershop and Beyond the Pale; the Klezmer Cuban Connection; Chicago Klezmer Ensemble; and the Chassidic Jazz Project.

The two cabarets are Cabaret Russe hosted by Michael Alpert, and Cabaret, hosted by David Gale.

Among the films are A Geshseft (The Deal), made in New York 50 years ago; Ashke-Animation; and Yiddish Theatre: A Love Story.

Live theatre includes Echoes and Shavings of Yiddishland, and the Wandering Jew with Boris Sichon.

There are also a number of readings, workshops, panels, lectures and talks on such topics as Yiddish dance, Kabbalistic yoga, Soviet Yiddish poets, and music of the Jewish wedding celebration.

Nobel Prize-winning author Gunter Grass admits SS past

By TOBY AXLEROD
JTA

BERLIN — Nobel Prize-winning author Gunter Grass' admission that he was an SS member has drawn both rage and defences of the writer.

While some say the revelation devalues his life's work, others are showing more understanding for the pressures faced by the teenager who later would write such modern German classics as The Tin Drum.

Grass, 78, whose autobiography is due out this fall, told the Frankfurter Allegmeine Zeitung on Aug. 11 that he was drafted into the Waffen SS in the final months of World War II.

The Waffen SS was the elite fighting force of the SS, the Nazi Party's quasi-military unit, and was declared part of a criminal organization at the Nuremberg Trials. Grass was interned briefly in a POW camp in Bavaria after the war.

Literary critic Helmuth Karasek told the radio program BDR that Grass should have revealed the truth sooner, and he suggested that the Nobel Prize committee might not have wanted to honour someone "whom they knew had been a member of the Waffen SS and had long denied it." Grass won the Nobel Prize for literature in 1999.

Grass biographer Michael Juergs said he was "personally disappointed," and has called into question the validity of Grass' life work. But German writer Erich Loest told the Tagesspiegel newspaper that Grass' admission should be "accepted without condemnation. He was very young and there was no one to influence him in the opposite direction," he said.

German writer Ralph Giordano, who survived the war in hiding with his Jewish mother, praised Grass on the radio program WDR2.

"Good that you have done this, Gunter Grass," he said.

Grass told the Frankfurt paper he was drafted as a 17-year-old following a stint in a support unit for the German air force, and was brought to serve in a Waffen SS tank division in Dresden. In his forthcoming autobiography, While Skinning an Onion, he writes that the past had "oppressed him. My suppression of this through the years was among the reasons why I have written this book. It had to come out, finally."

Grass said he originally volunteered to serve in a Nazi submarine unit, which was "just as crazy."

Until now, Grass' biography had said that he was drafted in the support unit for the air force in 1944, then served as a soldier.

In the new book, he writes about how he was 15 when he tried to volunteer with the submarine corps and was rejected because of his age. He was called up in 1944, as were all boys born in 1927.

He was assigned to the Waffen SS, which "in the final year of the war took draftees, not only volunteers," he said in an interview with the German Press Agency.

Grass said he had never tried to hide the fact that as a youth he was vulnerable to Nazi propaganda. He also told the Frankfurt paper that he never actually served in the Waffen SS division to which he had been assigned. He ended up behind the Russian front on reconnaissance patrols, witnessing what he described as gruesome scenes and surviving by pure chance. During his brief internment as a POW, Grass says he met the similarly interned Joseph Ratzinger, who now is Pope Benedict XVI.

In an essay for the German Internet news agency Netzeitung, Israeli-born historian Michael Wolffsohn, who teaches at the University of the German Army in Munich, said Grass' "persistent silence would devalue his moralizing works, but not his novelistic works."

Further, Wolffsohn said Grass had lost a "golden opportunity" to come clean on the 40th anniversary of the end of World War II, when many were upset by the visit of then-German chancellor Helmut Kohl and then-U.S. president Ronald Reagan to a military cemetery in Bitburg, Germany, that contained SS graves.

Grass "should have stood up and said: 'I was there, too,'" Wolffsohn said. "It would have brought objectivity and realism to the discussion."

Travel Talk

By Bill Gladstone

NEW INITIATIVE ENCOURAGES TRAVELLERS BACK TO GALILEE

Israel's tourism ministry launched a major new program last week to bring travellers back to northern Israel.

This summer was gearing up to be one of the best for northern Israel's hundreds of hotels, inns and bed and breakfasts, until the recent round of hostilities chased most of the tourists away from the Galilee and Haifa regions.

"The Galilee is one of Israel's favourite vacation regions," says ministry representative Arie Sommer. "And while the ceasefire will bring tourists back to northern Israel, we wanted to do something right now for Americans [and Canadians] who may have changed their summer plans to avoid that part of the country."

Working with the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, the tourism ministry has come up with Galilee Spirit, an innovative program through which travellers book and pay now for travel to be conducted any time through June 30, 2007.

The "pay-now, travel-soon" arrangement will help the travel industry in Israel's northern region, which has suffered greatly as a result of the recent crisis. By assuring a stream of current income, hoteliers will be able to sustain their businesses, pay employees and suppliers, and reopen as soon as possible.

For more details, visit the website www.goisrael.com, then click on "Galilee Spirit."

Between 2.5 and 3 million visitors had been expected this year in Israel, which is gearing up to celebrate its 60th anniversary in 2008.

September Mission: A solidarity mission involving members of Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim congregation and other interested parties departs for Israel Sept. 10 and returns Sept. 17. Round-trip travel is by El Al Airlines and accommodation is at the Sheraton Plaza Hotel in Jerusalem.

The package includes full Israeli breakfasts, Friday night dinner and Shabbat lunch, 3½ days of touring and more. The price is $1,399 per person, double occupancy, with a single supplement of $379 and an airport tax of $65.
For reservations or information, contact David Freudmann, Uniworld Travel, 416-493-3322, ext. 356. E-mail david@uniworldtravel.com.

At the Israel Museum: The travelling public may have overlooked the recent opening of "Other Rooms, Other Voices: Contemporary Art from the FRAC Collections," an exhibition at the Israel Museum of Jerusalem, inspired by the European "cabinet of curiosities" of the 16th and 17th centuries. Organized by the Israel Museum, the exhibition is presented in distinct rooms, each comprising sculptural installations by French and international artists from the collections of Fonds Regionaux d'art Contemporain (FRAC) of France.

It presents a labyrinthine journey through 17 rooms, perceived as "chambers of wonders" filled with installations and sculptures. The notion originates from the European Wunderkammer of the 16th and 17th centuries, recognized as a precursor to the modern museum, which presented collections of natural and manufactured rarities, marvels and curiosities. On view through Oct. 28.

Babi Yar Commemoration: Russian poet Yevgeny Yevtushenko recites his poem Babi Yar and pianists Misha and Cipa Dichter perform a movement from a two-piano version of Shostakovich's Symphony No. 13, which the composer based on the Yevtushenko poem, at a 65th anniversary commemoration of the Babi Yar massacre next month in New York.

Tens of thousands of Jews, Soviet prisoners of war, gypsies, underground fighters and others from Kiev and environs were killed by the Nazis at a ravine called Babi Yar on Sept. 29 and 30, 1941. This mass murder is the subject of Yevtushenko's most famous poem and has also become immortalized in the music of Dmitri Shostakovich.

Born in Russia in 1933, Yevtushenko wrote Babi Yar in 1961; it was not published in the Soviet press until 1984. He currently teaches Russian and European poetry and film at the University of Tulsa in Oklahoma.

Babi Yar Remembered: Yevtushenko and Shostakovich in Word and Song takes place at the Museum of Jewish Heritage – A Living Memorial to the Holocaust, Wednesday, Sept. 27, 7 p.m. 36 Battery Pl., Manhattan. $25 to $65. 646-437-4202, www.mjhnyc.org

Czech This Out: Prague's Jewish Museum marks its 100th anniversary this year and has launched a yearlong marathon of events. "A Year of Jewish Culture – 100 Years of the Jewish Museum in Prague" includes exhibitions, theatre performances, concerts, film screenings, a "video-sculpture" and a collection of Torahs.

A large exhibition of Czech Torah scrolls opens Oct. 25 at the museum's Robert Guttmann Gallery. The exhibition traces the fate of Torah scrolls during the Holocaust and afterward. Some of the scrolls were sold in 1964 and are now lent out for religious purposes to Jewish communities around the world through the Czech Memorial Scrolls Centre in London.

A current exhibition, "How the Beast Did Not Triumph," traces the museum's first decades, beginning with several objects being saved from the synagogues demolished during the slum clearance of the Jewish ghetto. By the outbreak of World War II, the museum had assembled a fine collection of Jewish artifacts.

Canadian artist Melissa Shiff created a video-sculpture in the shape of a huge ship or ark, specifically for the anniversary. The ark motif represents the museum, which has saved documents and artifacts from the 1,000-year Jewish presence in the Czech lands.

A two-part travelling exhibition, "The History of the Jews in Bohemia and Moravia" and "Jewish Customs and Traditions," is on view in the town of Carlsbad during September (www.jewishmuseum.cz). A week of Jewish culture is also planned for Brno, Nov. 18 to 25. For more details, visit the museum website, www.jewishmuseum.cz.

Proceeds from CD launch to help rebuild north Israel

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

While travelling in northern Israel earlier this month, Menashe Solomon, spiritual leader of the Kiever Congregation, discovered that an upcoming concert at the synagogue featuring Balagan, a world music fusion band with an Israeli twist, happened to coincide with the birthday of Gilad Shallit, the Israeli soldier kidnapped in Gaza two months ago.

"It turns out that his birthday is the 28th of August, which is for us the evening of Aug. 27th when our concert takes place," Solomon wrote in an e-mail from Israel. He subsequently announced that the Kiever is going to dedicate this concert to Shallit. "We'll be sending all of the proceeds to help rebuild the north of Israel."

The concert, which takes place 8:30 p.m. on Aug. 27 at the Kiever, a vintage synagogue located at 25 Belleview Ave. in Kensington Market, will be the official launch of the band's eponymous CD– Balagan.

Solomon added that it was very apropos that Balagan would be performing at this benefit concert for Israel because so much of their music is in Hebrew.

Indeed, Haifa-born vocalist and guitarist Mickey Lewin, co-leader of Balagan, stresses that the group offers a unique Israeli approach to world music. "We are the only band in the country that plays such an eclectic collection of world music in Hebrew."

"All the songs have Hebrew words," says pianist and keyboardist Jordan Klapman, co-leader of Balagan. "Some of the songs are Israeli. Some are from all over the world, but they are Hebrew renditions that have been popular in Israel.

Balagan: World music in Hebrew

"A lot of these songs are popular all over the world. Some songs are done in the original English with Hebrew and Spanish, other songs are in English, Hebrew and French. We also do a Brazilian song in Hebrew and English."

He says that the name Balagan, Hebrew slang for a mess, means chaos or mishmash in Polish and Russian.

"It was suggested to us by someone at the JCC. The name's evocative. It worked in different languages and it made sense. We're a very eclectic band. We incorporate many different styles in our music."

The group plays vintage jazz pieces from the 1920s and '30s, Broadway standards, and Yiddish/klezmer folk tunes, says Lewin. "What sets us apart from simchah music is that there's a real rock, rhythm and blues and pop component integrated with samba, Africo-Cuban, Moroccan, Greek, and Celtic rhythms.

"A lot of the music is dance oriented."

He says he also expects a lot of audience participation. "Many people will be singing along because so many of these pieces are popular songs.

"We will also be performing a whole medley of peace songs from different countries."

While the concert happens to coincide with the monthly summer street festival in Kensington Market, Klapman says that for him the market symbolizes the historic roots of the Toronto Jewish community.

He says he's thrilled about performing at the Kiever. "The old style European set up of the synagogue is very quaint. The place is beautifully preserved. The acoustics are amazing and there's even air conditioning."

Lewin shares his enthusiasm. "We'll be playing on the bimah. For me this is the ultimate concert in the square."

And while he says the music is uplifting, the concert is also a reminder of the sad plight of Shallit and his family. "We are honoured to be dedicating the concert to Gilad Shallit. We are praying for his release and at the same time for the safe return of the other two POWs held by the Hezbollah."

For more information about the concert or the Kiever call 647-403-7714.

Photo book focuses on the Jewish struggle

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

The 4000 Year Journey in Search of Peace is a beautiful 24-page coffee-table book of pictures and photographs that cover the span of Jewish history.

It is put together by Montreal photographer Danny Taran who says in the foreward that he wanted to draw attention to the Jewish struggle over the years through the medium of photography.

Above, A Jewish Family (Kaifeng, China), 1910.
Left, A Palestinian boy and a Jewish girl planting a tree: Hope for the future.

Obviously, photography is a relatively recent innovation, so the book focuses heavily on the last century of Jewish life – culture, education, tradition, innovation and wars. It does begin with some beautiful colour illustrations of the biblical period.

The "Herb Doctor" selling herbs and spices. [Earliest known photograph of a Jewish Montrealer]. 1859.

It then switches to photography, highlighting Jewish tradition and culture, including one of nursery-school children in 1938 Lithuania celebrating Purim. These kids probably all died in a 1939 pogrom.

There is an unusual picture of a Chinese Jewish family in Kaifeng and one of a "herb doctor," the earliest known photograph of a Jewish Montrealer (1859).

A good portion of the book is spent on the wartime communities and the Holocaust. It then continues with pictures of Zionists and the settlement of Israel; the Arab-Israel wars and more recent pictures of the intifadah and the Gaza pullout as well as Israeli scientific achievement.

The Jewish National Fund is hosting a launch and photo exhibit of this book at the Loggia Room of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, 4588 Bathurst St., Toronto, on Sept. 10 from 1 to 9 p.m. The exhibit runs until Sept. 29.

The book can be purchased during the exhibit for $54. A tax receipt for $36 will be issued. All proceeds go toward the JNF.

Modigliani and Pissarro scrutinized in two separate books

Modigliani* by Jeffrey Meyers, Raincoast Books; and Camille Pissarro by Terence Maloon, Yale University Press.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Amadeo (Modi) Modigliani and Camille Pissarro, both Sephardi Jews, were among the greatest visual artists of their times.

Now, thanks to two volumes published recently, their lives are, so to speak, an open book.

Jeffrey Meyers' Modigliani is a rich and nuanced biography of a painter who died young, before his stellar talents were fully appreciated by critics.

Jeffery Meyers

Camille Pissarro by Terence Maloon and four scholars well acquainted with his works offers a keen appraisal of Pissarro's style and his contributions to the art world.

Meyers, a prolific author, says that Modigliani's life was marked by sudden, radical changes – from health to sickness, Italy to France, bourgeois to bohemian, sober to drunk and drugged, sculpture to portraits and nudes.

The scion of Jews expelled from Spain during the Inquisition, he was born in Livorno (Leghorn), the Tuscan port between Genoa and Rome where Hebrew printing thrived and where Jews lived without overt anti-Semitic restrictions.

A sickly child who suffered from pleurisy, typhoid, headaches and tuberculosis, Modigliani was the apple of his mother's eye. She encouraged and nurtured his artistic temperament, and he made the best of the opportunities availed to him.

Brimming with ambition, he arrived in Paris in his early 20s, determined to make his mark. Delicate in appearance, refined, soft spoken, well dressed and fluent in French, he left a favourable impression on those who crossed his path, Meyers observes.

Due to his charm and charisma, he had no trouble making friends. Modigliani formed fast friendships with, among others, Pablo Picasso, Maurice Utrillo, Marc Chagall, Chaim Soutine and the French writers Max Jacob and Andre Salmon.

Yet Modigliani was a paradoxical figure. Friends were struck by the contrast between his personal fastidiousness and his tendency to exhibitionism. And while he was frail and nervous, he was also aggressive, his volatile temper suddenly flaring up, particularly when he felt an anti-Jewish slur.

It should be noted that he arrived in Paris in 1906, the year that Alfred Dreyfus, a French army captain, was finally exonerated of the treason of which he had been accused.

Supported by his mother, Modigliani was the consummate free-spirited artist, frequenting cafés, visiting museums, galleries and the latest exhibitions and reading in libraries.

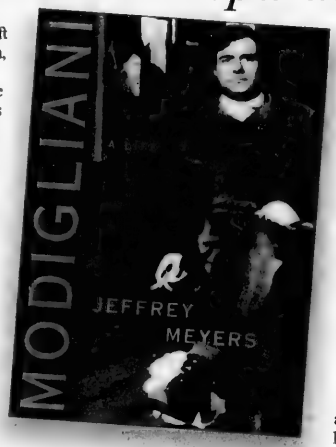
He was broadly influenced by the Art Nouveau movement, cubism, German Expressionism and African sculpture, but also by artists such as Gauguin and Cezanne.

Modigliani exhibited his works for the first time in 1907, but he failed to sell anything, and as Meyers notes, this pattern continued until his death.

Although he was intensely proud of his Jewish background, he was not, in the narrow sense of the word, a "Jewish" artist. Yet his work contained some specifically Jewish imagery, as Meyers explains.

Art was the sole stable element in Modigliani's chaotic life, his only solace and purpose. Again and again, Meyers returns to the sombre theme of his dissolute lifestyle.

Amid illness, poverty and the debilitations of drugs and alcohol, he created a brilliant body of work that ultimately sealed his reputation.



According to Meyers, Modigliani produced the bulk of his paintings in the last five years of his life, but never kept track of them. He lost many of them while moving from one dingy tenement to another, gave some away and sold others to pay his bills.

Meyers devotes considerable space to Modigliani's romantic liaisons. He was quite a ladies' man and flitted from one woman to the next. But his deepest relationships were with Beatrice Hastings of Britain, Simone Thiroux of Quebec and Jeanne Hebuterne of France.

Sadly, Modigliani received no recognition in his lifetime, but today his works are highly prized. As Meyers puts it, "He could not entirely fulfil his artistic destiny, but he left us with some of the most beautiful and original paintings of the 20th century."

The same can be said of Pissarro, the only member of the Impressionist school to exhibit in all eight of their exhibitions in Paris from 1874 to '86.

Born in 1830 on the Danish West Indies island of St. Thomas, the son of a prosperous French merchant family, he was convinced that he was destined to be a painter.

He began his artistic training when he was in his early 20s, and from the outset, showed a partiality for landscape paintings.

Camille Pissarro

But Pisarro had a special affinity for cityscapes as well, and during the last decade of his life he produced more than 300 paintings of the cities of Paris, Rouen, Dieppe and Le Havre.

Although he showed a remarkable aptitude for portraiture, he never accepted a commission, and chose an assortment of women as his subjects, ranging from his adult daughter (Woman Sewing) to peasant women and domestic servants (Young Farmgirl and The Young Maid).

In his paintings, he strove for economy and elegance, using the simplest and sparest means to achieve the most vivid and compelling effect.

"The great problem to solve is to bring everything, even the smallest details, into the harmony of the whole," he wrote.

Maloon says that the pictorial qualities of his paintings, from Montmarte to The Fence, are evident in the success of the composition and the beauty of the colour, texture and handling.

He and Claude Monet were the principal organizers of the first Impressionist exhibition. Pissarro was not only regarded as the unifying figure of that seminal movement, but was revered by the artists he mentored, from Gaugin to Matisse.

But for all his fealty to Impressionism, Pissarro had no problem making the transition to neo-Impressionism, claiming it was "a new phase in the logical advancement of Impressionism."

Compared to Modigliani, there is an unfortunate dearth of early biographical data in Camille Pissarro.

But this, nevertheless, is a handsome and eye-catching coffee-table volume, filled with the luminous beauty of 150 of Pissarro's greatest paintings.

Sleep apnea literally takes your breath away

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — Does your partner snore? Do you have thoughts of moving into another room at night because of it? You may want to reconsider sleeping in another room and get your partner to a doctor.

As people age, changes occur that affect sleep habits, including snoring, especially when sleeping on your back. Research shows that individuals who snore excessively loudly may have a disorder called sleep apnea. Besides snoring, they may also stop breathing periodically while asleep.

With apnea – literally meaning "without breath" – the muscles in the back of the throat are not able to keep the throat open, creating blockages in the airway resulting in interruptions in breathing during sleep. Constant breathing interruption of 10 seconds and more is reason for alarm. Cessation of breathing results in deprivation of oxygen in the blood and, besides being life threatening, can cause daytime problems such as sleepiness, memory lapses, irritability, hypertension, headaches, difficulty concentrating and car accidents.

According to the National Sleep Foundation (NSF) website, people who suffer from cardiovascular problems have a higher prevalence of sleep apnea.

Mary Glick (not her real name) noticed that her husband John (who was 59 years old at the time and had been diagnosed with a heart condition several years previously) would frequently stop breathing while he was asleep. She insisted that he tell his doctor about this.

Finally, after two years of Mary poking him each time she became aware that he stopped breathing for several seconds while asleep, he sought help. At an overnight sleep clinic, John was hooked up to a machine while he slept and the periods of apnea (breathing stoppages) were monitored. The results were conclusive – he was suffering from obstructive sleep apnea, a serious sleeping disorder that can be treated easily.

There are several treatment option methods. They include avoiding tobacco and alcohol; taking sedatives or medications that relax the airway; regular exercise and weight reduction; not sleeping on your back; surgery; and the use of a continuous positive airway pressure (CPAP) device worn during sleep.

John admits now that he used to be overly tired during the day. His doctor noted that John's overweight condition was also a contributing factor to the problem, and suggested that he use a CPAP device, a unit with air pressure that is specifically set to each person's needs. The CPAP unit pushes oxygen through the nose, thus keeping the throat open, which prevents snoring and apnea.

John has been using the device every night for the past four years knowing it is a treatment not a cure. He says it has made a tremendous difference to his quality of life, as he now gets a better night's sleep due to the fact that he no longer has disruptions or stoppages of breathing.

Although sleep apnea can affect anyone, male or female at any age, some factors that increase the risk, according to the NSF, are a small upper airway (caused by a large tongue, tonsils or uvula); being overweight; having a recessed chin, a small jaw or a large overbite; having a large neck size; use of cigarettes and alcohol; and being over 40 years old. The literature also notes that this condition "seems to run in some families, suggesting a possible genetic basis."

Interestingly, John's older brother also suffers from sleep apnea and is using an air device as well to ensure uninterrupted sleep, and he also says he now sleeps better at night.

Signs you may be suffering from this disorder include experiencing snoring on a regular basis that can be heard from another room, and being told you stop breathing or that you make loud, gasping noises while sleeping. The Epworth Sleepiness Scale, used by sleep researchers around the world, asks questions such as how likely are you to doze off or fall asleep while sitting and reading, while watching TV, as a passenger in a car for an hour without a break, or when stopped for a few minutes in traffic while driving a car.

If you think you or a loved one are suffering from a sleeping disorder, bring it to the attention of your doctor. An overnight stay at a sleep clinic may save your life.

Fourteen-year-old puts on a fundraising show

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

There aren't many kids who can say that their summer job consists of producing, directing and acting in a theatre production.

Fourteen-year-old Brian Lee of Thornhill is doing just that – producing, directing and starring in a musical revue to raise money for Giant Steps – a school for children with autism.

Brian Lee

"We have a family friend whose son is autistic. I grew up with him... and he went to Giant Steps. I remember his mom always talking about it [the school], and hearing about it, and I was looking for a charity this year and I wanted to do something to do with autism, so I thought it would be something to do," said Brian.

Last year, at the age of 13, after finishing his final year at Leo Baeck Day School, he produced and directed That's Dancin', a music and dance show presented at the Markham Theatre for Perfoming Arts, to raise money for the Teresa Group – a charity for people and their families living with or affected by AIDS/HIV.

"Last year, what happened was this charity did a book launch at my elementary school, and I thought it was a great charity and I thought of what I could do to raise money for them. I'm very involved with theatre, so I thought it was a good way to do it," he said.

Brian said he's working on this year's production "off and on, because when [not everyone is] sitting and working on it, you have to make sure you have enough money coming in – that type of thing. You're going out getting ads for the program, that type of thing – corporate sponsors," he said.

Brian said charities such as the Teresa Group and Giant Steps are worthy causes.

"Giant Steps uses therapy to enhance the kids' social skills [so that eventually] they can go to public school," he said.

Brian's show this year, called Children Will Listen, is a musical revue with a cast and crew of 11. So far, approximately $1,000 has been raised for Giant Steps.

Brian said he has always had an innate desire to help those who need it.

"I can't really explain it... It does give you a great feeling when you help," he added.

Brian said getting involved with fundraising for a cause is not as complicated as people assume.

"You get an idea [of what you want to do to support a charity] and you contact them with your idea and they'll support you if they think it's a worthwhile idea," he said.

In May, Brian, along with stage actors Lisa Sunshine, Andrew Pifko and Shannon Barnett, performed the musical show On Broadway, with Marshall Loomer, the cantor of Beth David Congregation, at the synagogue.

"[Loomer] did my bar mitzvah with me and heard me sing," said Brian of how he came to work with Loomer. "We then started doing duets on Rosh Hashanah."

Brian said his ultimate goal is to revive the audience for theatre.

Children Will Listen will be performed at the Yorkwoods Library Theatre on Aug. 30 at 7:30 p.m. For more information, contact Brian at 647-295-1124 or e-mail him at childrenwilllisten@hotmail.com. Tickets are $20 for adults and $15 for students and seniors.

Duceppe had 'duty to denounce Islamic extremists,' says Gold

"We tried to stop [the Hezbollah supporters] but it is tough to control 15,000 people... I don't know how many times we asked them to get out, but they kept coming back. Next time around, I hope we have more people in charge of security."

Although Baker's letter was dated Aug. 8, Duceppe said he received it the morning of Aug. 17, noting that the date was two days after the ambassador had given it to the media. Duceppe said he found it inappropriate that it was in English only and said that he did not plan to respond formally.

Duceppe said that the letter he received from the CIC, which was dated Aug. 16 and written in French – was "quite different in tone and in fact. It recognized that we have denounced terrorism."

Signed by CIC president Marc Gold, the letter also expressed the CIC's "profound anxiety" over the rally, especially the pro-Hezbollah presence, and the "clearly anti-Israel" statement released in advance of it.

Gold claimed that the event "created a toxic environment" in Quebec and damaged public discourse.

Gold noted that the statement contains no mention of "the fact that Israel was reacting to an attack and only exercising its most fundamental right to defend itself. Moreover, it contained no explicit denunciation of Hezbollah."

Gold also wrote that, judging from the placards at the rally, it was "more anti-Israel than pro-peace." With the appearance of several Hezbollah flags at a much smaller demonstration last week outside the Queen Elizabeth Hotel, where former U.S. secretary of state Colin Powell was speaking at a Jewish National Fund event, Gold writes that these incidents are no longer isolated.

As the leader of an important political movement in Quebec and Canada, Duceppe has a "duty to denounce Islamic extremists, here and in the world," Gold wrote.

"We believe you must also reaffirm that differences of opinion in Quebec have to be settled in a respectful, democratic and peaceful way. The excesses of the Aug. 7 [sic] demonstration, and certain messages that were conveyed there, have created a toxic environment in Quebec, that is harming the tone and the quality of democratic debate in our society," he added.

"We equally believe that the sovereigntist movement must distance itself from any attempt to exploit for purposes that are contrary to Quebec values of freedom, equality, democracy, secularism and the respect for the rights of women and minorities."

Israeli doubles team ousted early at Rogers Cup

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

The Israeli Davis Cup doubles team of Jonathan Erlich and Andy Ram created high expectations when they finished in the semi-final and final rounds at the last two Rogers Cup Canadian Open tennis tournaments in 2004 and 2005.

So when the Israelis lost their opening match 6-4, 3-6, 10-6, to Wayne Arthurs and Dominik Hrbaty, the duo and their many fans in Toronto were disappointed.

About 200 fans, some wearing kippot and waving Israeli flags, encouraged Erlich and Ram throughout the match at the Rexall Centre at York University. Their enthusiasm helped the Israeli duo rebound with two service breaks in the second set to tie the match.

But the pro-Israeli crowd couldn't help the Israelis return Arthur's serve in the 10-point tie break, as the match was basically over after Arthurs and Hrbaty built the lead to 9-4.

Although disappointed by the loss, Erlich and Ram stayed on after the match for 15 minutes to sign autographs, take photos and thank their Toronto supporters.

"We never take any of our fans for granted. We love coming here, seeing much support from Toronto's Jewish community and the many Israelis living here," Ram said.

Asked whether Israel's conflict with Hezbollah, which was raging at the time, affected their play, Erlich replied: "The war is not an excuse for us losing. When we are on the court, we try to forget about all else that is happening in the world."

But off the court, Erlich and Ram did call family members to see how they were holding up. The duo live in Tel Aviv, but Erlich's parents, Daniel and Susana, live in Haifa.

"None of the rockets that came to Haifa came near their neighborhood, but I call them as often as I can," Erlich said.

Erlich and Ram said they're happy to have come to Toronto, and to have gone to other international tournaments, where their focus remains tennis. "We are not doing ourselves or our families any good by not playing. Our mission is to represent our country well and to give peace and happiness to our friends back home for all our success," Ram said.

Over the past few months, Erlich and Ram have generated lots of praise in Israel for their achievements. In late June, Erlich and Ram won a doubles tournament in England. Ram then won the mixed doubles title two weeks later in July at Wimbledon with Russian Vera Zvonareva, becoming the first Israeli ever to win a Grand Slam tennis title.

One week later, Ram and Erlich upset the favourite British Davis Cup team in England to advance to the World Group two competition.

Erlich and Ram are now ranked sixth among doubles teams in the world.

Ram intends to celebrate in a big way next month when he marries his fiancée, Shiri Zlotikman, on Sept. 12. "Nothing will stop the wedding from taking place and I have every reason to be happy," he said.

Since they started playing together in 2003, Erlich, 29, and Ram, 26, have won eight doubles titles. Erlich immigrated as a child to Israel from Argentina, while Ram hails from Uruguay.

In other Rogers Cup play, American Paul Goldstein tested former No. 1-ranked player Juan Carlos Ferrero of Spain before losing 7-5, 6-2 in his first-round match. Goldstein broke Ferrero's serve three times and held leads of 4-1 in the first set and 2-0 in the second set.

"I thought I played well enough to win. My game plan is to capitalize on unforced errors by my opponents. But Ferrero served well in the games he fell behind, and I was not able to return his serves," Goldstein said after the match.

Although disappointed by his loss, Goldstein feels that at age 30, he is playing the best tennis of his career. Currently the highest ranked Jewish singles player (at No. 71), Goldstein saw his ranking dip to 199 in January 2005.

Since that low point, Goldstein has had success with two semi-final finishes in 2006, and he beat top player Lleyton Hewitt en route to a quarter-final finish in Los Angeles in July.

"I am so grateful for still playing tennis at a high enough level to make a good living. After graduating from Stanford [in 1998], I had the time to travel and not to get disappointed when the achievements were not there because I was 22 at the time.

"Now I am married [to Abbie in 2004] and can't travel 25 to 30 weeks [a year], as I have been doing if the results are not there. So if my ranking dips below 100, I will end my career," he said.

Goldstein was a top junior player, winning the USTA National Boys 16s and 18s national championships. The native of Rockville, Md., has also won 21 Challenger (minor league tennis) titles.

Of all his tennis achievements, Goldstein is most proud of being the first player to win four NCAA Championships and for being a four-time All- American at Stanford University.

He insisted on graduating from university and as a result, is the highest ranked player in the world with a college degree.

Dennis Leary heckles Gibson during Red Sox game

By MENACHEM WECKER
JTA

BOSTON — The Boston Red Sox lost, 3-2, to the Detroit Tigers. But in the mind of Dennis Leary, at least, it was a win for the Jews – and a loss for Mel Gibson.

Actor-comedian Leary and his Rescue Me co-star, Lenny Clarke, were guests on the New England Sports Network (NESN) broadcast of the Red Sox baseball game against the Tigers last week.

When Leary asked if Red Sox first baseman Kevin Youkilis is of Greek heritage, announcers Jerry Remy and Don Orsillo told him that Youkilis is actually Jewish.

"That's fantastic. That's one bottle of whiskey away from being Irish Catholic," Leary said. "They got the Manischewitz, we got the Jamesons. It's the same guilt, the same bad food… I'm so proud to have a Jewish first baseman."

Leary might have confused Youkilis' nationality because Michael Lewis nicknamed him "Euclis: The Greek God of Walks" in his 2003 book, Moneyball. Youkilis, then a minor leaguer, was known for earning frequent bases on balls, or walks.

Once told of Youkilis' true background, however, Leary couldn't resist riffing on the recent anti-Semitic tirade that actor/director Mel Gibson launched into after a drunk-driving arrest.

"Nice! Yeah, where's Mel Gibson now!" Leary yelled when Youkilis snagged a difficult ground ball.

"Mel? I hope in rehab they're showing replays of that. A Jewish first baseman makes the play… Good luck when you come out. Call Jeffrey Katzenberg and ask for a job when you get out. We'll have a whole Jewish infield by the time he gets out.

"Bring back Sandy Koufax," he said, referring to the Hall of Fame pitcher, who is also Jewish.

"We should have Sandy Koufax pitch at Mel's head," Clarke chimed in.

Leary suggested that Gibson's community service should be to take an at-bat against Koufax, with Youkilis playing first.

And so it went. When Remy told Leary that Sox outfielder Gabe Kapler is also Jewish, it elicited a new torrent of jokes. "We got two Jews on this team, Mel! Where's your father now, huh?" Leary asked.

But that's not all – another Jew, Adam Stern, plays for the Red Sox's AAA farm team, and the team's executive vice president and general manager, Theo Epstein, is also Jewish.

Suddenly, Leary and Clarke appeared to have a spasm of contrition over their roast of Gibson.

"Why are we jumping all over him, you know what I mean?" Leary said. "He had a little bit of tequila. You know those days."

But seconds later, when Youkilis tagged out a runner and gave the ball to a fan, they were back to their heckling. "The ball went to a fan! That's more than Mel Gibson's ever done!" Clarke said.

As he was leaving the booth, Leary told Remy and Orsillo, "Hope we didn't get you in trouble."

Trouble, no. In fact, he made them famous for a day, as a video clip of the conversation made the rounds on the Internet.

The arts and aging

By MICHAEL GORDON

The Senior Side of Life

I have to admit to my bias. I believe in the importance of the creative arts as a life force, one that does not wane as one ages and can enhance the quality and fulfilment of the aging process. For those involved in eldercare, the use of the creative arts often has a great therapeutic benefit on the function, well-being and satisfaction of the elders we care for as family members and as health-care professionals.

The source of my bias is personal and professional. My maternal grandmother, with whom I lived until her death when I was 12 years old, profoundly influenced my development and appreciation of music. She sang in the Yiddish theatre, and I would occasionally accompany her to performances, some of which were extravaganzas. I also sometimes accompanied her on the piano when she practised.

Although my mother played the piano, her forte was dance. She was an excellent amateur dancer prior to getting married and continued to love dance throughout her lifetime. She was involved with her senior centre's dance group until her final days. She used to schlep me to performances of the New York City Ballet and the American Ballet. Even with the cheapest seats, somewhere in outer space, I was mesmerized by the grace and beauty of dance. Perhaps most impressive to me was attending concerts of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, with the brilliant Leonard Bernstein conducting.

So my bias in favour of the arts on a personal basis is well founded. It took some time and exposure for it to develop professionally.

Early on in my career at Baycrest (I am the vice-president of medical service there), I had the good fortune of meeting Brucha Stern, a Holocaust survivor who was at the time a resident in the former Jewish Home for the Aged. The first time I met her was during one of her many medical crises from which she miraculously recovered. I immediately connected to her because of her vibrant personality and learned that she was an accomplished late-life artist whose pictures reflected brightness, joy and a positive perspective on life.

Over a number of years, during which she became quite ill episodically, we would discuss art. I discovered that she knew, as a fellow student, my maternal grandfather, an amateur painter who had studied at the Art Students League in New York at the same time as Burcha. That revelation bonded our relationship. After her death, when some of her pictures became available for internal display at Baycrest, I requested that two of them be hung outside my office, where their bright and vibrant colours have delighted me for more than 15 years.

Over the years, with my elderly patients, I have exchanged books and discussed recordings of great works and musicians. I have also given advice to family members about providing their loved ones with music, books on tapes, joining a photography group and participating in creative arts programs to give special meaning to living.

A recent most meaningful interaction with music and the care of our patients and residents at Baycrest involved my 16-year-old son, Eytan. While doing an 11th-grade co-op program at Baycrest where among other things he plays guitar, he connected to a gentleman who had an important role in my life and my career, Dr. Abe Rapoport. A resident of the Apotex Centre, he gently grabbed my son's hand in a warm and appreciative manner after a guitar performance. I told Eytan how meaningful it was to me that he brought joy to the man whose advice and support led me to Baycrest and geriatrics more than 30 years ago: it demonstrated the extraordinary power of human relationships and connections made through the arts.

Epi on Education

Teachings of a master educator

Seymour Epstein

The summer of 1975 was a great one for North American Jewish education in that a few hundred young souls gathered at Brown University for the very first Conference for Alternatives in Jewish Education. That conference gave birth to a coalition, the Coalition for the Advancement of Jewish Education (CAJE), which gave stability to a movement that just held its 31st annual conference at Duke University in North Carolina.

Some 1,400 educators of every possible movement in Jewish life, ranging in age from high school interns to senior educators way beyond retirement age, met to learn together in hundreds of seminars, classes, workshops and meetings. I was there as a fellow educator, but also to celebrate the 26-year career of the CAJE's executive director, Eliot Spack, who will be retiring soon.

One evening that stands out as unforgettable featured Avraham Infeld, senior Jewish educator par excellence and outgoing president of Hillel International, as its keynote speaker.

Relating to the theme of the conference, which was Jewish literacy, he told us that his father had a solid definition of the literate Jew: one who knows more today than he or she knew yesterday. That statement implies two things: that it's never too late to start learning, and that learning never ends.

Infeld also blessed us with an elucidation of his five legs of Jewish education:

- Memory: that which connects the macro past of the Jewish people with the intimate mind and heart of the individual Jew in any time or place;
- The family of the Jewish People, which gives us an empowering sense of belonging;
- Sinai, the presence of God in our lives and the values He teaches us as being transcendent over all human values;
- Israel, land and state, as our homeland; and
- Hebrew, the language that both binds us together as a people and gives us the power to pray to the One above us.

These are the five paths to Jewish literacy as taught by the master, who explained that, in the modern age, having a strong sense of any three would suffice, since that means that at least one would be shared by any two Jews who meet.

Eema, I love you

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

The phone rang. Bela hurried to pick it up. It was Baruch, her youngest son, who only two weeks before had been called up to fight in Lebanon.

"Eema [mother]," Baruch yelled into the phone. "Ani b'seder [I'm fine], ve'ani ohaiv otach [I love you]."

Tears streamed down Bela's cheeks as she yelled back, "I love you. Baruch, remember to eat your Power bars to keep your blood sugar up."

The signal on the phone faded. Bela hoped her boy had heard her voice.

The mother of three sat down at the kitchen table and sipped her tea. On the streets below, the noise of commerce boomed loudly. Voices of children filled the air.

Bela thought how strange that fruit and vegetable merchants were still selling their oranges and tomatoes, while her son Baruch was marching off to war to save the Jewish people. For a moment she was tempted to run downstairs, into the Tel Aviv marketplace, and yell, "Enough. No more deals! Stop with the eggplants. Don't you know where my Baruch is right now?" But she knew they knew. Their sons were there, too.

Bela could hear her husband snoring deafeningly loud. Since Baruch was called up, her husband's siestas were longer, because, she thought, a man knows war personally and therefore needs to find peace in his dreams. She let him snore.

Bela, a seamstress, picked up a stack of pictures, studying each one as if she were a scientist looking at a microscope slide. She firmly held a picture from Baruch's bris.

In the background of the picture, she saw her brother Dov, a strapping paratrooper who met with prime minister Golda Meir after the Yom Kipper War, for saving the lives of three of his buddies. She missed Dov so much since he had succumbed to his injuries. Bela counted the family members who were gone. Her head lowered in sadness and she nodded off.

The sleeping mother felt a tap on her shoulder. With the guilt of a relaxing mother, she quickly opened her eyes and focused in on her surroundings.

"Bela," her husband said softly, "your head looked like it was going to fall off. Oy, I have such tsuris when you get those neck aches. Let's eat."

Bela kissed her husband on the cheek and said, "I love you." He loved her back.

She sat still for one more second and whispered: "God, I've asked you for very little since I got to know you as a child. You'll remember I never lost faith in your plan for the Jewish people even when my boys came home with broken limbs from fighting the intifadah. Well now, I'm asking you for something, which is the right of a Jewish mother whose son is fighting in a war."

"My Baruch is a man with the soul of a poet. He always holds his head high, never wanting us to see the fear that lies in his heart with the knowledge he might have to use his gun one day to hurt another person. But God, a mother knows. And you know. So, I ask you, please watch over Baruch. Make sure he is safe. Please bring him home to us. I ask you for this and promise I will do my utmost to live according to your will. And God, enough already with the wars and the hatred against us. There are only so many white hairs a mother can grow. Thank you for your blessings. Amen"

Bela sat down and nibbled on her dinner. The day would soon be over and sleep would be her gift. She listened to the news, and the names of the soldiers who had been killed that day. Bela said a quiet prayer for their mothers.

Jewish Community Focus

Listening to the echo

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Feature

One of the hottest topics being discussed in the organized Canadian Jewish community is how to reach out to members of the "baby-boom echo" – also known as the "millennials," university-age Jews born between 1982 and 2000 – most of whom, according to a Hillel of Greater Toronto study, have little or no interest in becoming involved in Jewish activities, both on and off campus.

As Jewish leaders and parents have continued to watch members of this younger generation become less and less interested in the kind of programming they grew up on, they've been scratching their heads as they try to figure out why they don't relate to or connect with, and in some cases actually resent, institutional Jewish life.

The main objective of Understanding Jewish Students in Canada: A research study for Hillel of Greater Toronto, which based its format on an earlier Hillel International study, was to gain a better understanding of the attitudes and interests of Canadian Jewish youth on the topic of Jewish involvement.

Hillel has done an adequate job of informing Jewish programmers about the mentality of the "new Jew," defining the characteristics associated with the millennial/echo generation, and what it is that turns them off about Hillel.

But what Jewish organizations should do now is shift their focus away from defining the problem – as a number of studies have already successfully done – and put their efforts into using the data to nurture an emerging Jewish culture that includes edgier publications, music, blogs and social activism, as well as social gatherings that aim to do more than get Jews to marry other Jews.

Best recognized as the organization which has planted forests, parks and trees in Israel. It really does much more - builds roads, constructs dams and reservoirs, develops land infrastructure for new immigrant housing, prepares recreation and tourist sites and conducts research with regard to various ecological concerns. JNF is now embarking upon major developments in the Negev in order to ensure that the barren and desolate landscape becomes habitable and productive and able to accommodate a growing Israeli population. JNF will truly "make the desert bloom" with the hep of its supporters worldwide. Donors to JNF receive receipts for income tax purposes.

'J-blogosphere' a forum for Jewish discussion

By LAUREN BRESLIN
Special to The CJN

Young Jews around the world have found a hip new meeting place – and no, it's not the local synagogue, the JCC or the Hillel House. Thousands of tech-savvy Jews are turning to blogs for their daily dose of Jewish.

Everywhere you surf, the blogosphere is blooming. Technorati, a leading blog search engine, currently tracks 49.9- million active blogs worldwide, with 75,000 new blogs created every day. It's a vast, virtual society, populated by amateur journalists, cultural critics, gossipmongers and tell-all diarists. But somewhere in this cyberspace lives a growing community of Jews looking to connect.

For the uninitiated, blogs (formerly called "web logs") are online journals that typically combine text, images and links. While it's true that any Joe Shmoe can host a blog, it's usually the pithier, more incisive writers who realize the medium's potential to reach a mass audience.

But the real beauty of blogging is its interactivity. Blog readers are always free to publish comments in a designated area, and once they do, they are automatically part of the conversation.

Blog technology is heralded as one of the most democratized revolutions in media. So it's no surprise that thousands of Jews, from all corners of the globe, are going virtual. They have embraced the blogosphere as a forum for Jewish discussion, and as a public space to share information, exchange ideas, challenge the mainstream press, kvetch, commiserate, make friends and generally explore new outlooks on Judaism and Jewish life. Blogging is, quite possibly, the most accessible way for people to interact with one another from anywhere, at any time.

Rachel Barenblat

"That's what I love most about the blogosphere: the sense that I'm constantly in conversation with so many people," says Rachel Barenblat, a 31-year-old rabbinic student living in Lanesboro, Mass., and author of the blog Velveteen Rabbi (velveteenrabbi.blogs.com).

Barenblat created her blog in 2003 as a means to reflect on Jewish festivals and observances, prayers, texts and her own experiences in rabbinic school.

"I live in a small town where the Jewish community is terrific but limited," she continues. "Through my blog-reading and my blog-commenting, I'm in ongoing dialogue with Jews of every stripe around the world all the time."

But are these dialogues meaningful? Yes, argues Barenblat. As someone who reads – and often participates – in 80 Jewish blogs a day, she believes they open the possibility of meaningful connections between Jews in a way that wasn't there before.

Among her favourite blogs is a virtual space for Torah study, called Radical Torah (www.radicaltorah.org), where multiple writers – including Rabbi Arthur Waskow and Rabbi Michael Lerner – share a "progressive" take on the parshat hashavuah, the weekly Torah portion.

Barenblat also enjoys The Head Heeb (headheeb.blogmosis.com), authored by Jonathan Edelstein, a 31-year-old lawyer from New York whose blog is a running commentary on the issues that interest him, such as Israeli politics and the Middle East conflict.

Daniel Sieradski

The great thing about blogs is that everyone's invited to the party, regardless of their denomination, politics or sexual orientation. Barenblat says that alienated Jews find blogs particularly empowering.

"J-blogs can offer a safe way for people on the fringes of organized Judaism – young people, unaffiliated people, people who aren't certain that organized Judaism is for them, those who question Judaism, those who may be intermarried or interdating – to dip into the Jewish world, to meet passionate and interesting people, and to begin wrestling with the question of their own Jewish identity," she says.

"Walking into a synagogue for the first time if you don't know anyone can be terrifying. Clicking over to somebody's blog is a much smaller commitment. It's an open door, a way to welcome people in."

'Blogs highlight the generational divide'

Although the exact number of active Jewish blogs is hard to pin down, they are now known, collectively, as the "j-blogoshpere."

The term was coined by Steven Weiss, a 25-year-old New Yorker and one of the web's most prolific Jewish bloggers. Weiss hosts three Jewish blogs, the most popular being Canonist (www.canonist.com), a Jewish news and culture blog with the subtitle "Blogging Religiously."

Weiss also blogs about Jewish news on campus (www.CampusJ.com) and good kosher cooking (www.kosherbachelor.com), but Canonist is his most well-read site, averaging 25,000 to 30,000 page-views a week.

"What blogs do is they say, here's a medium – do with it whatever you will," says Weiss. "And sometimes the Jewish discussion is about Israel, sometimes the Jewish discussion is about ritual, sometimes the Jewish discussion is about being Jewish. And it's entirely up to the participants to determine where it goes."

Regaining control over the media is a hot topic for bloggers.

Daniel Sieradski, creator and editor of Jewschool, a progressive Jewish blog, sees blogging as the antidote to the mainstream press.

"Blogs are an attempt at democratizing the media," he says. "Bloggers focus on the news that they want to hear about, and the conversations and issues that they find important, as opposed to the talking points or the agendas set by their leadership."

Meanwhile, Sieradski also points out that the popularity of blogs, especially among younger people, highlights the generational divide.

"Our parents took the things they would read in the newspaper or see on television at face value," says Sieradski. "Because it was coming from a big news outlet, they trusted it to be authoritative. What's happening now is that people are quickly realizing, by engaging with the journalistic tools themselves, how simple it is to appear authoritative, and how simple it is to skew the news to cater to your own agenda."

Indeed, anyone looking to supplement the "corporate" media with a more organic form of Jewish journalism will find blogs especially appealing.

A recent Jewschool post, for example, discussed the criticism levelled at Israel for its air strike against the village of Qana, Lebanon, and the disturbing media images that followed of Lebanese bodies being pulled from the rubble.

"Israel and its supporters know full well that every strike Israel makes against Hezbollah within civilian areas is the equivalent of a strike against Israel itself, as it turns international opinion against Israel and breeds more extremism," wrote Sieradski on July 31.

Jewschool, with 30 contributors from five countries and 50,000 readers a month, is one of the most popular Jewish blogs on the web. But perhaps the mother of them all is Jewlicious (www.jewlicious.com), another group blog that gets a whopping 10,000 visitors every day. Recent Jewlicious posts also delve into the current crisis in Israel and Lebanon, but other posts go slightly off topic, like an Aug. 1 entry that sought to solve the ever-pressing mystery of kosher shrimp-encrusted fish sticks.

Apparently, a Jewlicious reporter discovered a package of frozen fish sticks, containing shrimp paste, with a kashrut symbol on the box.

"If you don't know, shrimp ain't kosher. Ever. We're talking biblical unkosher," wrote a blogger named "themiddles."

"Yes, yes, it's a punishment, but who ever said being Jewish was easy?"

All told, the diversity of topics buzzing through the j-blogosphere not only represents contemporary Jewish life but it also provides a means of engaging with it.

"Blogs archive and preserve an ongoing conversation about what it means to be Jewish in this day and age," says Barenblat. "Many young Jews seem to feel that the organizations which served our parents' and grandparents' generations don't necessarily speak to our needs or to the ways in which we want to enact our Jewishness; in the blogosphere we can speak up about what we want Judaism to be, we can work together on shaping the Judaism to come."

And that, truly, is something to blog about.

Heeding the echo

Hillel's study took a step in the right direction by giving community leaders a glimpse of what goes on in the heads of young Jewish adults.

The 641 students who completed the survey were classified into three categories based on their level of Jewish self-identification.

Forty-four per cent of respondents were placed in the "moderate" category, which means they feel pride in being identified as Jewish, but rarely take part in Jewish activities.

Only 20 per cent of those polled were identified as "low," which means they barely have any connection to Judaism, while 36 per cent of the students were classified as "high," which means they frequently take part in Jewish-themed events.

The study focused more on the "moderates," because they're regarded as a "swing group" with the potential to become more involved in Jewish campus life.

According to the study, the largest proportion of the students polled consider themselves to be either non-denominational or secular. As well, most moderates – about 65 per cent – don't see marrying a Jewish partner as a defining element of their Jewish identity.

The study also suggests that compared to the highs, moderates rarely or never participate in Jewish events on campus. Some of the reasons listed were that they don't relate to the people who go to them, they don't hear about the programs in the first place, or they don't find them inclusive enough.

Moderates, most of whom have non-Jewish friends, don't want to participate in programs that don't include their friends.

One program that continues to succeed in attracting moderate Jews is birthright israel. Fifty seven per cent of moderates have been to Israel on this free trip, and for the most part, all come back feeling more connected to Israel.

What this data suggests is that organizers of youth-oriented events need to place less of a focus on strict religious practice and more of an emphasis on broad Jewish traditions and philosophies if they want to succeed in luring members of the moderate group.

For instance, combining the philosophy of tikkun olam (repairing the world) with the opportunity to travel seems to be the hottest trend among youth looking to become Jewishly involved.

Jews of the so-called "echo" or "millennial" generation are better educated, more ambitious and more socially active, and they've grown up in a more globalized world than their parents, so it's no surprise that programs such as Tzedek Hillel, Students Taking Action Now: Darfur (STAND), and Project Equity – all run by students who live by the tikkun olam philosophy of helping to make the world a better place – are attracting students of all denominations.

Respondents to the Hillel study rated programs that are inclusive and provide a welcoming atmosphere for all political, religious and other viewpoints as the most important characteristic that a Jewish organization can have.

For the religiously observant, minyans such as Kehilat Hadar, an independent, egalitarian minyan in New York City, aim to reach out to all members of the Jewish community, whether old or young, male or female, straight or gay.

And when it comes to social events, the study suggests that students prefer programs with educational, thought-provoking or entertaining themes, rather than being thrown into a room with a bunch of other single Jews in the hope that some will get married and procreate.

Organizations such as the Adath Israel Young Professionals Network and The House provide this kind of programming.

But perhaps the biggest thing taking the young Jewish community by storm is the onslaught of new Jewish magazines, such as Heeb, Guilt and Pleasure and Jewish Mayhem, as well as blogs such as Jewlicious and Jewschool.

What can be learned from all these new initiatives – which are mostly being created by young Jews themselves – and the response they're getting is that it's time our parents begin to realize that the more they try to convince their children that institutional Judaism is the right way to be Jewish, the more their kids will come to resent it.

The older generation needs to embrace this revolution and let young people be Jewish in the way they want to be Jewish.

This year's community focus is an attempt to show young readers – and their parents – that there is a way to be involved Jewishly without giving up on, or being deprived of, aspects of secular life that we have become accustomed to in this borderless, multicultural society.

The challenge: creating the ultimate Jewish singles program

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

It's the million-dollar question in the fight against intermarriage and assimilation: what kinds of programs do young single Jews like to attend, and how do you figure out what they want so you can tailor events to their needs?

While nightclub parties and "matzah ball" bashes have been common forums for young, single Jews to meet, event co-ordinator Judith Weinroth opted for a different approach, combining lectures with social gatherings.

"We wanted to have a user friendly place for young people in their 20s, 30s and 40s to socialize, learn something and in the process, be with other people in their own age group," says Weinroth, an organizer of several programs for the Adath Israel Young Business and Professionals Network.

"We had no hidden agenda, except to help them meet each other."

Weinroth co-ordinated such programs as a lecture about the way the press covers the Middle East and a fun night out at the Bistro Grande restaurant.

"There are many other singles groups that hold parties, but to the best of my knowledge, this is the only one where lectures are a focus. I like that," says a 38-year-old systems analyst who asked that his name not be published.

Suzy Dickstein, a 33-year-old financial and insurance advisor, says the Adath young professionals events had a different feel than others she's attended.

"Many of the other events that I have attended have been in the [recreation] room of a synagogue or downstairs at [a kosher restaurant]. [The Adath venues] had a more upscale ambience."

Although a few events garnered decent turnouts, Weinroth has decided to take a "hiatus" from any more programs for the time being. "Until I can build my market, get some credibility and assure people there will be a really nice turnout, there's no point," she says.

"I don't think starting small works. And I don't know what [the young singles] want… I think we have to find out what these young people want."

So how do you go about finding out the answer to that proverbial million-dollar question?

Weinroth and her associate, marketing professional Jerry Maser, suggest an interactive website that would act as a virtual singles community for young Jews.

"What is missing [in the Jewish community] is the development of all sorts of interest groups and activities where young single Jews can meet each other," Maser says.

"On an interactive website, we would have postings for hundreds of different activities. Each person would go to the web page, check off what they like and there would be people who organize these activities. They would also have discussion groups about what they like, so we would learn what we need to about their interests and create for them what they want."

The website Maser is talking about is "Jewish Singles World," a project he and Weinroth have been working on for years.

They believe the idea has much potential in the effort to combat the gradual loss of Diaspora Jews to intermarriage, but will only be able to make significant in-roads if it's widely marketed with a massive media blitz.

Judith Weinroth and Jerry Maser

"You've got to create awareness before you can have any effect," Maser says, driving home his point by noting advertising is the best way to reach the 56,000 Jewish singles who are dispersed around the Toronto area.

"A heavy [advertising] campaign for a few months will help the word spread like wildfire."

The challenge that Jewish Singles World faces is raising funds.

"We have been desperately trying to raise funds for a couple of years," Maser says. "The only way this can be done is by having Jewish foundations support us."

Maser and Weinroth told The CJN last December that they would require about $300,000 in seed money to get the program up and running: to buy media placements, operate the website, rent venues, hire staff and operate Jewish Singles World in a professional manner.

Even though many local singles events haven't attracted scores of Jews, Weinroth says the desire for Jews to court their own is there.

"I think if young Jews had a preference between two programs – one guaranteed to have 200 Jews or one guaranteed to have 200 non-Jews – they would go to the program with the 200 Jews," she says.

"But what sort of event they want is something I don't know."

Dickstein, for her part, has at least one suggestion.

"Today's organizers need to understand that we need something interactive to lighten the pressure of dating. It needs to be more about getting to know people and laughing with them than about what they look like."

Rabbi reaches out to interfaith couples as rates climb

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

With intermarriage rates in North America continuing to climb and the importance of marrying within the Jewish faith becoming less of a priority, community leaders are being encouraged to reach out to interfaith couples in an attempt to ensure Jewish continuity.

Jewish Life in Greater Toronto: Trends and Attitudes of the Greater Toronto Jewish Community, a report published by the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto in June, focused on the trends of Jewish communities in Jewish education, religious observance, affiliation with Israel and intermarriage.

Perhaps the most troubling conclusion the study makes is that intermarriage rates are continuing to rise.

Of the 654 Toronto-area Jews who successfully completed the survey, 11 per cent of respondents said they are either married to or living with a non-Jew.

Passover in the Matzah Aisles runs in supermarkets across North America.

The report says that "while intermarriage rates are lower for Jews than for most other ethnic groups in Canada, intermarriage represents a serious threat to Jewish continuity given particularly low Jewish fertility rates and increasing levels of assimilation."

On a more positive note, only Rhode Island and Atlantic County, N.J., showed lower intermarriage figures than Toronto, with the American figure hovering around 31 per cent.

Toronto also has a higher proportion of non-Jewish spouses converting to Judaism, at 30 per cent, than other North American cities.

However, about 28 per cent of the respondents said their children married non-Jews, and among Jews who live "outside the sphere of Jewish neighbourhoods," such as in Aurora or Newmarket, 80 per cent of respondents said they have children who married non-Jews.

According to a 2001 census, 70 per cent of Ottawa couples age 30 or younger are intermarried.

"[This] suggests that such geographic detachment from the community may be associated with lower levels of affiliation and connection that stretch across generational lines."

The data also suggests that children who are raised in intermarried families are themselves more likely to intermarry.

Almost 30 per cent of those living in intermarried households said their children were brought up within the Jewish faith, 37 per cent said within both faiths, and almost 30 per cent without religion.

While intermarriage is a concern for the Jewish community, Rabbi Tina Grimberg, the spiritual leader of Congregation Darchei Noam in Toronto, said an even greater threat to Jewish continuity is children not being raised Jewish.

"It is a lack of Jewish life, Jewish living and Jewish learning [that is more of a threat]," she said, adding that a low fertility rate among Jews compounds the problem.

"[Those who say intermarriage threatens Jewish continuity] have a valid concern. But the issue is not only that Jews don't marry Jews, it's that Jews who don't marry Jews have less than a 50 per cent rate of raising their kids Jewish. The concern is not only that couples are intermarried, but it is about their commitment to Jewish life."

Rabbi Grimberg added that her goal in reaching out to the intermarried Jewish community is to see that "the Jewish partner's passion for Judaism is ignited, and that the non-Jewish partner has an interest in Judaism and an appreciation is ignited in them as well."

She said the growing rate does worry her, but she is just as concerned about the "indifference that a Jew feels for his own traditions."

Julie Seltzer, the communications associate and program officer at the New York-based Jewish Outreach Institute, and Sonja Spear, the national Mother Circle co-ordinator at JOI, said the organization is attempting to create a more welcoming and inclusive community for intermarried couples and unaffiliated Jews, because it is this, they say, that will ensure Jewish continuity.

Spear explained that the JOI performs research studies to learn about Jews "on the periphery" and about how welcoming the Jewish community is to them. The organization also trains Jewish organizations to eliminate barriers that would deter the unaffiliated and intermarried from becoming involved in the community.

JOI helps interfaith couples raise Jewish kids

"A lot of what the JOI advocates is going to where the people are rather than waiting passively for the people to come to you. The goal is to re-energize Jewish communities," Spear said.

The service JOI provides is aimed at Jewish professionals, who can then use their training to reach out to their respective communities.

Rabbi Tina Grimberg

One of the programs, called Passover in the Matzah Aisles, runs in communities from British Columbia to Washington, Spetzer said.

"Basically, they teach people about Passover and tasting Passover foods, in the supermarkets. Passover is one of the holidays most celebrated, even by unaffiliated families, so they might go to the supermarket to buy a box of matzah before the holiday, and this is a way to go where the people are instead of waiting for them to come to Jewish institutions," she explained.

But one program aimed specifically at welcoming interfaith families into the community is the Mother Circle.

> 'The goal is to re-energize Jewish communities'

"The Mother Circle is a program of education for the non-Jewish mother in an interfaith relationship who has decided to raise her children as Jews," Spear said.

"The program is meant to empower her to transmit the Jewish tradition to her children and also to deal with the Jewish community."

Spear said that based on JOI research, it is the mother who takes on the responsibility for the religious upbringing of their children. She estimated that 200,000 non-Jewish women in intermarried relationships are attempting to raise their children Jewish, while the community offers them little or no systematic support.

Sonja Spear

"If she is not Jewish and she is not converted, it seems that there is no clear place for her in the community, and in many cases, the women who were doing this felt alienated, even slighted, because they felt they were getting a cold reception," Spear said.

The Mother Circle has two parts: A national listserv, an Internet mailing list, that includes women from all over North America, and an eight-month course, a class that meets twice a month.

Spear said the listserv allows women who are not Jewish but decided to raise their children as Jews to contact each other to form a virtual support network.

"On the list just recently, women were talking about what happens when the child next door comes over and says to your son, 'The Jews killed Jesus.' How do you answer that, especially if his mother is still Christian?

"That was a lively discussion and raised a lot of passion and some sensible answers," she said.

Meanwhile, the eight-month course includes sessions on everything you would need to know about raising a Jewish child.

"There are discussions on how to talk to your in-laws and also in informal sessions, usually with the whole family."

Spear said the Mother Circle offers the participants who "feel like they are just faking it… a kind of authenticity, a kind of security in what they are doing and why they are doing it."

Rabbi Grimberg, who has a background in marriage and family therapy, has been doing her part to connect with the interfaith community in Toronto by conducting intermarriage workshops and working with couples during classes and private meetings.

"I usually make a habit of having them over for Shabbat dinner. My husband and I reach out to these couples and I see them through the year of the conversion process, all the way to the chupah, which is a tremendous joy," she said.

Spear said that rather than fight the intermarriage trend itself, the community needs to work on instilling in them a sense of belonging.

"What the Jewish community needs to do to ensure its own future is to make raising a Jewish child easy and comfortable, to make sure the community offers the children of intermarriage a warm, secure place in which it is easy for them to affirm their Jewish identity," Spear said.

Not your bubbie's magazines

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Where can you find an article about women with menorah tattoos selling authentic red Kabbalah string? Or an article about a motorcycle club for yeshiva boys in Iowa?

Welcome to the new face of Jewish magazines. In the past year, there has been an explosion of Jewish publications – not of the local variety, but national and international. That there are so many publications popping up shouldn't be a surprise to anyone at a time when magazines like Heeb: The New Jew Review have shown that young Jews are eager to express their views.

In fact, 10 new magazines are launching, or have been recently launched. They are, in no particular order: Jewish Living, American Jewish Life, Mensch, Guilt & Pleasure, American Jewish Spirit, Heeb, Soul Magazine, Jewish Mayhem, Present Tense and Notebook.

If the sheer number and style says anything, it's that today's Jew reads magazines reflective of a different kind of Judaism, the kind with shock-jock topics, where limits are pushed, taboos are challenged, and the conventional is turned on its head. Some are awarding covers to any popular rapper or comedian who happens to be born to Jewish parents; others are focused on "flipping the bird" to the once-sacred.

These publications are focused on the ennui of the postmodern Jew, the "new" Jew, the cultural Jew, to make Judaism more inclusive to multi-identity persons of the Hebraic persuasion.

Perhaps it was Heeb magazine that began it all, or at least popularized, this "new Jew" identity with which the magazine refracts its lens. Some call it edgy, risqué, provocative, counterculture, but the national Jewish magazine, launched four years ago, has ostensibly given inspiration to others.

Heeb shows that there is more to Jewish publications than the retread topics of day-school-funding kvetches, the Holocaust and the local macher's newest philanthropic efforts.

Atlanta Jewish Life, which was the print form of the website Jewsweek previously, included stories of wider interest beyond those focused on life in Georgia, mostly pop and celebrity culture with a Jewish twist, including reports on Madonna and Kabbalah, Jewish celebrity interviews, and columnists like Kosher Sex author Shmuley Boteach.

Other publications, such as Jewish Living and American Jewish Spirit, are keeping a dash of conventionality, spiced up with giant glossy photos and twists on familiar topics. The former, for example, has had articles on Gelt Complex, Chanukah Chic and Kibbitzing with Sarah Jessica Parker.

Though not necessarily targeted toward the new Jew specifically, there appears to be recognition of that important demographic. The new publications demonstrate a common denominator: it's hip to be Jewish.

Joshua Andrews, the 33-year-old publisher of Jewish Mayhem, wants his magazine to be "a little more racy" than anything else out there. Stories about Jews with tattoos, the Jewish mafia and Jewish bikers are not uncommon. It's not surprising then that he has received an endorsement by porn star Ron Jeremy.

"These are stories not in the mainstream. These are Jews that come on board because they're going to get alienated from the rest of us. Jews tend to get alienated… they see a Magen David symbol and they get turned off, and it reminds them of everything bad they know about Judaism," says the Torontonian.

His magazine "gives them an open-source kind of concept, the result of which is Jewish Mayhem."

Andrews launched the website two years ago as a forum for Jews who "didn't grow up in insulated environments, like Teaneck [N.J.] or Thornhill [Ont.], but made urban centres their homes," he says, adding that the print-edition debuted last month.

"Too much of our identity is based on the past, the Holocaust and the suffering, or on the future, continuity, assimilation," says Present Tense publisher Ariel Beery of how his magazine was named. "But what's going on in the here and now? It's a young new age of Jewish consciousness. I want my magazine to be a focal platform for those discussions."

Beery, 26, now studying for his master's of Jewish philosophy at Columbia University in New York, says he does not consider himself a new Jew and he hopes people don't think his magazine is about that.

"I personally take issue with it, this multicultural universalism, because that's what's 'in.' New Jews are bagels and lox. You don't have to be Jewish to enjoy bagels and lox. For me, being Jewish is an operating system, not a computer program. Some people have a bagel and lox program, but for some people that's their Jewish operating system. It is a way of life."

Benyamin Cohen, editor of American Jewish Life, feels the same way. Like Beery, he says that new Jew culture can seem like candy, when people should be getting steak and potatoes.

"My philosophy is 'now what?' You get people in the door, people talking about it… but you need some kind of Torah-based activity after that," Cohen, 31, says.

'They've created a lot of Jewish pride'

"I take issue with a movement that is getting a lot of Jews involved – it's getting one-note Jews involved, solely involved because of x or y. God bless those who take it to the next level, marry Jewish, raise their kids Jewish. But there has to be a redeeming value," he adds.

Beery says it is important to see the difference between Judaism as something you are, rather than something you do.

"Perhaps the new Jew is something their parents aren't," he adds.

A new study, The Latte Report by the Reboot organization, focused on the dislocation between the growing and intense interest young Jews have in their Jewish identities and the complete disinterest they express about Jewish institutional life.

The new Jews, according to many, don't believe religious institutional affiliation automatically equals spirituality, but that spirituality can be found in any place. They believe acceptance isn't contingent on your level of connection with Judaism. They are people who don't neatly fit under the umbrella of any one kind of movement.

Mireille Silcoff, editor of Guilt & Pleasure, says that her magazine is "for people who might be addicted to ideas, like reading good stuff in an exuberant package. If a lot of people think we are new Jew-ish, I think we are new Jews. Everything can be slotted somewhere – there is some movement of young Jewish culture going on. It's normal."

She says that young Jews are craving Jewish intellectual culture.

"New Jew culture appeared to be pap a few years ago, and people derided things like Heeb as overly ironic, pooh-poohing it, that they were turning everything into a joke. I just think it was a gateway for us. If something like Heeb didn't exist, I'm not sure that G&P would have come out. They've created a lot of Jewish pride among Jews."

Young Jews create their own congregations

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

Single Jews are among the least likely of Toronto's Jewish population to belong to synagogues, according to Jewish Life in Greater Toronto, a report published this past June that was based on a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto survey.

But around North America, single Jews, who tend to be younger and less inclined to affiliate with traditional mainstream Jewish organizations, have been creating alternative shuls and minyanim to fulfil their spiritual needs.

This past year in Toronto, a group of recent university graduates established Kehilat Or Hadash, a roving traditional minyan for young people, complete with mechitzah, that has held periodic services in such places as people's homes and the Wolfond Centre at the University of Toronto.

Take Kehilat Hadar, a five-year-old, self-described "grassroots community" on Manhattan's Upper West Side. Its co-founder, Elie Kaunfer, said that "institutional Judaism" – which includes Orthodox, Conservative and Reform synagogues – is struggling to attract Jews in their 20s and 30s, but Kehilat Hadar has succeeded in attracting this elusive demographic to its services and educational programs.

He said that with its traditional approach to liturgy, as well as its egalitarianism and spirited services, Kehilat Hadar offers a combination of enticements for young Jews who have been turned off by the institutional Jewish scene.

"By spirited services I mean that we are infusing new melodies but keeping the rhythm of traditional services alive," Kaunfer told The CJN. "Also, the service is layled, with different people leading each week, so there is a different approach to the service each week.

"People were excited to come to a community where people their age were in charge, and saw that as a model that they could connect and contribute to," he said.

Egalitarianism is an important part of Hadar's philosophy. Women lead services, read Torah and are not separated from the men by a mechitzah.

As a result, Hadar, which is neither affiliated with any religious movement nor a breakaway from a synagogue, has attracted a wide spectrum of Jews from varying backgrounds.

Indeed, Kaunfer is reluctant to describe Kehilat Hadar in terms of categories such as Orthodox or Conservative, noting that many Jews avoid using such terminology to define themselves.

Ultimately, he thinks that one word doesn't do a good job of describing the spiritual journey of modern young Jews.

"In past generations, your definition of your Jewry was very important. Orthodox or Conservative stood for a specific ideology," Kaunfer said. "Now, young people are finding that these terms don't describe their personal Jewish journey accurately."

Kaunfer grew up attending a Conservative synagogue, but in university was exposed to many different types of Judaism through Hillel. After graduating, he spent a year in Israel "with people where denominational slots weren't part of their vocabulary. A one-word label doesn't describe me very well. It's a more complicated identity than one word can transmit. People are not willing to identify themselves on one plane anymore.

"Jews in my generation are not bothering to explain what 'my Conservative Judaism' means as opposed to what 'my Judaism' means," he said.

Kaunfer believes that Kehilat Hadar has also been able to isolate the factors in institutional Judaism that tend to alienate young people.

The House lets students feel right at home

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

College-age students gather at the House.

A small group of young Jews share their reflections about a book on Jewish thought as they sit on a cozy couch in a second-storey storefront-turned-living room.

In another room, two students do their own learning in a more intimate fashion. Then a few people pop in because they spotted the lights on and want to see what's happening.

This is The House, a non-profit, hip setting in mid-town Toronto that "bring[s] together the heart and the mind in a rich blend of intellectual discovery and spiritual exultation," its website says.

The House, located on Eglinton Avenue between Spadina and Avenue roads, started a few years ago with the intention of being a relaxed forum to experience Jewish education.

"I've always felt that education is the greatest way to bond with your Jewish identity," explains Rabbi Rafi Lipner, director of The House. "Especially within this demographic, Jewish thought creates excitement."

After starting off with programs twice a week, The House now boasts events most days or nights of the week, with as many as 130 students streaming through its doors for programs that range from laid-back discussions and lectures to Shabbat dinners and concerts.

Rabbi Lipner says the 17- to 23-year-olds who frequent The House are drawn to it because of its openness.

"What scares [this demographic off] is a lot of red tape," he says. "Not being an organizational or institutional centre, there's no pressure. It's a place where you walk in and know it's open. The House is very real, and that's what I think students are looking for."

Though programs often take on a social dimension, Rabbi Lipner says The House isn't just a place to get together.

"We don't run anything that doesn't have value," he says. "We always scrutinize what is the meaning of this event and that it's well beyond just bringing people together."

The House also organizes occasional tikkun olam projects, teaming up with other groups, such as Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee.

Lipner says he sees value in the different approaches that other Jewish groups and organizations take to courting this demographic, but he also says that many young Jews are averse to being a "part of them" and are more inclined to go somewhere where the slogan is "we have something for you."

As The House website states, "it's all about helping you discover a Judaism you can call your own."

More than anything else, Rabbi Lipner passionately believes that education is the key way to the Jewish soul.

"People can get sensory pleasure or enjoyment anywhere, but to be Jewish is really to learn what it's all about," he says. "It's not just about how you cover your head – it's how you fill it."

For more information, visit www.checkoutthehouse.com or call 416-569-6647.

'People come by because they want to'

For one, he said, young people don't necessarily identify with the hierarchical authority of a rabbi running services. At Kehilat Hadar, it's not readily apparent who organizes the services, since the leaders are members of the community and one person usually will not lead a service more than once a year.

As well, guilt, a traditional Jewish staple, is totally absent from Kehilat Hadar. "Our philosophy is if people don't want to come, then maybe the program should change or end," said Kaunfer. "Using this model, we have never once found ourselves without a minyan at the beginning of services. People are coming because they want to."

While many Kehilat Hadar attendees are single, it never holds singles events. "Most people shun singles events because the only thing in common for attendees is that they are single," Kaunfer said.

If single people happen to meet at Kehilat Hadar programs, which cater to singles and couples alike, it's because they share a common interest, not because they are single, he added.

From its humble beginnings five years ago in an apartment with 60 people at its first service, Hadar has grown to an average of 200 people and now meets three out of four weeks of each month.

"On the High Holidays, we get 600 people, and we do a Shavuot retreat which sells out every year with 250 people," Kaunfer said.

Come for the learning. Stay for the fun.

Ten terrific reasons to give your child a USDS education

United Synagogue Day Schools' new initiatives strengthen our position as a leader in day school education. We are committed to building the best possible programs and facilities in order to continue to provide the best education. Here are ten terrific reasons to give your child a USDS education:

1) Nursery Program – The nursery program at the Bayview campus builds on the success of the Early Years Centre of Excellence. Here young children are introduced to pre-numeracy and literacy skills, an integrated Jewish studies program, arts and crafts, music and creative movement.

2) Yesod/Foundation Program – The goal of the program is to support students in grades 1 and 2 who need to consolidate their first language skills before being introduced to a second language. The customized curriculum builds a strong foundation in general studies and gradually integrates Hebrew language instruction and promotes academic excellence.

3) TeLeM/Adapative Program – This program, beginning in grade 4, is designed to deliver our current Jewish curriculum in English for students who would benefit from learning Jewish studies in their first language. During the Jewish studies portion of the day, subjects are taught, discussed and evaluated in English, with the integration of texts, key vocabulary and terms in Hebrew. Hebrew language arts continues to be delivered in Hebrew.

4) Mechina – This program provides an opportunity for students who have not previously attended Jewish day school to enter at middle school (grades 6-8). They receive Hebrew language instruction and study the Jewish texts in English.

5) Song, Circle & Celebration™ – USDS, in partnership with Beth Tzedec, will sponsor five fun-filled events over the 2006/2007 school year. Preschoolers, parents and grandparents can celebrate their Judaism in a warm nurturing environment. Based around Jewish holidays and themes each program includes music, arts and crafts, snack and playtime activities. Events will take place at both campuses.

6) Math, Literacy and Technology – USDS offers a cutting edge math curriculum called Math Makes Sense and a focus on literacy which is the touchstone of academic success. Technology is integrated into the program across all subject areas allowing for enriched curriculum.

7) Progressive Teaching Strategies – The approach of Differentiated Instruction includes Multiple Intelligences Theory and encompasses the child's interests, learning styles and maturity. Educators develop different approaches to teaching that meet the range of needs in the classroom.

8) Construction at Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Community Campus – As part of its strategic plan for the future, USDS is moving ahead with a strong presence in the north. This new state of the art facility is set to open in Vaughan in 2008.

9) Bathurst Campus Renovation – USDS, in partnership with Beth Tzedec Synagogue, is working on a joint renovation that features a full size gym, green spaces and larger classrooms.

10) Outstanding Professional Educators – USDS educators are committed to the core mission of the school. Their passion for drawing on the moral and educational purpose at the heart of USDS brings about teaching that is second to none. We welcome Ashley Waltman, former principal at North Toronto Collegiate, as the new Bathurst Campus principal. We also welcome Jordana Mednick, USDS alumni and graduate of JTS in New York, as the nursery school teacher at the Bayview Campus.

USDS is part of the Conservative Movement's Solomon Schechter Day School Association. Lucy Cohen, Head of School, is excited about the opportunities that these initiatives provide. They build on the USDS goal of "inspiring excellence in each child".

Record company produces current Jewish music

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

JDub Records in New York City has become known as the company that found and nurtured the talent of platinum-selling Orthodox Jewish reggae performer, Matisyahu.

While Matisyahu ended his relationship with the small, not-for-profit label in March, other artists signed by JDub include klezmer/rock band, Golem, and The Balkan Beat Box, whose music is a fusion of electronica and folk music from the Balkans, North Africa and the Middle East.

Aaron Bisman, executive director and label manager along with Ben Hesse, established JDub Records five years ago.

"I went abroad for a year, and when I came back, [Ben] had been working on a project that combined chassidic and Middle Eastern Jewish melodies with hip hop and electronica, heavily sampled and layered. It was really interesting and creative and sparked a lot of conversation," said Bisman, who studied music business at New York University.

"We spent a lot of time asking questions and realized that there was no music label, no Jewish organization and no record company that would know what to do with that kind of music or how to properly market it.

"It had to be in secular spaces, not in synagogues or Jewish community centres. It had to be marketed as authentically Jewish, but also as really good, innovative music. We just sort of set out to create that organization ourselves."

Around that time, Hesse met Matisyahu through a Chabad rabbi they were both studying with.

"[Matisyahu] was just becoming religious at that point. [The situation] was a little bit of the right place, right time. JDub really benefited him as well. He was doing stuff at Chabad houses, and it just wasn't what it should've been. We talked to him about playing at open, secular spaces and making those spaces welcome to all people, not just a religious crowd," he said.

"We also really helped him develop his music, his band, the marketing – all those bases."

Bisman said the Jewish-themed music of JDub Records has had an impact on the secular Jewish community through its promotion of modern Jewish music.

"We're putting the music first, knowing that it makes great connections with young Jews, for many reasons, around identity and community, but that JDub is about art and music, and that's not always commercially successful," he said.

"The reason we exist is that there is no commercial entity that does what we do, which is invest heavily in artists that have great impact on the world."

Bisman said old, traditional Jewish music is "from a different generation.

"Music is a major part of pop-culture, and it often defines how you dress and who your friends are and what you do with your free time," he said. "Having music out there that sounds really good at the same time, that is coming from a unique cultural place, is really valuable in terms of where we are at this point in time."

While Bisman is thrilled at the mainstream success of his artists – The Balkan Beat Box performed at Bonnaroo, the biggest music festival in the United States recently – he doesn't think Jewish music will dominate the Billboard charts any time soon.

"I think we've proven that we have Jewish artists who can be very popular in a mainstream world, with different levels of success. I don't think, as a whole, Jewish artists are getting popular," he said.

"I think we now know what's possible. I don't think we've seen a mass success of Jewish artists yet and I don't think we will."

Bisman is optimistic about the future of JDub and Jewish life at the moment.

"[In] a world where individuality is valued, to have high-quality Jewish [material] which young Jews can identify with and claim as their own, is something that we really haven't had ever before," he said. "I think [our artists] really speak to people because there was a real need for it even before it existed."

SoCalled is an artist signed on the JDub label.

While Bisman has achieved his goal of creating a record company devoted solely to current Jewish music, he is still looking to the future.

"We have yet to see any success out of any non-Ashkenazi musicians, and I think that would be really interesting to see," he said.

JDub Records is supported by the Joshua Venture Fellowship, the Natan Fund and Bikkurim Incubator for New Jewish Ideas.

Jewish salon offers community outside traditional institutions

By TANIA HAAS
Special to The CJN

When Mireille Silcoff moved from Montreal to Toronto in 2002, she found herself without the comfort of her friends or family, or an outlet to explore her Jewish identity. Not one to dwell on the negative, the ambitious journalist created her own community by hosting an evening of conversation, a "salon," for 14 people.

Three years later, the Jewish salon has emerged as the latest trend in non-traditional Jewish engagement.

The concept is simple: provide a venue for a group of individuals, most of whom are Jewish, and let them converse.

"A salon is a talking party – nothing more complicated than that," said Silcoff, a journalist, writer and editor-in-chief of a new Jewish quarterly magazine called Guilt & Pleasure.

Guests may or may not know one another, and conversation can range from philosophy and food to freedom.

"My salon is not bible study. It's cultural talk," she said.

"The point of the salon is to get people together in a leisure setting to talk. It can be a very grand affair in the sumptuous Parisian tradition or five people on a patio on College Street."

Since first hosting a salon in her Clarendon Avenue apartment, Silcoff has organized dozens of salons at venues across Toronto.

At one of Silcoff's events, 60 to 70 young professionals attended four separate salons held at the Drake Hotel on Queen Street West.

Finding that event too bombastic for the salon's purpose, she followed up with a more intimate affair at a small French restaurant in Kensington Market.

Unlike the larger Drake party, La Palette's was a more inviting ambience for conversation, the drawback being that not all willing participants got in.

"There was a cap at 30 people at La Palette. And every month following, the demand would grow," said Silcoff.

What makes the Jewish-salon concept so appealing to the young professional crowd? Silcoff suggests that much like her initial reason for starting the salon, individuals in their late 20s and 30s are trying to incorporate Jewishness into the rest of their lives.

"People want community, but some people don't want the traditional institutions because they feel like they deal with the concerns of another generation. People want something that feels right and relevant for the circumstances under which they grew up."

Mireille Silcoff

Shaina Ezrin, 28, a registered nutritional consultant working in Toronto, may join a synagogue in the future, but right now her interests in the Jewish community are different from her grandparents' generation.

"For my grandparents, all their friends were in the Jewish community. That was their world," said Ezrin.

"For me, my colleagues and friends are from different walks of life, and my community is not based solely on religion, but on similar interests. A lot of my friends are into yoga, organic foods and environmentally conscious issues. These are the people in my community."

Ezrin grew up in a Jewish home, and she is dating someone who is Jewish. But like many of her Jewish peers, her identity derives partly, but not exclusively, from her religion.

Finding appropriate social events that reflect her diverse interests can at times be challenging.

"In the back of my mind, there is always the desire to get more involved with the Jewish community," Ezrin said.

"I want to get involved with Jewish events, but it needs to take place in an environment that I feel comfortable and connected to. I would join something but not just because it is Jewish, but because it has meaning for me."

Elli Chemel, 27, a designer and manager for a Toronto event company, sees a need for more substance and inspiration in organized social events.

"Create something that is inclusive to all people," he said. "One of the biggest turnoffs is the exclusive Jewish event. As soon as you make an event only a Jewish thing, it loses the element that is appealing to me."

Chemel said he sees the value in Jewish events but would more likely attend festivals and concerts with Judaism as a branch, not as the main tenet of the event.

So are salons the "Jew-dos" for the intellectual crowd? According to Silcoff, the salon is not a veiled matchmaker attempt but, rather, an enriching, positive contribution to current Jewish culture.

"Whether the salons lead to people getting married is really not my concern. My concern is to make something that is communal, to make something relevant. If you take care of the present, the future will take care of itself. There is way too much concern about the Jewish past and the Jewish future. Meanwhile, the Jewish present is falling by the wayside. The way I try to address it is by creating good events that people want to be a part of," Silcoff said.

Since the launch of Silcoff's Toronto salon in 2003, Jewish salons have taken place in Montreal, New York, Los Angeles and Chicago. Hosts across North America are replicating Silcoff's salon formula to meet their social, cultural and spiritual needs. Or, perhaps, they want to have a good conversation with interesting people.

Jewish students meeting on Facebook.com

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

It used to be that through "Jewish geography" you could always find yourself a couple of degrees separated from other Jews, though not necessarily be able to meet or speak with them.

Then came the search engine Google, which makes it possible to get information on who they are or what they do, and perhaps how to contact them. Consider Facebook.com a combination of the two.

Facebook is becoming one of the most popular virtual and vital meeting places for Jewish students. The Facebook website, spanning nationally and even internationally, is open to the general public. There are literally thousands of different local discussion groups on the site revolving around topics such as Israel, activism, Jewish comedy, Jewish culture and the many stripes of Judaism.

Jesse Paikin, a 22-year-old York University religious studies major, says that he lobbied Facebook for about a year to come to Canada, whereas previously it concentrated mostly on the United States. "Finally, it worked. I think it's great, even if it takes up far too much of my time," he says.

There are hundreds of groups to join for young Jewish Canadians of diverse interests. A search for "Jewish" or "Israel" culls groups such as "I Sit in Hillel All day and Eat Jewish Food," "The Top 10 Reasons Why I Support Israel," "I Love Israel," "Zionism: The Fight For Our Land," "Union of Progressive Zionists," "Honorary Jews," "Sexy Jews," "I Went To an Officially Non-Jewish School That Felt Like a Jewish School," and "The Jews of Fine Arts."

Searches can also be done on a myriad of topics, including music, TV or politics. Signing up for groups is generally as easy as clicking the "join" button on the screen. Members can see who else has joined, see other member profiles and partake in the discussions.

Launched in February 2004, the free service touts more than seven million people registered, with representation from more than 2,200 colleges – over 150 in Canada.

Talia Klein, 33, is the creator of the Facebook group Betar-Tagar, a Zionist organization. She served until recently as director of Hillel at York University and found out about Facebook from her Hillel students.

"I tend to belong to groups that share my interests, like pro-Israel groups or groups of people who read the same books as I do or listen to the same music," says Klein, who adds she has nearly a hundred friends on Facebook.

"It is very easy to create a group and send [virtual] invitations to people to sign up... people will spontaneously join if they like the subject matter," she says.

While Facebook does not have a real-time "chat" function, users can leave private messages that function like e-mail or can place a note on the bulletin board (also known as "the wall") of whatever group they belong to.

Klein concedes that it can be hard to meet new people on campus, and the "virtual Jewish campus" makes connecting with others easier.

Facebook adds new element to Jewish geography game

"I see it happening already," she says. "There are new groups and events popping up on Facebook all the time. I would highly recommend a new student arriving on campus to join the Facebook groups and to meet new people there. It is definitely an excellent way to break the ice and to make friends before encountering the existing groups in person at the Hillel."

Shaun Bernstein, 19, a second-year professional writing major at York, found out about Facebook through some older friends at York who had discovered it a year ago. As soon as Bernstein received a York e-mail address, making him eligible for Facebook, he joined.

The site requires that the user identify themselves with a school or company e-mail address to ensure they are who they say they are. Members share information and their personal profiles only with others in their networks and with confirmed friends.

Bernstein counts more than 200 Facebook friends – both new and old – and belongs to over 100 groups, adding that he has reconnected with friends dating as far back as preschool.

"I'll go into my friends' groups, a lot of Jewish groups, groups for causes I believe in."

As for Jews meeting other Jews online or at events, he says, "They would all be on a very similar wavelength, so it could work really well for Jewish singles networking."

Jenna Goldenberg, 21, is a York business major who began using Facebook about a year ago, and stays in touch with friends and meets new people through it.

"I have joined groups that I thought were funny or that I had some kind of interest in," she says.

And although she belongs to groups relating to Judaism and Israel, she says Facebook helps maintain rather than adds to her Jewish identity. Goldenberg says she is like many others who, despite not frequenting Jewish school events, often instead finds Jews to interact with online, and connects with new friends on Facebook.

"So I do believe it could make it easier for people to meet in that sense," she says.

Jewish students, therefore, can play Jewish geography online effortlessly with other campus friends on Facebook to find other like-minded individuals.

"I feel that there is a strong Jewish Facebook community out there, and they do actively seek each other out for social events, [such as] Jew-do parties, and also more religious events on and off campus," says Goldenberg.

"'Jewdar' [the ability to detect that a person is part of the Jewish culture/religion – short for "Jew-radar") is definitely heightened on Facebook, since you can see pictures, names, schools, friends and other giveaway associations. So it makes it easy to find other Jews on campus."

Facebook user Talia Klein says the virtual Jewish campus makes connecting with others easier.

Students STAND up to help others outside their community

By DEANNA LAMPERT
Special to The CJN

Students spend more time at school than at home, and many turn to campus groups for a way to become socially active and feel they are doing something to help those less fortunate than themselves.

STAND (Students Taking Action Now: Darfur) is one example of how university students can get involved with a cause, regardless of their religion.

Ben Fine, 23, a co-founder of STAND Canada, graduated from engineering at the University of Western Ontario (UWO) and currently attends Boston's Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT), where he is working on a master's degree in the same field.

Three years ago, Fine learned of the genocide in Darfur, Sudan, and because he had been taught the Jewish philosophy of tikkun olam, repairing the world, he felt that somehow he had to make a difference.

According to the STAND website, the Sudanese government forces and government-backed ethnic militias known as Janjaweed have committed war crimes, crimes against humanity and participated in ethnic cleansing of the black Sudanese.

STAND's goal is to create awareness of this issue, advocate solutions and provide resources that would ultimately promote action to end the violence in Sudan.

Fine, who is Jewish, believes that other Jews find STAND inviting because the issue hits close to home.

"Jews today are very comfortable in their communities, and joining a group like STAND allows them to find common bridges with people who are from different [backgrounds]," Fine says.

Another organization trying to make a difference by promoting social action among students, especially in Darfur, is Project Equity, whose vision is to see this world become more as it should be – a world that values human life and encourages equal opportunities.

Like STAND, Project Equity, which has both high school and university students, invites young people of all ages and ethnicities to join together for a common cause. Earlier this year, it organized a student rally called Screaming for Darfur.

What makes STAND and Project Equity appealing to students is that they can get involved in a worthwhile cause and meet other students who share the same values.

Danny Richmond, the 21-year-old national program director of Canadian Young Judaea (CYJ), co-founder of Va'ad Tikum Olam (VTO) and also a Darfur advocate and student at the University of Toronto, believes that today's youth are interested in becoming involved with social action.

"Any organization offering students a sense of ownership and real responsibility is one that is very enticing to youth," Richmond says.

"Idealism is strong in youth and so is passion. The natural [outlet] for these two is tikkun olam. The emphasis… of tikkun olam is both inward toward the Jewish community and outward toward the general and international community," says Richmond.

Fine believes that young people become active because they have the luxury of living in a place like Canada where they can be comfortable with who they are inside and outside their community. This ability to be comfortable allows young Jews to spread their wings and reach out to other communities without feeling as if they are neglecting their own, he says.

There are STAND Canada goups at UWO, McGill University, Concordia University, University of Toronto and Queens University.

Picture this. You are a young Jew attending university in Toronto. You have yet to make friends because you have little time to socialize.

You realize that university or any other post-secondary education is expensive and you want to get as much out of it as you can.

Your classes are huge with hundreds of people, which makes it hard to find friends there.

Where do you turn to find people in the same situation as you? You could join the Mosaic Outdoor Club of Ontario (MOCO).

MOCO is an organization that appeals to people of all ages, especially young adults. MOCO offer participants a chance to enjoy nature and the opportunity to make new friends.

Today's young Jews lead hectic lives and have little spare time. Some of them are not interested in traditional, institutionalized Jewish programming. It's not to say that students are less religious, but some are just looking for a way to combine their beliefs with an active and community-based lifestyle.

"Modern Orthodoxy has become more religious and the other movements more liberal, leaving less of a place for the centrist Jew within institutionalized Judaism," said Maxwell Kates, 28, one of the younger MOCO members.

He understands that the world has changed and that the nine-to-five work week has expanded to the weekends in some cases. Kates, who said he "used to be in radio and standup comedy but when that got boring, [he] decided to become an accountant," calls this situation "time poverty."

He said students are too busy, even in the summer when the school year is over, to become involved with the Jewish community.

Summer vacation is no longer about going to camp with friends, he added. In most cases, students have to work to save money for the next school year.

Some are so consumed with their studies that they enrol in summer school. For those people in particular, the Mosaic club is the perfect way to take a break.

MOCO is a non-profit organization that doesn't advertise. Kates heard about the organization through word-of-mouth while volunteering for the United Jewish Appeal.

Kates said one of the reasons MOCO appeals to young adults is that it offers activities such as hiking, biking, canoeing, skating and horseback riding. These season specific sports are for those aged 19 and up, while younger people can get involved as long as a parent or guardian accompanies them.

The activities promote socializing and making friends, and being active could help a student shed the "freshmen 15" – the weight university students tend to gain in their first year away from Mom's home-cooked meals.

"The name Mosaic itself pays tribute to the interweaving of outdoor activities and Jewish history," Kates said.

The first chapter of Mosaic was founded in Denver in 1988 and was named after the first Jewish outdoorsman, Moses.

Today's young Jews seek places to achieve religious and spiritual knowledge outside the organized Jewish community.

Kates, who has met Mosaic members from Russia, Israel, Iraq, England and across Canada, said that Mosaic offers many trademarks of synagogue culture such as community involvement, discussions, food and self-actualization.

"Mosaic tries to be as respectful to observant Jews as possible by refraining from organizing events on Friday night or Saturday. You can also attend as many or as little events as you wish," he said.

Another aspect of the organization that works well for Jewish students is the low annual fee of $35.

Those who choose not to become members but want to take part in a particular event pay $6. There may be added fees for sports equipment rentals.

Tzedek Hillel: Jewish identity through social action

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

A growing number of Jewish students are using their university years to answer Rabbi Hillel's well-known challenge: "If I am not for myself, who am I? But if I am only for myself, what am I? And if not now, when?"

Last year, through Tzedek Hillel, the social action program of Hillel of Greater Toronto, groups of Canadian Jewish students visited hurricane-torn regions of Mississippi and Louisiana not just to witness the devastation, but to lend a hand.

"You see all these images of things in the media," says Ninat Friedland, a visual arts and psychology major at York University who went to Mississippi in January. "It's sort of separated from your life here."

Twenty Torontonians joined some 60 U.S. students repairing roofs of homes that had been destroyed. "We'd have to strip the roof of old shingles and nails, repair rotting wood, and cover it up again with felt paper, new shingles and tar," Friedland says.

Participants met local residents living in FEMA trailers and heard stories about when the hurricane hit. "It was quite awful," Friedland says. Even in January, months after Hurricane Katrina, "a lot of [Gulfport, Miss] had been evacuated and was still gone…it seemed quite empty when we were there."

Ninat and Bobby

Friedland also spent her 2005 reading week in Honduras with Hillel building a school for a small village.

Social action is a growing interest for Jews on campus, says Devora Schwartz, Tzedek Hillel's director. "A lot… don't relate to their Jewish identity religiously – [they relate] more culturally or through social action programming."

Friedland is among them. She recently joined Temple Sinai, but says she has never felt "part of the mainstream Jewish community…we shul hopped for most of my life. I went to public school, a lot of my friends aren't Jewish."

While Hillel on campus is traditionally better known for Shabbat and social programs, those don't appeal to everyone. That realization led to the creation of Schwartz's position four years ago. "[Non-observant students] want to be able to bring non-Jewish friends [to programs]. You can do that with volunteer work," Schwartz says.

Jewish involvement includes reaching out to all communities

On extended trips, participants must be Jewish, but not for local events, such as a January program called Focus Africa, featuring Paul Rusesabagina, the manager of Hotel Rwanda.

"It was really a tremendous day," says Schwartz. More than 1,200 people attended talks by Rusesabagina and Stephen Lewis, now UN Special Envoy for HIV/AIDS in Africa, that were co-sponsored by other campus organizations such as the University of Toronto Students' Administrative Council. Other local endeavours include sandwich-making for the homeless and a tutoring program at King Edward Public School.

Schwartz went along to Mississippi and to New Orleans in February. There, "instead of just roofing, we did everything: put siding on houses, insulation, painted, poured concrete… all different kinds of jobs. A lot of hard work."

> 'Judaism provides a framework through which to do social action'

Staying at Tulane University, "our students got to meet their students… and hear their personal stories… a lot had just started school when the hurricane hit."

Hillel trips aren't just about physical labour, Schwartz says. "We try to use the Hillel International model of a service learning program, with educational programs in the evening."

In Mississippi, Shabbat services catered to several denominations, and the Hillel students stayed in the Westminster Presbyterian Church – where the kitchen was kashered for them – while a rabbi led discussions on "the Jewish perspective on repairing the world and volunteerism."

Even being in New Orleans during Mardi Gras was a learning experience.

"It was the first Mardi Gras since the hurricane…they got to hear from different locals about how they felt running Mardi Gras," Schwartz says. "Some thought it was great, with money coming in, but others thought it was not a time to be celebrating."

Schwartz believes next year may be even busier for Tzedek Hillel, thanks in part to an Everett Initiative grant, funded by a New York philanthropist, to promote student social justice initiatives. The grant was given for Tzedek Hillel's participation in U of T's anti-racism campaign, part of its mandate to "build bridges on campus through social action."

She hopes there will be more Hurricane Katrina and Rita relief trips through Hillel International, along with a possible trip to Uruguay to build houses. And "next spring, we'd like to take students on an extended volunteer trip… up to a month of hands-on volunteer work."

There's little crossover, Schwartz says, among people who take part in social action projects and those who attend Hillel's cultural or religious programs – in other words, signing up for a trip to Honduras is not necessarily going to lead to a Shabbat dinner or Chanukah party.

But she says the choice to pursue such projects through Hillel shows strong Jewish identity. "There are lots of different organizations you can volunteer through. Students who come with us like to go with other Jewish students. They benefit from the Jewish learning part that we add to the trip, also."

As Friedland says, "Judaism provides a framework through which to do social action."

Gen J offers programs for young Russian Jews

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

From left, Rabbi Levi Jacobson and Allan Motrosov on a birthright Mayonot trip to Israel last May.

From outside a room at the Reena Centre in Thornhill, you can hear the singing, laughter and chatter of young Jewish adults who are originally from the former Soviet Union [FSU].

Every couple of months or so, around 150 people come together to celebrate Shabbat as part of Gen J – the Russian Jewish Community Centre's program for people between the ages of 18 and 31.

Rabbi Levi Jacobson, originally from Brooklyn, N.Y., established the program in 1999 in order to teach Jews of Russian extraction about Judaism. Judaism had been severely repressed in the FSU following the Russian Revolution.

"Unlike the Canadian Jewish community, most [Jews from the FSU] grew up in an environment where they never went to shul at all. The Canadian Jewish community, even those who don't consider themselves religious, observe High Holy Days, went to shul, most of them had a bar or bat mitzvah they had some type of Jewish connection," he said.

"There was less Judaism displayed [in the home of Russian Jews], and this is thanks to Communists that they lived under and the persecution that they'd experienced in Russia. They knew they were Jewish, and many of them were proud that they were Jewish, but they didn't really know what it was to be Jewish. They definitely didn't appreciate the beauty of Judaism."

Rabbi Jacobson said the Shabbatons are the highlight of the Gen J, but the frequency of them is dependent upon the season.

"Sometimes we'll have it every few weeks, sometimes we'll have it once a month," he said.

Other programs include camping trips, getaways and movie nights as well as Thursday challah drives to Jewish families north of Steeles Avenue. There are nearly 500 people on Gen J's mailing list.

He said it's important to not teach Judaism in a diluted context because "it just doesn't work.

"A lot of older leaders will want to do something cool, and get everyone excited. It might work for a week or two and then after a while, they [participants] will turn around and say 'this is fake, I want something real,'" he said.

Thirty-year-old Ron Gersh was not born and raised in Russia as his parents were.

"When I came into it [Gen J], I observed Yom Kippur and Pesach, and that was pretty much it. We didn't even celebrate Shabbat," said Gersh.

Seven years ago, he was one of the founding members of Gen J. The organization was launched after Rabbi Jacobson asked his friend Irvin Studin for advice on how to connect with the Russian Jewish community.

Religion is about more than dos and don'ts, rabbi says

Studin, who was an Oxford University Rhodes Scholar at the time, was leaving for England and left Rabbi Jacobson with a list of young Russian Jews he thought would be interested in a project and the rest is history.

Gersh said the Gen J Shabbatons are a "critical success factor.

"You get to sit around and talk to people. There's talking and singing. You learn a little bit about who you are," he said.

"[Rabbi Jacobson] usually makes a speech with a Jewish connection. He takes everyday scenarios that are happening, like the war in Lebanon, and you can discuss it and learn [the Jewish perspective]."

Gersh said Gen J is an ideal program for networking and meeting other Jewish people.

"If you're at the age of 21 to 30, there are a few things that you're looking for. You're looking for a network of friends, you're looking [for a girlfriend, boyfriend or potential spouse]. I know a lot of Jewish guys are at that stage," he said.

"You're looking for business contacts. All of these things come to play 'cause you're setting yourself up with a network of people."

Rabbi Jacobson said that those involved with the Gen J program have an eagerness to learn about their religion.

"People are looking for meaning and inspiration. People want to learn. They are not afraid and do not have any preconceived notions. But if you ask them if they know anything about Judaism, they'll say that they don't really know, but that they'd like to know more about it," he said.

"People want to have more meaning in their life. They want to find more significance in their day-to-day life and they feel that it's out there and, unfortunately, some people go to the Far East or different religions to look for spirituality, but Judaism has a huge amount to offer and a lot of them are looking for that and want to know what it is."

Rabbi Jacobson said some Jews see Judaism as being based on "dos and don'ts," which is not what the religion is all about.

"Judaism is all about making the world a beautiful place and serving God, and a lot of people have misconceptions about what all these things are – what God is, what the world is, and where we're headed as individuals and as a people," he said.

"Definitely, there is an emphasis that we have a responsibility which in turn means that we all have to do whatever we can to make the world a better place, which is by doing mitzvahs and so on and so forth."

Gersh, who is now shomer Shabbat, is optimistic about the future of Judaism for Jews of the FSU.

"I think there are a lot of good things going on. I think it's really easy to point out negatives and things you want to pick on, but the way I see it is that there are a lot of positive things," he said.

"There are a lot of people who are involved and care about Israel. There are a lot of people who want to connect with other Jews in the community, and I don't see it as a good or bad thing. I think it's just very interesting. I'm noticing a lot of people becoming religious, too."

Rabbi Jacobson said another reason for Gen J's success is that"I don't judge anybody for who they are or who they're not."

"A Jew is a Jew is a Jew. I look at every Jewish person with a Jewish mother, or it they are converted properly, like my brother or sister [or] just like myself. I don't say, 'Oh, you don't do that properly so you're not a full-class Jew.' It's pretty clear and I think I've gotten that message across, and thank God we've been successful in what we're doing."

For more information about Gen J, visit its website at www.genj.net, contact Rabbi Levi Jacobson at 416- 222-7105 or e-mail Jacobson@jrcc.org.

Range of Israel experiences are available to students

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Putting out fires or working at a newspaper might not sound like a typical Israel experience for a Jewish student, but many people might be surprised to learn that tours to the Jewish state take all kinds of shapes and forms.

Besides the well-known free 10-day birthright israel trips, Jews of university age can get a different taste of Israel by volunteering or interning there. And for those looking to immerse themselves in a hands-on experience, there are plenty of options.

One such program is offered by Magen David Adom (MDA), Israel's ambulance service, in which volunteers receive first-aid training and are placed at ambulance stations assisting medics. And although they are not the first responders to an emergency such as a bomb attack, they are often on the scene as a second responder.

Jaime Lerman, 19, who volunteered this summer with MDA, simply paid the cost of a plane ticket and $500 for her six-week trip. She described her time with MDA as "one of the best experiences I've ever had."

Lerman, a business administration major entering her second year at the University of Western Ontario, contrasted her trip with the more communal Jewish life that she experiences on campus. "Hillel you do with others, but this trip you do on your own."

As an MDA volunteer, she put in 40-hour weeks, experiencing everything from bandaging to taking blood pressure to giving oxygen to patients.

Her unit was once called on to avert a suicide attempt, and fortunately, the woman's daughter came home early that day and found her in time. In another call, Lerman attended to a homeless man having a heart attack.

Jaime Lerman volunteered with Magen David Adom

"I felt as though I was helping. I love the fact that I got to participate in some way in Israel," Lerman said. "I felt like I was part of the community."

In fact, Israelis asked her to join in some of their activities on Yom Ha'atzmaut and Lag b'Omer.

"You go into many people's homes and see they way Israelis live. It's not just seeing inside a hotel," she said. "The trip made me want to go back and continue volunteering or go to school there. This trip opened my eyes."

Students can also find a variety of programs, many subsidized, that are suited to their needs. One is a professional internship program that facilitates two- to five-month placements for students to work alongside Israelis in their field of choice. Students in the past have been placed at newspapers, as interns with MKs, and as workers with special needs students.

Another program allows students to be on the scene with Israeli firefighters in a program called Lehavot (which means "flames" in Hebrew). The six-week program, in which volunteers are placed at fire stations across the country, is similar to the one with MDA.

"Many participants subsequently forge a much stronger connection to Israel during and after the programs," said Dina Gidron, outgoing regional director of the Israel Aliyah Centre, which, though its Israel Program Centre, promotes programs that send Jewish students to Israel for hands-on programs.

In the Marva program, volunteers join the Israeli army for eight weeks and go through an ersatz basic training.

Going beyond birthright israel

"They learn discipline, wear greens, spend time on a base, and learn shooting training," Gidron said.

Marva volunteers, she added, gain insight to what it's like to be an Israeli soldier, particularly when they are in uniform and regular Israelis can't tell them apart from real soldiers.

The Toronto Jewish community has also developed a link with the city of Eilat called Partnership 2000, Gidron said. It allows students to spend time in the beachfront city and foster a bond with its people by being, for example, placed as an intern in a marine biology lab.

For those wanting to spend a semester to a year studying in Israel at places such as Hebrew University, a program called Masa provides $2,000 scholarships from the Jewish Agency, Gidron noted.

Michal Kaye, regional director of the Israel Program Centre, said the trips she helps organize for students "are very personalized. Some want to go and have a good time, and others want a learning experience. We try to make sure it's the right program for them and we get to know them, whether over the course of two or four months."

Kaye said many people who take part in these individualized programs are birthright israel alumni who want to spend time living and working in Israel to see what life is like there.

> 'They came back excited and filled with great experiences'

"These aren't group programs in the sense that it's 30 people on a bus. You go out on your own and explore. It has a very strong impact on people that volunteer," Kaye said.

Adam Hummel said he heard about some of the individualized Israel trips from people who had raved about their experiences.

"So many students I spoke with who went on Israel trips came back fuelled with inspiration. They came back excited and filled with great experiences," said Hummel, a fourth year political science and history major at York University.

"That's why I think it's a good idea to go on a trip where you can experience Israel in whatever way fits you best."

In December 2004 he went on a two-week trip called Hadracha, led by Hillel staff, that consisted of touring and meeting with journalists and politicians such as Natan Sharansky's assistant; David Horowitz, editor of the Jerusalem Post; and columnist Yossi Klein Halevi.

"So many people are always getting hooked on Jewish life from these trips. Volunteer summer programs like these provide meaningful experiences," said Hummel, who will be the president of York's Hillel for the coming school year.

Hagshama brings Israel to Canadian Jewish students

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

"We're bringing Israel to the campus, and the campus to Israel," says Daniel Roth, the Toronto-based regional director of the World Zionist Organization's Hagshama department.

Whether it's Canada's largest Yom Ha'atzmaut party or an on-campus film festival of work by female filmmakers, Hagshama is bringing its dynamic new Zionism to young people around the world.

"It's hard," Roth says. "At U of T there's something like 3,000 Jews on campus," but only around 10 per cent are estimated to be active in Jewish organizations like Hillel.

"Engaging them is the goal... to convince someone they have a cultural, historical... [or] any sort of interest in Israel because they're Jewish."

To reach that goal, in 1998, WZO formed Hagshama (which means "fulfilment") to work with existing community organizations and create Israel-centred programming that has a broader, more modern appeal.

Locally, Hagshama's role is twofold: presenting its own programs, developed through its central offices in New York and Israel; and encouraging on-campus programming by providing funding and logistical support to local organizations.

In March, Hagshama brought female Israeli filmmakers to Canada as part of its own FeminIsrael program. The women's films, touching on important feminist issues facing Israeli society such as divorce laws and homosexuality, were shown at the University of Toronto, Queen's University, McMaster University and the University of Calgary. Past FeminIsrael events have also featured talented Israeli authors.

Anat Zuria, an Israeli filmmaker, came to Toronto in March to promote her film as part of Hagshama's FeminIsrael program.

The other facet of Hagshama's role is supporting existing local organizations. "We want to work with you. We want to help strengthen your group," says Roth. "Whether it's Hillel or [the new organization] Hashomer Hatzair-Kidma, let's help strengthen you in the campus community."

This year, along with the Union of Progressive Zionists (UPZ, a new umbrella group formed by the youth movements Habonim Dror, Hashomer Hatzair and Ameinu, formerly the Labour Zionist Alliance) and Meretz USA, Roth helped plan birthright israel trips for "a different contingent that hasn't been reached" thus far by the free program.

These students were attracted by the UPZ's critical left-leaning approach and moderate two-state advocacy. "They're bringing in a new section of the campus community who is not necessarily enticed to be active by groups like Hillel or Aish [HaTorah]."

While the campus environment is often divided between extremist ideologies, Roth believes modern Zionism can be both moderate and pro-Israel.

'Zionism can be both moderate and pro-Israel'

It's all about "broadening the spectrum of Zionist thought, activity and discussion," he says.

Roth feels he's meeting the challenge "if I can convince a young Jew who's anti-Israel or apathetic toward Israel not that their politics are wrong but that their politics are best served in becoming active and aiming to fix Israel."

Just saying that "Israel has problems... doesn't make you anti-Zionist, just someone who sees there's something to fix there. If you see that, you should go for that goal."

Roth, who grew up in Hashomer Hatzair, says many young people are coming to "see their Zionism, in part at least, as actively working toward a better Israel" through social justice and an end to conflict.

Internationally, Hagshama has also become known for programs such as Do the Write Thing, a campus-based media awareness program for journalism students that's held during the United Jewish Communities' annual General Assembly.

Birthright israel: 'no cookie-cutter experience'

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

You've probably seen the ads, and maybe wished you were between 18 and 26. In seven years, more than 100,000 young people have travelled free with birthright israel. But thanks to a system of independent trip providers, it's no cookie-cutter experience.

Lauren Wolff, 27, advertising and promotion co-ordinator for Cancer Care Ontario, participated in May 2005 after facing her fears about Israel being unsafe.

Finally, realizing everyone she knew had come back safely, she says, "I figured I might as well… I had paid vacation time."

She joined a young professionals group organized by Canada-Israel Experience (CIE) in Toronto and the trip blew her away.

"The trip itself is… nothing you expect," says the University of Guelph graduate.

"Jerusalem completely floored me. I cried like a sissy at the Wall… twice."

Wolff was transformed from someone who dreaded visiting Israel to a gung-ho supporter who wants to spread the message to young professionals, for whom birthright is a welcome break.

"It's 10 days of pure fun – you're a kid again at camp," she says.

She credits CIE for putting together an eventful itinerary meant to help create a connection to Israel, even for the most secular participants.

CIE and other trip providers are allocated a certain number of spaces to fill and follow specific guidelines set by Taglit-birthright israel, which, along with the Israeli government and local Jewish federations, subsidizes the birthright trips.

Anyone with one Jewish parent who has never been to Israel on a formal peer program can apply, even if they've visited with their family.

Coby Segal, a 27-year-old electrical engineer, was born in Israel and lived there until he was 12.

He participated in the first Canadian trip, in February 2000. Now a trip leader, he says birthright changed his childhood impressions and strengthened his spirituality.

"Birthright has contributed very strongly to my Jewish identity."

Though Taglit (meaning "discovery") sets the core agenda, each provider offers a slightly different take. Mark Snaper, 18, returned in July from a trip run by Aish HaTorah.

"Israel to me was paradise… gorgeous…unbelievable," says the Thornlea Secondary School student.

Rabbi Mark Zelunka, who accompanied that trip, believes there are advantages to an Aish birthright trip, such as having a rabbi along, though the 29-year-old says with a smile, "I'm not your zaide's rabbi."

"There was not a single religious student on this trip," says Rabbi Zelunka, who himself became observant in university. His goals were simply "having a lot of fun, and making it meaningful in a very laid-back, unconditional way."

Despite the escalating conflict in Lebanon during his stay, Snaper says trip organizers helped participants feel safe at all times.

'In Israel, everybody belongs to everybody'

"We didn't go to some of our destinations because of the situation."

Snaper hopes to return next year on the subsidized Aish fellowship program, a three-week followup at a more relaxed pace than birthright, where, Zelunka says, "You're whipped around the country very quickly."

While Snaper, growing up aware of birthright, probably always assumed he'd someday get the chance to go, for others, even a free trip may seem impossibly out of reach – though not for financial reasons.

This summer, Masha Posen, an occupational therapist with Toronto's Zareinu Educational Centre, accompanied nine special-needs young adults in the first Canadian trip of its kind. Challenges included cerebral palsy and "invisible" disabilities such as developmental delays, autism and mental illness.

The logistical hurdles took creativity, a sense of humour and a suitcase full of craft supplies. Every detail, from marking luggage (with bright strips of tape) to allocating room keys (with homemade lanyards), was planned to make the experience meaningful at each participant's level.

Visiting Yad Vashem – a stop required by Taglit – meant interpreting the Holocaust for adults who are developmentally delayed. They visited the Children's Memorial, viewing photos of children and candles reflected to infinity by mirrored walls, a visit that left an impression on many participants.

"A lot of my family did not survive the Holocaust… it was sad for me. I thought about them," says Jared Krybus, 21, a participant with special needs.

An Israeli taxi driver cried and thanked Posen for taking care of "our" kids.

"In Israel, everybody belongs to everybody," says Posen. At the Mega Event, a party for all 6,000 birthright participants in Israel at the time, the crowd embraced the special-needs participants, dancing and singing Am Yisrael Chai. Krybus recalls "a lot of people came together… sharing the same experience of Israel."

"When we look at our very needy kids," says Posen, "they are achieving an incredible amount through their impact on us and our dveikus [closeness to God] and our opportunities for chesed [kindness]." Since some wouldn't remember their experiences, Posen ensured they would return with many tangible memories, souvenirs such as maps, menus and candlesticks the young people made and lit on Shabbat in Israel.

For Krybus, the memories remain vivid. Though his trip was far different from most birthright experiences, he's grateful and hopes to return soon.

"I want to go back to Israel… it's important for a lot of people to know what their history is, and to know how people in Israel feel every day."

Israel weighs Iran options

By YAAKOV KATZ, HERB KEINON AND NATHAN GUTTMAN
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — There is growing consensus within the defence establishment that the United States will not attack Iran and that Israel might be forced to act independently to stop the Islamic republic from obtaining nuclear weapons, a high-ranking official told the Jerusalem Post last week.

The administration of U.S. President George W. Bush does not have political support for launching a strike against Iran's nuclear sites, an Israeli defence source said. "America is stuck in Iraq and cannot go after Iran militarily right now."

The defence official blasted the United States for not doing enough to stop Teheran's race to the bomb. U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, he said, is leading the State Department in the direction of "appeasement."

"The only way, besides military action, to stop Iran is through tough economic sanctions," the official said. "But the only way to do that is for the U.S. to overcome Russian opposition in the [United Nations] Security Council and pass a resolution calling for sanctions against Iran."

Iran's Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei [RNS/Reuters photo]

Israel, meanwhile, was carefully watching international reaction last week when Iran failed to react positively to the incentives offered to have them discontinue uranium enrichment. Sources in Jerusalem said recently that Israel "could not abide" a nuclear Iran and might have to act to disrupt Tehran's nuclear program if the international community does not do so.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, on a visit to Nahariya, said Israel "must be prepared for every scenario." It was not clear whether the reference was to another round of fighting with Hezbollah or to some future confrontation with Iran.

There is no consensus among Israeli policymakers on whether the United States will act militarily against Tehran: some rule out the possibility, while others say Bush doesn't want to leave the world stage in 2009 with the legacy of a nuclear Iran.

Sources in Jerusalem say that among the key lessons the country needs to learn from the recent war against Hezbollah, one is how to better prepare the home front to deal with rocket attacks.

CANADA

Prayers for Israel

TORONTO — Millions of Canadians took part Aug. 20 in a national day of prayer for Israel and peace in Jerusalem. Charles McVety, president of the evangelical Canada Christian College, was one of the main organizers of the event. A full-page ad for the "Emergency Day of Prayer" ran in national newspapers, urging the public to pray and donate to the "Israel You're Not Alone" campaign.

Looted Art Returned

OTTAWA — The National Gallery of Canada has returned a Nazi-looted painting to a family in France. Le Salon de Madame Aron, by French artist Edouard Vuillard, depicts a scene in the salon of Marcelle Aron, a Parisian socialite of the early 20th century. The National Gallery purchased it from a Paris gallery in 1956. No estimate of the painting's worth is available. The gallery first tried to return the painting to the Lindon family six years ago but the family refused, saying it had never belonged to them. Extensive research uncovered proof that the Lindons did indeed once own the painting, but lost track of it during the Nazi era. The National Gallery began investigating the provenance of dozens of works in its collection in 2000 after the Canadian Museum Directors Association established guidelines governing the illegal appropriation of objects during the Nazi era. The gallery lists many paintings whose provenance is uncertain on a website, but this is the first time it has returned a looted painting to the family of a former owner.

Student Rabbi Visits

KELOWNA, B.C. — The Okanagan Jewish Community Centre hosted its new student rabbi earlier this month. Sadie Reuben, a third-year rabbinical student from the Reform movement's Hebrew Union College in Los Angeles, met Aug. 15 with 30 members of the Okanagan Jewish community to outline her background and studies, and answer questions. This is the third year of the OJCC's student rabbi program, which includes 10 visits to Kelowna, starting with the High Holy Days and ending in May or June.

WORLD

Buffalonian Honoured

BUFFALO — Budapest native Clara Ambrus-Baer was recognized as a Righteous Gentile for her family's protection of 50 Jews. Her family hid Hungarian Jews from the Nazis during the Holocaust, including the future chief rabbi of Vienna. Ambrus-Baer, 81, of Buffalo, N.Y., received the recognition from Israel's Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial, which bestows the title on those who risked their lives to save Jews from the Nazis.

Shoah Museum Opens

OSLO — The Oslo home of Norway's wartime leader, a Nazi collaborator whose name is now synonymous with traitor, has been turned into a Holocaust museum. The villa of Vidkun Quisling, who was executed in 1945 after leading a pro-Nazi puppet government, now houses the Center for Studies of the Holocaust and Religious Minorities. Opened Aug. 23 by Norway's Queen Sonja, the centre will focus on the Shoah and have displays on minorities in Africa, Armenia, Cambodia, the Balkans and Rwanda. Norway gave the villa to the Jewish community five years ago. Some 800 Jews, half Norway's prewar number, died in the Holocaust.

Grass Says He Erred

BERLIN — German writer Gunter Grass said he made a mistake in not disclosing his service in the Waffen SS until recently. In a letter to the mayor of his hometown of Gdansk, now part of Poland, Grass wrote, "It's only now, with age, that I have found a suitable way of talking about it from a wider perspective." After reading the letter, former Polish president Lech Walesa, who rose to fame in Gdansk as a union leader who defied Communist authorities, and who like Grass is a Nobel Prize winner and an honorary Gdansk citizen, said he'll drop his demand that Grass be stripped of his honorary citizenship. Grass was born in Gdansk when it was under German rule.

El Al, SWC Launch School Bag Drive

TORONTO — Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center For Holocaust Studies and EL AL Israel Airlines have launched a program to provide ready-made school bags to Israeli children displaced by Israel's recent conflict with Hezbollah.

"We are assembling newly purchased items such as a junior backpack, exercise workbook, stickers, markers/crayons, pencils/pencil case, pencil eraser, pencil sharpener, child friendly scissors, anti-bacterial handwash, hairbrush, solid body soap, small toy or stuffed animal," Friends president and CEO Avi Benlolo said last week.

"A personal letter of support and photo of a donor's family would also be really appreciated," he added.

Filled school bags can be delivered to the Friends office at 5075 Yonge St., Suite 902, Toronto, M2N 6C6. Visit www.fswc.ca, or call 416-845-9735 for details.

Is Orthodoxy becoming too religiously right-wing?

Part 2 of a series

Orthodox Jews 'grappling to find a way of negotiating their allegiance to science and also their allegiance to Torah and Torah leaders'

In this final part of our series on the move to the religious right in Toronto's Orthodox community, we hear from other centrist voices about what they see as the growing influence of haredi religious leaders and practices in the rest of the Orthodox community. Much of their concern centres on the prominence of Kollel Avreichim on Coldstream Avenue, located in the heart of the haredi community near Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue. As the leading haredi post-yeshiva educational institution in Toronto, its rulings have come to exert significant influence in the wider Orthodox community. (Rabbi Shlomo Miller, its rosh kollel and av beis din – head of the institution and its rabbinical court – declined to speak directly to The CJN, saying that the media have misquoted and misunderstood him. However, he authorized a spokesperson to speak on his behalf.)

Many people in the Orthodox community are troubled by what appears to be a refusal of non-haredi rabbis and other Orthodox leaders to speak out against the current situation. Several people interviewed for this series expressed the view that many Orthodox rabbis and leaders are afraid of being censured by Rabbi Miller and the haredi community, and these sources contend this fear is behind the silence of Orthodox leaders. It is this context – and our belief that issues that generate such vehemence should be discussed openly – that has led The CJN to investigate the situation.

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, secretary of Toronto's Vaad Harabonim and spiritual leader of Kehillat Shaarei Torah, a Modern Orthodox congregation, paints a more positive picture than some others of the move toward more stringent religious practices and views in the Orthodox community.

"I feel that, often when there are dramatic changes in policy, people look at it as being a step backward, or as the Orthodox world becoming more fundamentalist. I don't view it that way. I view it as a positive change, that the number of people who want to live a rich and full life completely consistent with what the Torah wants from us is growing."

He said he does not see the discrepancies between Modern Orthodox and haredi philosophy as a division between the two groups.

"I think there are different approaches. It's not a new issue. It's a new manifestation. Part of the reason [the issue seems more pronounced] is because of e-mail, the Internet and instantaneous communication. And to some extent it's also the ascendancy of Torah and knowledgeable Jews in the Orthodox world in general."

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks

However, he noted, there are Orthodox Jews "grappling to find a way of negotiating their allegiance to science and also their allegiance to Torah and Torah leaders."

Rabbi Tradburks was referring to the debate about British-born, Israel-based Rabbi Natan Slifkin, a haredi scholar who touched off an ongoing controversy in the Orthodox world with his views on creation and science.

Three of his books – including Mysterious Creatures and The Camel, the Hare and the Hyrax, which offer ideas about the origins of the universe that are anathema to his fellow haredim – were banned by Israeli and North American haredi

Agitation is the new normal

From the editor's desk

The sun-soaked, playful fun that tourists and Israelis were enjoying last week on the country's crowded beaches belied the tumult and turmoil sweeping across its political establishment.

Editorialists and experts were still heatedly arguing on the pages of every newspaper, as well as on radio and on television, about the conduct and the results of Israel's war with Hezbollah.

Early in the week, a group of army reservists who had served in the war encamped near the Knesset and demanded the resignations of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Defence Minister Amir Peretz and Chief of Staff Dan Halutz. As the week progressed, they were joined by other Israelis who shared their views, essentially accusing the political leaders of having deprived the military of the opportunity and the means to achieve a clear-cut victory over Hezbollah and Iran.

The political parties were seen trying to respond to the disquiet and dissatisfaction coursing through the general population. Likud decision-makers were publicly suggesting that former chief of staff Moshe Ya'alon would soon join their ranks, while the Labor Party's deep thinkers were publicly debating whether to ask current leader Amir Peretz to give his defence portfolio to former leader Ehud Barak.

More than two weeks after the ceasefire went into effect, UNIFIL forces were still not in place, nor was there any imminent prospect of their being so.

The kidnapped soldiers were still in their captivity, nor was there any imminent prospect of their release.

The sense of agitation among the people was palpable, made edgier and nastier every day by the constant cutting of the jagged edges of hostile propaganda from Israel's enemies and distorted reporting by much of the western media.

As anyone who has ever been to Israel knows, most Israelis immerse themselves every hour on the hour in the morning and afternoon, and then for hours at a time after dinner, in news and news commentary. At the end of the day, they are super-saturated in the tensions and pretensions of competing, insightful expert analyses.

Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah boasts of his great victories. His proponents do, too. But most Lebanese and other Arab leaders, despite their triumphalist interviews, know a starker truth. To truly rebuild Lebanon, they cannot return to Lebanon's status quo ante. A free hand to Hezbollah in south Lebanon gives free reign to Iran in all of Lebanon. Everyone knows it. And they also know the truth about the unbending resilience of the Israeli people and the determined fighting spirit of the Israel Defence Forces.

To watch the BBC, as I did last week until I could no longer bear to, one could form the impression that Hezbollah was the defender of the Lebanese people fighting a foe whose conquering nature was of the combined ilk of Mussolini, Franco, Hirohito and much worse.

I actually heard a BBC interviewer describe Hezbollah admiringly as "smartly" rebuilding southern Lebanon. She was interviewing Claire Spencer, a British expert on the Middle East, who referred to "Israel's hegemony" in the region and explained Iran's ascendancy in terms of the Jewish state's refusal to make peace with the Palestinians. It was all nonsensical, distorted piffle that the BBC reporter-interviewer was passing off as the truth.

Is it any wonder then that we discover that most people in Germany, France and Britain considered Israel's fight against Hezbollah to have been unjustified?

Those are the findings of a a poll conducted by TNS of more than 4,000 people on Aug. 11, one day before the acceptance of the UN ceasefire resolution, the Jerusalem Post reported last week.

"The French appeared to be most critical; 66 per cent found the Israeli military intervention unjustified," the Post said. "A clear majority of Germans came to the same conclusion; 65 per cent responded 'unjustified.' In the U.K., the balance was similar; 46 per cent believed that the action was not justified, compared to 24 per cent who held the opposite view."

On the same day that the results of the poll were released, Amnesty International called for an investigation into what it called Israel's "war crimes." In a 20-page report on the war, Amnesty accused Israel of "indiscriminant and disproportionate attacks" against Lebanese civilians. There were very few references in the document to Hezbollah's conduct in the war. Amnesty's senior director for research, Claudio Cordone, said that would be addressed in a future report.

Amnesty's "findings" and allegations were decisively rejected by Israel and severely condemned by Abe Foxman, the national director of the Anti-Defamation League. But of course, such rejections and condemnations by Israel and its supporters are dismissed and simply not heard by the European public (and others). Amnesty's pronouncements merely confirm their attitudes toward Israel and the war – that is, "unjustified."

It's with a great bitterness of heart that one observes this. Why have Europeans conferred a virtual impunity upon Hezbollah (and Hamas, Iran and Syria)? Don't they know how they operate? Worse, don't they know why they operate? Under the circumstances, feeling agitated, as most Israelis do, is quite normal.

Haifa U suffered casualties in Lebanon war

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It took three days from the start of hostilities for the first Katyusha rocket to land on Haifa, forcing many to head to underground shelters or leave the port city altogether.

From its perch atop Mount Carmel, overlooking the city harbour and the Mediterranean Sea beyond, the University of Haifa did not avoid the disruption and tragedy of war. "We were very much affected, like everyone else in the northern end of Israel," said Ada Spitzer, the U of H vice-president who is responsible for external relations and resource development.

Spitzer was in Toronto last week to attend the campaign launch for a fundraising dinner that will honour Elizabeth and Tony Comper on Nov. 19 at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel. Comper, president and CEO of the BMO Financial Group, and his wife are being honoured for their rôles in creating FAST (Fighting Anti-Semitism Together), an organization that brings together non-Jews to confront the growth of anti-Semitism. The university will be conferring Comper and his wife with an honorary doctorate at the tribute dinner in November.

Ada Spitzer

Describing the impact on the university of the recently concluded war, Spitzer said exams were postponed, classes shut down, the popular summertime ulpan (Hebrew language) classes moved to Jerusalem, and many staff sent home when the bombs came raining down. Although there were eight to 12 warning sirens each day, the university avoided direct hits. One missile landed less than half a kilometre away and another only about 200 metres away, virtually on the university's grounds.

Tragically, some of the university's students – reservists in the Israel Defence Forces – were called up and lost their lives or were wounded in the war with Hezbollah, she said. Some employees lost their children and some of the students lost their homes.

"We went to too many funerals," she said.

Spitzer, who also visited the Montreal office of Canadian Friends of Haifa University (CFHU), said FAST is the sort of initiative that fits squarely with the kind of social action advocated by the university, which is known for its promotion of pluralism and co-existence.

Funds raised at the dinner will go to support creation of the Elizabeth and Tony Comper Interdisciplinary Institute for the Study of anti-Semitism and Racism at the University of Haifa, said Peter Biro, president of CFHU. The institute is slated to open in time for the 2007 academic year

A liberal arts school with 17,000 students and 4,000 employees, the University of Haifa is the largest educational institution in northern Israel. Sixty-eight per cent of its students are women, 10 per cent hail from the former Soviet Union, and about 20 per cent are Arabs, including Muslims, Druze, Bedouin and Christians. Of that group, 64 per cent are women, including in some cases "the first women to leave their village," Spitzer said.

The U of H was the first Israeli school of higher learning to admit Ethiopian students in 1990, and today 40 per cent of Ethiopian students in Israel attend the U of H. The first two Ethiopian lawyers in Israel graduated from the school's faculty of law.

Yiddish teacher takes a stand against CUPE

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Ellie Moidel, a Yiddish class teacher, resigned from the Toronto District School Board last month to take a stand against Sid Ryan and CUPE Ontario's stance against Israel.

"I resigned from the Toronto District School Board because in order to teach for them I would have to continue being a member of CUPE," said Moidel, who taught a weekly continuing education course for the board at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

She said that when she heard in the news that CUPE Ontario had passed a resolution in late May at its convention in Ottawa that condemned Israel's security barrier and called for boycotts and divestments from Israel unless it "recognized the Palestinian right to self-determination," she was furious.

"I was incensed," Moidel said. "I was absolutely enraged. How could they take that stand?"

She said that when the news broke, she phoned her liaison, the TDSB's program officer, to tell him that although she had nothing against the school board, she could not continue to work for them if her union dues went to CUPE.

"I wrote [CUPE Ontario president] Sid Ryan a really scathing letter, I mean, I just let him have it. How dare he speak in my name?" Moidel said.

"I wrote him and said, 'You're saying you're not against Jews? Who do you think lives in Israel? Who do you think supports Israel? Who do you think wants Israel there? Of course I never got a reply, and as I understand, he never replied to anybody."

Moidel said that because she resigned from the TDSB, the Yiddish course she has been teaching at Beth Emeth on Tuesday mornings, which the TDSB sponsored until her resignation, is no longer being offered by the board.

The 10-week course was the only Judaic course offered by the TDSB.

However, Moidel will continue to teach the class, which is attended by people from ages 50 to 80, thanks to Beth Emeth, which offered to make the course part of the shul's programming. It begins Sept. 19 and requires that students read, write, and speak Yiddish

Sid Ryan

In an interview with The CJN, Ryan said he wasn't aware of Moidel's letter.

"It wasn't brought to my attention in my office. It's not unusual because during this whole period of time, there was a strong lobby by the Canadian Jewish Congress, by B'nai Brith, by the [Friends of the] Simon Weisenthal Center, who were having people send me e-mails, so it is very possible that she sent one in and it got lost in the shuffle," Ryan said.

Despite the fact that Ryan never saw Moidel's letter, he defended CUPE Ontario's anti-Israel stance and accusations that, he said, "were cleverly put out by the Israeli lobby."

Moidel and others have argued that the resolutions against Israel were passed on a Saturday, when observant Jewish CUPE members could not attend, and that the members were not properly notified.

"I mean, they took that vote in Ottawa on a Saturday when the mainstay of their people didn't even know about it," Moidel said.

Ryan said that almost 900 delegates, who represented 220,000 union members, took part in the vote and that a notice about the resolution was posted 75 days before the convention was held.

The argument that the convention was purposely held on a Saturday to deter Jewish members from attending is "complete baloney," he added.

"CUPE is a secular union. We would never be able to conduct business or organize ourselves along religious lines. We'd be saying we can't have meetings on a Sunday because the Catholics need to go to mass, we couldn't have it on a Friday because Muslims need to go to the mosques – we'd never be able to have a convention. We are a secular union and we don't bring religiòn into our proceedings," Ryan said.

"To suggest we're being anti-Semitic… that's just playing pure politics with an issue that deserves a lot more credible debate."

He added that the argument that Israel was singled out by CUPE Ontario while countries that are guilty of human rights violations were ignored was another clever argument put out by pro-Israel groups.

"[CUPE] implemented a peaceful boycott… and we use that as a tool to bring attention to the problem. The lobby went to work and tried to make it out to be that this was anti-Semitic because we were only singling out one country, but then the war happened in Lebanon and in Gaza and the world got to see for themselves just exactly what CUPE Ontario was talking about," Ryan said.

"They saw the collective punishment, the overreaction, initially, to the capture of one soldier in Gaza. The world is now condemning the actions of Israel… human rights organizations are condemning them, countries around the world are condemning them."

Moidel, who is a supporter of Israel, felt that she couldn't be a part of an organization that speaks out against Israel on her behalf.

"[Ryan] doesn't know me from a hole in the wall, but I reacted as though he personally attacked me. I took it that personally," she said.

"I'm in a bind because I don't want to chastise the Toronto District School Board, because it is really not them. The argument is not with TDSB, but with CUPE," said Moidel, who took an advanced Yiddish course at Oxford University in 1992 and taught Yiddish at the University of Toronto for seven years.

"Should Sid Ryan rescind what he has said, I would consider coming back. He owes the community an apology," she added.

Stopping Iran

These words were written before the Aug. 31 United Nations Security Council deadline for Iran to suspend all "uranium enrichment-related and reprocessing activities, including research and development," of its nuclear energy program. But the Islamic regime in Tehran has already announced it will not be moved by last month's Security Council Resolution 1696. Nor will it discontinue its uranium enrichment activities.

Iran's supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei said categorically that Iran will not suspend its uranium enrichment. "The Islamic Republic of Iran has made its own decision, and in the nuclear case, God willing, with patience and power, will continue its path," Khamenei said.

During a visit to Malaysia earlier in the month, Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad confirmed his supreme leader's edict. He said he would ignore the Aug. 31 deadline, adding ominously that countries that voted for the Security Council Resolution 1696 would "learn the hard way" about the perils of standing up to his regime. He also, once again, pronounced his perverse prescription for bringing peace to the Middle East: Israel should cease to exist.

On Aug. 19, Tehran commenced a series of military exercises in which it showcased its most modern military weaponry to an obviously interested western and Arab world. As part of those exercises, it test-fired a new submarine-to-surface missile in the Persian Gulf last Sunday. Iran is presently equipped with the Shahab-3 missile, which is capable of carrying a nuclear warhead with a range of more than 1,200 miles, within reach of Israel, American forces in the Middle East and, of course, the oil fields of Saudi Arabia and the Soviet Union. Iran also recently announced the opening of a heavy water plant and the purchase of more modern centrifuges that can speed up the pace of uranium enrichment.

The categorical refusal two weeks ago by the Iranian government to abandon uranium enrichment while offering to "seriously" negotiate the issue was nothing more than their latest ruse intended to push any deadlines and true accountability for its behaviour further away and in the process, expose and reconfirm the West's timidity.

Ahmadinejad is a clever thug who, thus far, has successfully intimidated the rest of the world into meekly acceding to his secret nuclear programs. But that intimidation should stop today. The Security Council must draw a red line in the trembling Middle East sand. Consequences should be attached to Tehran's refusal to suspend its uranium enrichment and to make its nuclear program transparent to the rest of the world. The UN must impose hard-hitting, effective sanctions against Tehran.

No one should doubt that Israel will be gravely endangered if Iran acquires nuclear weapons capability. But the peril will be no less real to the West and even to the Sunni Muslim regimes of the Persian Gulf.

Canada, which has raised its voice courageously in a forceful, principled manner concerning the dangers that terrorism poses to the free world, must also be heard on the subject of Iran's nuclear ambitions. Indeed, all the nations of the West must be heard on this subject.

No threat to the peace of the world is more ominous and more imminent.

City supports Muslim-Jewish dialogue

In the column "Trickle-down hatred" (CJN, Aug. 17), Lawrence Hart writes about vitriolic speeches at a Hamilton "peace rally" on behalf of Lebanon held "in a city, remember, where a much-touted dialogue between Jews, Arabs, and Muslims was supposed to be building bridges and promoting mutual respect."

I did not attend this rally. However, due in part to the bridges and respect the Hamilton Arab, Muslim & Jewish Dialogue Committee has developed with our local media, Hamilton's mainstream media did not provide a public forum to publicize the hatred expressed by some at the rally.

An editorial did appear in a community newspaper condemning the viciousness expressed by some of those speakers at the rally and praising the committee's efforts to improve communication between our city's Arab, Muslim and Jewish communities as a model to emulate.

While some continue to spew their anti-Israeli and anti-Semitic sentiments, the majority of Hamilton's Arab, Muslim and Jewish communities support the activities of the committee.

Vaad policy clarification

The article "Toronto's Orthodox community: Is it becoming too religiously right-wing?" (CJN, Aug. 24) suggested that our organization, Vaad Hatzdokah Toronto, had established a policy to no longer certify female applicants to go door to door to solicit assistance, and that such policy was based on halachic issues.

Vaad Hatzdokah Toronto was established in 2005 and certifies applicants who come to Toronto from abroad to collect charity for Orthodox Jewish causes. In the past year, the Vaad has certified several hundred applicants. The Vaad attempts to verify the integrity of applicants within 24 hours of the receipt of an application. Such a short deadline is called for in order that the applicants not be forced to wait an inordinate amount of time for certification upon arrival in Toronto. While the Vaad has encouraged potential applicants to apply before arriving in Toronto, many have been unaware of the Vaad's existence prior to their arrival.

The Vaad's experience has been that such a deadline has been too short to complete the investigation process for some applicants, and especially for a very large percentage of female applicants. Accordingly, the Vaad has let it be known that it discourages female applicants from requesting certification if the request is not done prior to arrival. Nevertheless, the Vaad has continued to certify female applicants who pass the Vaad's investigative process.

The Vaad is very concerned and sensitive to the plight of women in distress. We are in the process of establishing an e-mail-generated appeal process that will hopefully be able to raise significant sums of support for genuine female applicants, which will spare them the unnecessary hardship and embarrassment of having to leave their families to travel to our community and go door to door to solicit assistance. All those interested in receiving such e-mails are encouraged to advise us.

Need multiple certifying organizations

Regarding "Toronto's Orthodox community: Is it becoming too religiously right-wing?" (CJN, Aug. 24), the problem is not that the Orthodox community is increasingly styling itself after horse-and-buggy Mennonites. It is that the rest of us allow ourselves to be held hostage to their definition of acceptable Jewish practice, particularly over the matter of kashrut certification.

The solution is to have multiple certifying organizations in Toronto, each granting its own hechsher. It wouldn't hurt if people had to address the question of whether eating and celebrating with their relatives was more or less important than who checked the lettuce.

This solution would allow the broader community to get on with its business while letting the haredim's internecine arguments over who is more machmer recede to their appropriate level of insignificance.

Evangelical support not mentioned

We realize that it is impossible to mention all participating organizations in such large rallies as the recent Stand for Israel rally ( "8,000 rally for Israel in Toronto," CJN, Aug. 3). However, the strong Evangelical support you received from our embassy and from Canada Christian College should have been noted, especially as the college's president, Charles McVety, was an invited strong Christian voice to the podium.

Our organizations, along with others, were co-sponsors of this event and encouraged many from the Evangelical community to attend.

This was an oversight that hopefully will be corrected in future articles, as by omitting our presence you are overlooking some of Israel's best friends in your midst.

Recognizing evil before it's too late

By ROBERT ROZETT

The 20th century was replete with superfluous wars, so much so that today many people in the West have developed a well-intentioned and deeply ingrained knee-jerk reaction against all wars.

In the age of "post" everything, an awareness of history and a recognition of the crucial role of context in understanding our world have been largely eschewed for a fragmented and disjointed approach that leads to distortion and confusion, and has greatly impaired our ability to make meaningful comparisons. Coupled with this "post" mentality, the strong strain of indiscriminate pacifism has largely blinded people to the fact that, as much as we may wish there were none, some wars are justified. In the last century, the archetypal just war was the one fought against Nazi Germany and its partners.

The Nazis, with their hate-imbued ideology, their perpetration of colossal atrocities, their overall savagery and brutality, and their plans to take over the world and remake it in their own image, have emerged as the measure for radical evil. Before the free world recognized that such a radical evil had to be fought with no holds barred, it tried to placate the beast, rationalizing some of its demands and trying to "understand" some of its early heinous acts. At the heart of this radical evil lay an anti-Semitic and racial ideology that targeted all Jews for death. It also engendered the selective mass murder, enslavement, and rapacious plunder and exploitation of countless others.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

The enlightened world paid a large price for its slow conclusion that it must fight tooth and nail against the Nazis. When it finally united and threw in its entire weight, it faced an uphill battle. The loss of human life and possession were immense before the Allies were finally able to overcome their foe. By the time the Nazis were vanquished, the Holocaust had claimed six million Jews, millions of others had died in related direct and implicit acts of murder, and millions of soldiers and civilians had perished in the war.

Numerous media reports about the Israel recent conflict with Hezbollah that were coloured by a visceral anti-Israel bias and the United Nations resolution concerning the fighting in Lebanon unmistakably demonstrate that the nations of the world have yet to unite behind an understanding that once again there is a radical evil in the world.

Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah

It is a two-headed hydra – the Iranian regime under President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad (with Hezbollah as its unmistakable proxy) and the diverse terror groups associated with Al Qaeda under Osama bin Laden – rooted in twisted versions of Islam.

It is not by accident that the hydra, in both of its manifestations, blames Israel and the Jews for the ills of the world, and has targeted Israel for destruction. Ahmadinejad, who has been deemed by the world's more perceptive politicians as the new Hitler, has publicly and unequivocally threatened Israel on several occasions. As Hitler demonstrated 70 years ago, threats made by such leaders must be taken seriously.

The current menace is not identical to Nazism: first and foremost, it's rooted in a different set of values. But it does have similarities. Like Nazi Germany before it, the Iranian state officially sponsors anti-Semitism, although it has added the newer seasoning of Holocaust denial.

The most current expression of Iran's ardent Jew-hatred is the newly opened exhibit in Tehran of cartoons mocking the Holocaust. Since the end of World War II, other states have sponsored anti-Semitism, both officially and obliquely, but none before Iran have ever made explicit declarations about their intentions to destroy the Jews, nor has any other state invested such a great effort to gain the means to turn their threats into actions.

In addition to targeting Jews for genocide, Islamic fundamentalism stands firmly against the values held dear by the free world and, like the Nazis, the hydra evinces no normative moral considerations whatsoever.

Hezbollah's cynical use of civilian populations as human shields and its intentional targeting of civilian targets in Israel, including fellow Muslims living where it sent its deadly rocket fire, all too clearly demonstrate its total dearth of time-honoured moral concerns.

That the rest of the world has allowed Hezbollah to survive does not bode well for the future. The very fact that it still exists will strengthen its resolve and the resolve of those who stand behind it. Terrorist cells, some linked to Iran and others linked to bin Laden, will undoubtedly continue to try to carry out unmitigated acts of terror, like the plan to explode at least 10 airplanes headed from Britain to the United States. Ahmadinejad, Hezbollah's godfather, retains his unrepentant desire to attain nuclear capabilities and continues his unrelenting march toward this goal.

Alas, the world has begun its response to radical evil slowly and weakly, just as it did in the time of the Nazis. Will it eventually come around and take decisive and appropriate action, despite the unavoidable heartbreak of war, or will it do too little, too late? The key lies in recognizing and understanding the extent of the threat, and acting with courage, conviction and unswerving determination until that threat has been extinguished.

The fist of Israel

At the height of Israel's war against Hezbollah, Thomas Friedman, the distinguished New York Times columnist and author, described the weakness of Lebanon as its inability to make a fist. Its various factions could not come together to form a cohesive and effective unit. The poisoned and poisonous finger of terrorism had paralyzed Lebanon's hand and rendered its government powerless. This is the cause of the pain inflicted on Lebanon's population.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Friedman said that the same is true of the elected government in Iraq. For all its apparent good intentions, it cannot bring together the ethnic and religious groups and their warlords. The result is the seemingly insoluble political and military quagmire.

Dictators such as the leaders of the former Soviet Union and Yugoslavia could make fists out of disparate groups, but they were artificial creations that fell apart as soon as the regimes imploded. For a fist to be effective, it must be part of the arm of democracy and built on popular consensus.

That is the strength of the fist of Israel. Despite all of Israel's internal ethnic, religious and political divisions, when it really matters, its citizens know how to come together to defend the country and to support each other.

Though criticism has been voiced in Israel from the outset about the conduct of the government and its military leaders, the fist remained intact and effective because of the extraordinary maturity of the population. Even though Israel's success was nowhere nearly as spectacular as it had been in the Six Day War or at Entebbe, it did substantially weaken Hezbollah's terrorist infrastructure, despite the enemy's claim to the contrary. Israelis have shown once again that it's possible to stand up to the ferocity and cunning of terrorism in order to secure the integrity and the survival of the Jewish state.

The same unity that prevailed in Israel has also been evident in the Diaspora. Whatever internal divisions may exist among us, when it really mattered, we set them aside to stand together to help Israel make the fist. The exemplary and effective response of Canadian Jewry is a case in point.

For the fist to remain effective, however, it must also be opened as soon as circumstances permit. Criticism must not be stifled, for that would impede the health and well-being of the body that is Israel. Though total peace is still beyond our reach, even the uneasy truce must make room for scrutiny of politicians and generals alike. It's the only way to make sure that the fist will be even more effective should it be needed again.

Loyal Zionist critics, among whom I am proud to count myself, are motivated and guided by this conviction.

Do you really need that $15 binder?

August is a busy month for students. It's when, with mixed feelings, students and their financial backers go shopping for the "necessities" of school (a word banned from our household during the summer). Magazines, flyers and TV commercials advertising "back to school" sales flood our mailboxes. The weight of the average newspaper triples, as does the rate of back injuries among newspaper carriers.

I remember being excited by back-to-school shopping when I was young(er). Choosing notebooks, binders and pencils, as well as a pencil box, scissors (both items that for some mysterious reason needed replacing every year), glue sticks and coloured pencils was so much fun that it almost offset the fact the supplies were for school. How wonderful life was when all I needed to decide was what colour my pencil sharpener would be, or which superhero would adorn my backpack.

Sadly, everything has changed.

Way back when, pencils came in either yellow (regular ones) or black (mechanical ones). Now the list of different types, brands and prices makes me dizzy. There are now 50 brands of pencils to choose from, ranging from very inexpensive to ridiculously overpriced. Erasers used to be pink, and they tore the paper if you used them. Now there are white vinyl erasers, eraser pens, liquid white-out with a brush, liquid white-out with a sponge tip, white-out rollers, and white-out pens. Like cars, disposable stationery products now come in a variety of sizes and types, from economy to luxury.

Gershon Richter in Winnipeg

As well, the primary purpose of a pen is not what it once was. Today, a student must take into account not only how well a pen writes, but also how he or she looks when holding said pen and how many features it has. Is it erasable? How many colours can it write in? Does it have a comfy grip? Does it sparkle? Is it gel, ball or fountain pen? Does it check your spelling? Is the ink of non-fading archival quality? Does it taste good?

School supplies are now as much elementary school status symbols as are the cars of parents waiting in the parking lot. Parents have been suckered into buying $15 binders, $7 notebooks, and $30 calculators, all of which will be thrown out at the end of the year, if they make it that far.

Today, binders no longer hold just paper. They must also have 15 pockets that you will never use, as well as be hermetically sealed, colour-coded and made to withstand small nuclear weapons. And calculators no longer simply calculate. They need 15-line displays and five million functions that you'll never use, all packed into a piece of plastic so small that you need tweezers and a microscope to manipulate the buttons (which sounds surprisingly like my cellphone), or so large that weight training is required to handle it.

Lined paper refills are always important, because you can never have too much paper. Every year, we buy the maximum amount of paper – usually eight packages of 200 sheets each day for a week – while it's on sale. We never use it all, but it's good to have it, "just in case." I believe the paper we're using now is vintage 1996. It was a good year.

As you progress upward in your education, so do the prices of supplies. Back-to-school sales now include laptop computers that, of course, laptop computer makers have decided are a "necessity" for any student. Like pencils, they are sold with so many different options that only a trained computer engineer can tell them apart. Ranging in price, configuration, quality and weight, the most important function of these laptops will be to play computer games and to watch movies in class. This has been happening in universities for quite some time.

This year, as you make hard choices about which "necessities" to buy, make sure to think about last year's supplies and how many of them made it to this year. Think about what else you could buy if you spent $2 on a binder instead of $15 (that's roughly a week's worth of coffee, a real "necessity"). Ask yourself if you really need the most expensive pens known to man, or a calculator so complex that it comes with a 1,500-page manual. Pick simple school supplies and get them in any colour you'd like. Don't cave in to blatant consumerism.

Ooooh, look! Halloween candy!

A summer in Germany

Greetings from Halifax! As The CJN's new student columnist here, I look forward to sharing my thoughts and experiences with you over the coming months. I am entering my fourth year at the University of King's College, majoring in contemporary studies and German. When I mention this second major to people, and Jewish people in particular, awkwardness inevitably ensues: "Oh… German… that's interesting." It is interesting, and quite complicated.

Mordechai Wolfish in Halifax

I began studying German a little more than a year ago, when I was on a seemingly endless quest for a second major, a requirement at King's. A professor suggested that I take German, the language of many of the great philosophers I study. As the grandson of Holocaust survivors and someone who takes the Holocaust and its lessons very seriously, I began studying German with much trepidation – a feeling that has still not left me.

I have been continually struck by how different it is to learn a new language in university than when one is a baby. As babies, we take a beautiful journey from innocence to knowledge. Every step we take is a move forward, allowing us to understand and express more about the world. But for me, German is packed with so many negative associations that every step forward also seems like a step backward into a dark place.

I got a chance to face these feelings directly by spending part of this summer in Berlin. I was on a program with students from all over the world who had come to Berlin to learn German and experience life in the city. But I found there was a chasm between my experience and theirs. In a sense, the way they related to Berlin reminded me of the baby learning a language: it was pure intake. Each day, they discovered another great thing about Berlin, which gave them an overall picture of the city as a very fun place. For me, however, life in Berlin was anything but straightforward. For every fun place that I discovered, I found at least one trace of the horrific past: a former Nazi compound, a deportation site, a destroyed Jewish graveyard. The fun and the tragic are piled on top of each other.

I think it's fascinating how this is reflected in the memorials throughout the city. You don't need to make a special outing to visit a memorial in Berlin. They are built into the everyday fabric of the city. The main Holocaust memorial, completed just one year ago, is located on a central boulevard in Berlin, making it hard to avoid. In addition to that impressive structure, there are dozens of smaller memorials. At a number of subway stations, monuments remind passengers that the train tracks taking them to work each day were once used to deport Jews and other victims to concentration camps.

To me, the most impressive memorial project is Stumbling Stones, an ongoing project by sculptor Gunter Demnig. He places gold stones where Jewish homes once stood before the war. The stones state the person's name, date of deportation and year of death. People literally stumble over these stones, discovering individual traces of the past in places they thought were pure.

Though these memorials are everywhere, I realized that it takes some effort to notice them. I'm sure that only some people spot them on their daily commutes. The same goes for my fellow students. One day, I was talking to a friend about our previous day's activities. I visited Mitte, which was once a Jewish neighbourhood but is now one of most popular areas of Berlin's renowned nightlife. I saw a graveyard on Grosse Hamburger Street that had been completely ransacked by the Nazis. My friend informed me that he had partied all night at a great club on that very same street. A feeling of intense discomfort came over me as I wanted to tell him that he was partying on the graves of my ancestors.

I find that studying German and visiting Germany has given me an important opportunity to deal with these issues on a personal level. I am determined to keep reminding myself that learning German allows me to better understand both great philosophy and sickening Nazi propaganda. I will probably never completely give up my aversion to the language, nor do I want to. And I don't want people to stop questioning my choice of language to study.

The Kirshner File

War scuttles Olmert's 'convergence' plan

Two months ago, shortly after assuming his post as Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert visited France to promote his widely touted "convergence" plan for a unilateral Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank. After holding talks with French President Jacques Chirac, Olmert declared, "Convergence is unstoppable. It will be implemented."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

But in the wake of the recent 34-day war in Lebanon, which ended inconclusively for Israel and was hailed as a victory by Hezbollah, the future of convergence is uncertain at best. Indeed, Olmert himself questioned its relevance when he said last week that it was no longer at the top of his government's agenda and that speculation about it would be inappropriate due to the urgent tasks facing Israel after the war: the rebuilding and rehabilitation of towns and cities in the Galilee, which were damaged by almost 4,000 Hezbollah rockets; the pullout of the Israel Defence Forces from southern Lebanon as the Lebanese army and international peacekeepers fill the vacuum in the border region; and the safe return of three kidnapped soldiers separately abducted by Hezbollah and Hamas on July 12 and June 25, respectively.

Convergence is based on the assumption that Israel must unilaterally redraw its borders in the absence of a credible and trustworthy Palestinian partner. It was put to the test last summer when the Israeli army ceded the Gaza Strip and four isolated settlements in the West Bank to the Palestinian Authority.

Convergence is the polar opposite of engagement with the Palestinians. The man who popularized it, Ariel Sharon, the former prime minister, embraced the concept after finally recognizing the central argument of his opponents on the left.

Citing statistics and projections, they warned that, due to higher Arab birthrates, the number of Palestinians between the Mediterranean Sea and the Jordan River would soon surpass the number of Jews. By this criteria, Israel could not remain both a democracy and a Jewish state while ruling a large, hostile Palestinian population. Eventually, under internal and external pressures, Israel would be forced to enfranchise Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza.

Bereft of its Jewish majority, Israel would morph into a binational state dominated by Arabs, and the Zionist dream would die, undermined and destroyed by the sheer force of demography.

The way to avoid this national disaster, the proponents of convergence noted, was to separate from the Palestinians by building a security fence, ceding much of the territories and acquiescing to a two-state solution.

Sharon believed that negotiations were futile because the Palestinian leadership was simply incapable of delivering the goods: stopping terrorism and creating a situation whereby Israel and a Palestinian state could coexist in reasonable harmony. He doubted whether Yasser Arafat, the first president of the Palestinian Authority, could be trusted, and whether his well-meaning but ineffectual successor, Mahmoud Abbas, could rein in rejectionist elements hell-bent on sabotaging a putative peace agreement. With Hamas on the rise after its triumph in last January's legislative elections, convergence seemed all the more alluring.

Still, it was mercilessly skewered by Israeli critics on the left and right. Leftists said that unilateralism would undermine Palestinian moderates willing to sign a permanent status accord on the basis of the 2003 "road map" peace plan and would set back the chances of creating a stable Palestinian entity. As well, they were wary of an imposed solution, the acme of convergence.

Rightists, notably the leader of the Likud, Benjamin Netanyahu, complained that convergence gave Israel nothing in return, except the faint hope that the Palestinians would be content with a free territorial prize, and would leave Israel with no bargaining chips.

Though paying lip service to the idea that engagement was ultimately better than unilateralism, Olmert – who was elected on a platform extolling convergence – basically dismissed these arguments and held fast to convergence despite two unpalatable facts. Israel withdrew unilaterally from southern Lebanon in 2000 and from Gaza in 2005, yet was continually shelled by Hezbollah, Islamic Jihad, the Popular Resistance Committees and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade.

But neither Katyushas nor Qassams fazed Olmert, who was of the opinion that last summer's partial pullout from the West Bank should have been more extensive, and that further withdrawals from the West Bank should not be carried out in piecemeal fashion but in one broad swoop.

Nor was Olmert discouraged by surveys that suggested most Israelis opposed convergence. A poll released by Hebrew University on June 26, just a day after the soldier Gilad Shalit was kidnapped, showed that 50 per cent were against the proposal while 46 per cent supported it. Previous surveys, taken by the Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies and New Wave Research, also indicated that the majority of Israelis wanted engagement rather than unilateralism.

Olmert, who supposedly convinced Sharon to adopt convergence as an alternative to talks with the Palestinians, portrayed it as a scheme by which Israel could establish internationally recognized borders and maintain a Jewish majority for decades to come.

In fleshing out the plan, he explained that Israel would relinquish settlements beyond the separation barrier, evacuate settlers from the rest, retain only settlement blocs such as Maale Adumim, Ariel and Gush Etzion and keep an armed presence in the Jordan Valley.

After winning approval for his coalition government on May 4, Olmert said, "The borders of Israel that will be formed in the coming years will be significantly different from the territories under Israel's control today. We have to maintain a strong and stable Jewish majority in our country."

Ehud Olmert

Asserting that he would set Israel's new boundaries by 2010, Olmert nevertheless raised the possibility of talks with the Palestinian Authority, but warned, "We won't wait forever."

On a trip to London in mid-June, Olmert suggested that his envisaged pullout from the West Bank would encompass about 90 per cent of its territory.

But convergence got a fairly rough ride, even from Israel's allies.

U.S. President George W. Bush diplomatically described it as "bold", but said that his "preferred option" was "a negotiated settlement." British Prime Minister Tony Blair called instead for "a negotiated two-state solution," while Britain's foreign secretary, Margaret Beckett, said that convergence was "very much second best." In Paris, Chirac urged Israel to renew talks with the Palestinians, making no mention of convergence.

Far from embracing it, the Palestinians have denigrated convergence. Abbas has pronounced it as unacceptable and Mohammed Dahlan, a key Fatah leader, has said that it will bring Israel neither peace nor security. Hamas has condemned it as a "hostile" policy and "a declaration of war."

Rumblings about convergence have also been heard in Olmert's Kadima party. More than a week after Israeli tanks rolled into Gaza in a limited invasion in June, Meir Sheetrit, the minister of housing and construction, said starkly, "I do not believe in unilateral disengagement." Meanwhile, Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni warned that a hasty unilateral withdrawal would not be in Israel's interests.

Even as Sheetrit and Livni cast aspersions on convergence, Olmert remained adamant. "I am absolutely determined to carry out separation from the Palestinians," he said on July 11, claiming that it was an "inevitable historic process." On Aug. 2, Olmert went further, saying that the fighting in Lebanon would create a "new momentum" for a unilateral withdrawal.

But on Aug. 12, two days before the United Nations ceasefire – brokered by the United States and France – went into effect, Olmert abruptly changed his mind. Referring to Israel's unilateral pullout from Gaza, he said, "Did we win even one minute of quiet? What did it get us? A barrage of Qassam missiles fired at peaceful settlements and the kidnapping of soldiers." And in a barbed reference to Israel's unilateral withdrawal from southern Lebanon, Olmert talked of the "enormous terrorist infrastructure" Hezbollah had established in co-operation with Iran and Syria.

Interestingly, Olmert made these comments a few days before a government committee submitted a bleak report warning that Israeli cities, presumably Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, could be targeted by rockets in the event of a major Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank.

Netanyahu claims that the doctrine of convergence has proven to be "a failure," and he may be correct. But can Israel blithely continue to occupy the West Bank and still preserve its identity and integrity as a democratic and Jewish state?

It is doubtful, and therein lies Israel's dilemma.

Summer camps offered refuge from the war for northern Israeli children

UJA Federation helped thousands of kids to get away

Recently, UJA Federation's Editorial Manager Dan Horowitz visited summer camps for children from the northern Israel war zone and toured the northe This story was written on the last day of camp.

Just two days after the first katyusha rockets landed in northern Israel over six weeks ago, vulnerable Israeli youngsters were already being whisked away to safer climes in the country, many to summer camps quickly organized by The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), and supported by North American Jewish Federations including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

During my recent fact-finding trip to Israel I paid a visit to one of these havens for Israeli youth as they were packing up, readying to return to their homes the next day, and the benefits of this respite were clearly etched on the faces of these happy campers.

Situated on the Beit Yannai beach, just north of Netanya, the Haddassah Neurim Youth Village was quickly transformed into a five-week summer camp for 230 new immigrants from Ethiopia, ages 8 to 18, who had been residing in northern Israeli absorption centres.

The village, which sits atop a cliff overlooking the Mediterranean, includes dormitories, a swimming pool, a therapeutic horseback riding ranch as well as full soccer, basketball and track and field facilities.

"I love to run; it makes me feel good and not afraid," said Asmara, 15, who has been living in a Tzfat absorption centre since he and his family arrived in Israel nine months ago. "I love mathematics and English, too. With G-d's help, I plan on becoming a doctor some day. Although I miss my parents, I am so happy we ran away from the war and came here."

Asmara's surprisingly good English was a testament to the special tutors brought in by the youth village. Haddasah Neurim also brought in social workers and psychologists to help the children deal with their fears. Volunteers from Israel and abroad all lent their time and skills to make this initiative so successful.

"I'm sorry that we were given the chance to host these wonderful children under such circumstances, but I am proud to have provided a helping hand, and to find a solution for at least these evacuees," said Nachum Katz, manager of the youth village and a former Israel Defence Forces artillery colonel who has spent many years in Lebanon defending Israel. "I hope that these children return home with good memories fro their time here."

"It has been fun here, just like a big summer camp," said Yossi, 12, also from a Tzfat absorption centre. "We were all here together – all friends from the absorption centre – and that is most important. We took trips, went to the pool, and we all felt good, almost like we were at home; maybe even better because there is no beach in Tzfat."

Shula Mizrachi, a 40-year-old mother of two, and a graduate of the Hadassah Neurim Boarding School, knew exactly where to take her kids when the war broke out.

"I took my kids – parted from my husband who had to still work in the fire department on the Lebanese border, and came here," she said. "I knew they would be safe here; everybody was so nice and kind. Really, look around you; it could be heaven here if we didn't have to worry about the war."

Surprise birthday gift benefits Israeli community

A funny thing happened to Torontonian Sara Gorman following her grandson's bar mitzvah in Jerusalem earlier this month – and neither Sara, nor Israel's youngsters could be happier!

Having made the decision to go to Israel despite the war, the extended Gorman family and many of their friends traveled to the Old City for grandson Jesse Sadja's bar mitzvah which would be followed by a busy itinerary which included touring, volunteering, and visits to various UJA Federation projects in the area. A part of that itinerary included a stop at Toronto's twinned community of Kfar Gvirol, located just southwest of Rechovot.

Adopted by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto in 1983 as part of its Project Renewal initiative – Rechovot has been the beneficiary of many improvements funded by Toronto including the Menachem Begin Elementary School, an early childhood centre, a community centre, a senior citizens home, and other facilities which have transformed Kfar Gvirol into an up-and-coming middle class neighbourhood.

As the bus came to a stop adjacent to a newly planted garden, Sara, thinking she was there for a quick overview and community update, got the surprise of a lifetime. Stepping down from the bus, a banner was suddenly unveiled announcing the dedication of the new Sara Gorman Community Park – a surprise birthday gift from husband Harry, in honour of his wife's 80th year and made possible by UJA Federation.

Suddenly, the Gormans were joined by a flood of friends, town residents, and community officials including Gabi Golan, chair of the Kfar Gvirol residents committee and Shuki Forer, mayor of Rechovot, as the family members – which included three generations - placed their hands in cement; a permanent reminder of their "hands-on" philanthropy.

"This was just overwhelming; it just blew me away," said a shocked and delighted Sara, as countless neighbourhood kids flocked to enjoy the new facility. "We came for Jesse's bar mitzvah and, yet, this has turned into so much more. I hope Jesse remembers his bar mitzvah, and what a special time this was; not just for him and us, but for the beautiful youngsters who live in this area."

"To me, this is proof that miracles really do happen; because the miracle is that I was able to keep this surprise from my wife for a whole year," joked Harry. "Turning 80 is so special, and we thought there was no better way to pay Sara tribute than to have others benefit from her good fortune. Being able to sit outside and enjoy the beauty of this park and this garden is something Sara wants everybody to enjoy."

"We had thought about canceling our trip to Israel because of the war, but, thankfully, we didn't give in to the terrorism, we're so happy that we decided to do what we set out to do," said a delighted David Sadja, Jesse's dad. "I can't express just how crucial it is to everyone else that they go to Israel, support Israel, and don't be scared off. Israel needs us more than ever, and it's our responsibility to be there for them."

"To have a bar mitzvah is so special by itself, but to have it in Israel is amazing, and to have it as part of a special surprise for my bubbie is just incredible," said the bar mitzvah boy, Jesse. "My bubbie grew up poor, and she didn't have money to go shopping, or even to go to the movies when she was sad, so she would go to parks or to the beach which didn't cost her anything. She always felt that people should be able to enjoy themselves; and to enjoy the outdoors, regardless of whether or not they had money. That's why dedicating this park to her is so perfect. She'll love the fact that so many little kids – and their families - will be able to enjoy it."

Northern Israelis try to resume their lives

UJA Federation campaign focuses on recovery

Just 5 days after the ceasefire between Israel and Hezbollah, UJA Federation Editorial Manager Dan Horowitz toured northern Israel for a first hand look at the devastation caused by terrorist rockets.

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

As my driver Nir and I made the three-hour trek from Jerusalem to Kiryat Shmona and other northern Israeli towns, the effects of the month-long war were clearly evident, transforming much of this breathtaking countryside into an obvious war zone with damaged buildings, burnt out cars, and miles of once beautiful greenery reduced to black, lifeless reminders of the carnage.

Haaretz reports that more than 2,000 apartments in Kiryat Shmona were damaged with about 50 completely demolished by direct hits. Also, three kilometers of water pipes were destroyed, 45 craters have damaged roadways, and over 100 graves were blown apart. Businesses and factories were also hit, as were twelve schools, two of which won't be open in time for the upcoming school year.

Deputy mayor Sami Malul says it will take more than a year before the city can restore is infrastructure. Throughout all of Israel, Hezbollah attacks caused billions of dollars in damage.

HELPING NORTHERN ISRAEL RECOVER

To that end, the focus of UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign is now geared towards reconstruction and recovery, with funds committed to, among other initiatives, trauma care and counseling; temporary housing for the uprooted; vocational counseling for the newly unemployed; specialized assistance for new immigrants, the elderly and those with special needs; and re-equipping community facilities.

Hagit Ward

The Campaign – chaired by Ariella Rohringer and Fred Waks - has raised close to $13 million so far over and above the regular campaign total.

Through the UIA Federations Canada office in Jerusalem, UJA Federation has already sent five million dollars in campaign funds to organizations leading the emergency relief efforts in northern Israel.

UJA Federation's initial five million dollar allocation leveraged an additional ten million in relief funds from the Sacta Rashi Foundation, Great Britain's United Jewish Israel Appeal and the International Fellowship of Christians and Jews.

To date, UJA Federation has funded, among other initiatives, summer camps in central and southern Israel for northern Israeli children, week-long trips away from the war zone for northern families, caring for vulnerable immigrants, activities for children in bomb shelters, emergency programs for disabled children, emergency help for the elderly and food packages.

BUILDING FOR THE FUTURE

"We are in the process of trying to build a better future for our citizens; the war put a stop to everything. It stopped our lives," said Menachem Shavit, manager of Kibbutz Amir, part of the Regional Council of Kibbutzim of the Upper Galilee. "There was a lot of damage not only to some of our homes here, but to the agriculture of this area, and our entire infrastructure. We lost many trees and forests; we also had some of our horses and cows killed by katyushas. It's been very hard on the economy. We've lost a lot of money because the summer is our tourist time. Our members – old and young – have had a hard time psychologically because of the war."

THE PSYCHOLOGICAL IMPACT OF WAR

One of those members who is dealing with the psychological and emotional effects of the war is 12 year-old Shachar Shani. Her house was directly hit by a katuysha during the first week of the conflict, sending her father to the hospital with head injuries.

"This is terrible; we've had to spend almost all of our time in bomb shelters since the rocket hit our home," said Shani, holding a piece of the rocket in one hand, while clutching a stuffed animal with the other. "When we weren't running to the shelters we had to live like immigrants ourselves, forced to stay in other places that weren't our home. This is not a good way to live."

Shachar's neighbour at the kibbutz, Hagit Ward, along with her husband and three children, also felt first-hand the devastating impact of this war.

"My theory was always that no matter what happens, we will not let them drive us from our homes; that we will stay put no matter what," said Ward, whose house was also hit by a Katuysha, a house which, coincidentally, was also struck by a missile 40 years earlier during the Six Day War. "But, war changes things; it can change one's resolve, as it did mine. We decided to take the kids for a mini-vacation for a weekend in Tel Aviv. While I was on the beach there, I got a call on my cell phone that my house had been hit. We came back to quite a scene. There was glass everywhere; it was mixed in with my kids' toys. It took us two days to clean it up."

Another stop on my mission was the beautiful town of Metulla, located on Israel's northern border with Lebanon. Home to 2,000 residents, Metulla - which was rocked by close to 200 katyushas - is also home to The Canada Centre, built through funding from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto donors and other Jewish Federations contributors to improve the quality of life on the northern frontier.

CANADA CENTRE HELPS ISRAELI SOLDIERS

According to Metulla mayor Kobi Katz, The Canada Centre, with Israel's only Olympic skating rink, played a key role in the war.

"We had thousands of our soldiers stay in the Canada Centre overnight during the war. One night alone, we had 650 soldiers sleeping there," said Katz. "Canada Centre was one of the first public places to open its doors to our soldiers letting them shower, sleep, rest and eat in proper conditions. They also spent much time there planning their strategy for the next day."

Volunteers from Metula brought close to 200 hot, fresh meals to the soldiers every day.

"This war has been so tough on all of us in the north. It's been very hard psychologically, as well as physically for our soldiers, like my son, who was injured in Lebanon," said Katz. "We're trying to get back to a normal life, but this ceasefire is like putting a Band-Aid on the seriously wounded. In terms of agriculture and tourism and the damage to our infrastructure, we've lost tens of millions in revenue. I hope things will return to normal soon. People here are trying to get on with their lives, but northern Israel needs help; the help of her own citizens, as well as the help of others."

Stars of the North reunites friends and neighbours

Over 1,500 people from northern Israel communities gathered together in Tel-Aviv recently to take part in Stars of the North, an initiative of northern regional municipalities, made possible by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Aside from the social benefits of the program, Stars of the North also gave 100 social workers the opportunity to evaluate the mental and emotional effects of this war on children and youth who lived on the front lines of the war with Hezbollah. Throughout the day therapeutic activities took place including arts & crafts and others involving animals and music.

Israel can't be destroyed, ex-Mossad director says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel is indestructable, claims the former director of the Mossad, Israel's fabled foreign intelligence agency.

"Israel's existence is not in question," Efraim Halevy said in a talk last week at the Windsor Arms Hotel, after describing Iran's nuclear ambitions and its enmity toward Israel. "It's impossible to destroy Israel – take it from me."

"Israel is indestructable for a variety of reasons," he added. "Israel can't be eradicated. Whenever Israel has identified a threat [to its existence], Israel has been able to take care of it."

Halevy, who was in Toronto to promote his newly published memoir, Man in the Shadows (St. Martin's Press), said Israel has adopted measures to ensure its survival.

"All threats today, including Islamic radicalism, will be overcome."

Halevy, the head of the Mossad from 1998 to 2002 and its deputy director from 1990 to 1995, spoke extensively about the recent war in Lebanon between Israel and Hezbollah.

"I'm not sure either side understood what it was getting into," he said. "Both sides slipped into it by accident. It was not premeditated, and both sides made a mistake of assessment."

Israel and Hezbollah both suffered setbacks and neither achieved its objectives, he noted, saying, "Israel has reached some kind of stalemate with Hezbollah."

Yet Israel destroyed most of Hezbollah's long-range rockets and gave Hezbollah a "bloody nose."

Taking note of the fact that Hezbollah, along with Lebanon and Iran, requested a truce only four days into the war, he said, "He who asks for a cease-fire is losing something precious."

Halevy, who is currently director of the Centre for Strategic and Policy Studies at Hebrew University, suggested that the conflict was but "the first act" in a drama that may yet lead to "a second round."

He added, "The next time, we'll have to do much better, and I think we will."

In his judgment, the war would have lasted much longer had Israel demanded the prompt release of the two soldiers who were kidnapped on the first day of the conflict.

Halevy, who was Israel's ambassador to the European Union before assuming the directorship of the Mossad, claimed that Iran's influence in Lebanon has been damaged by the recent war.

Efraim Halevy

He also criticized France for apparently reneging on its promise to send thousands of peacekeeping troops to Lebanon to augment the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL).

According to Halevy, Syria, with its antiquated army, fears a war with Israel. Even if Syria fires missiles at Israel, Israeli artillery can shell Damascus at will.

Asked whether Israel should resume peace talks with Syria or engage Hamas in negotiations, Halevy replied that the Israeli government should keep all options open.

When asked how well informed Israel is about internal developments in Syria and Iran, he said, "Israeli intelligence knows much more than you can imagine and much less than it would like."

Although Iran considers Israel an enemy worthy of destruction, Israel should try to open channels of communication with Tehran, Halevy said.

"If we play it right, we can find a way to talk to Iran," he commented, pointing out that Israel has no territorial dispute with Iran.

Halevy noted that Hamas and Al Qaeda look upon each other as adversaries, despite their common Islamic radical outlook, and that rivalry should be exploited.

As he put it, "There is a potential for gain here."

Halevy, who was born in Britain and immigrated to Israel with his family in 1948 at the age of 14, remarked that Israel's public relations efforts have fallen far short of the mark.

In an implicit dig at Israel's current corps of PR people, he said, "Maybe the first thing to do is to present spokespersons who speak grammatical English."

Beit Halochem raises $50,000 for Israeli soldiers

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

To help build a new rehabilitation centre in Israel for soldiers wounded in battle, 500 people gathered at a fundraiser at the home of Saul and Toby Feldberg.

Debbie Osiel and Jonathan Kirshblum, with the help of a team of sponsors and volunteers, co-chaired the event held on Aug. 20, and managed to raise $50,000 for Beit Halochem, an Israel-based organization that aids and rehabilitates more than 50,000 disabled Israeli war veterans and victims of terror.

The event, called Courage, which was planned for people in their 20s and 30s to raise awareness for Beit Halochem among the younger generation, was held at the Feldbergs' mansion, where guests were treated to an evening of live entertainment, with DJ, percussionist, hors d'oeuvres and open bar.

"It was a very high class, but not a high-price party, only $50 a ticket," Osiel said, adding that not only did the event sell out, but there was a waiting list of about 200 people.

"It's meant to make our generation aware of the cause. It's usually our parents who support this cause, and this is a way to bring the younger generation into it."

Osiel, who is 26, said that although ticket sales accounted for about half of the total amount raised, much of the credit goes to the individual sponsors within the Jewish community. The funds, she said, will help wounded Israeli soldiers continue to benefit from the rehabilitation services Beit Halochem centres offer.

"The money goes to keeping the centres funded because the victims themselves don't necessarily have the money," she said.

Currently, Beit Halochem Canada supports four facilities. There are three Beit Halochem Rehabilitation, Sport and Recreation centres – in Tel Aviv, Haifa and Jerusalem – and a Rest and Recreation Centre for Zahal's Disabled Veterans and Families in Nahariya.

At the centres, members receive physical therapy and medical treatment, and have access to sporting equipment and cultural activities to aid them with their physical and social rehabilitation.

"I was inspired by the cause," Osiel said. "Israel is part of my soul. I had been on a birthright [israel trip] and for me to see the soldiers who are so young and to envision something, God forbid, happening to them, or to the civilians that live in Israel, it is just such a touching cause. They are like my brothers and sisters."

She said that since the party was unintentionally timed to coincide with the end of the war with Hezbollah, getting people to become involved with the cause wasn't difficult.

"It was a natural sell. People our age have a vested interest now in this. This was something they were passionate about," Osiel said.

Zohar Sharon, 54, best known as the blind Israeli golfer, is a member of Beit Halochem.

He served as a sniper in the Israel Defence Forces and reportedly lost his vision after he was sprayed in the face with a chemical substance 25 years ago.

Although he speaks only Hebrew, Sharon thanked the audience for their support through a translator.

"Let me speak to you freely. We are all Jews here. I come from Israel and you are here, but your country is just like mine. I think that everyone has to do for Israel what they can. Together, we will turn Israel into a very strong country," said Sharon, who travels with Dylan, his mixed Labrador/Golden Retriever seeing-eye dog, and Shimshon Levy, his caddy and friend.

Debbie Osiel and Jonathan Kirshblum

"In exactly two weeks, I'm going to be again in Scotland," he said, referring to the World Invitational Blind Champion Golfer tournament held in Scotland, which he won in 2003.

"I think I'll win and I will play with a kippah on my head," Sharon added.

Toby Feldberg, the president of Beit Halochem Canada, also addressed the audience to thank them for their support in Israel's time of need.

"We need your support, not only financially, but morally and spiritually. Do whatever you can for Israel," Feldberg said.

"We bring our wounded back to a 'normal' life. We support four centres. We want to build another one, as, unfortunately, the need is great. We have many more wounded soldiers who will be joining us. We are the only organization that does not solicit new members, but they come to us."

Israel truly pulled together

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

On Friday afternoons, sirens are sounded in Israel to announce the imminent arrival of Shabbat. Buses soon stop running, businesses begin to close and last-minute preparations become hurried. But over the past several weeks, no sirens have been sounded, because they were causing acute trauma among people who had taken refuge in central Israel from the missiles raining down on the north. Instead of sirens, merry folk music played on the system.

This, of course, was but a minor note in what proved to be perhaps one of the greatest social statements in the history of modern Israel.

With one million citizens displaced, and hence a large part of the population in need of accommodations, Israelis outdid themselves in playing host to them. Newspapers carried daily listings of families and individuals in need of shelter. In response, offers were immediate and overwhelming. People living in apartments that could easily fit in a typical North American family room opened their tiny spaces to refugees from the north. The refugees were total strangers: entire families, often immigrants, or the poor, widows and widowers who were living in fear and alone, with no family to turn to and speaking little or no Hebrew.

Yeshiva dormitories that were vacant for the summer quickly filled up. Kitchens, staffed by volunteers, got busy preparing and distributing thousands of meals each day. Transportation was provided at no cost to shuttle children and families to amusement parks and activities. Supermarkets and corner grocers alike offered their food at cost.

Israeli philanthropist Arkadi Gaydamak singlehandedly set up a "city of tents" in Nitzanim for 6,000 people, complete with lodging, food services, amusement in the form of musicians and performers, and teams of counsellors for the anxious. The cost to Gaydamak: about $500,000 a day.

And since the hostilities had virtually cancelled all summer weddings in the north, Jerusalemites planned a mass wedding in their city for more than 40 couples. For this event, all funding – from food to fashion, and even gifts for the newlyweds – was provided by donors. Caterers signed up to provide food, and wedding gowns, suits and every conceivable need was to be provided to the couples free of charge. But unlike a similar donor-finance mass wedding in Tel Aviv, in which some 50 couples got married on the first day of the ceasefire, the Jerusalem event was cancelled by the end of the conflict, and the couples returned to their hometowns to resume their life and plans.

One can only compare this crisis to that of Hurricane Katrina or the tsunami that hit Southeast Asia, where co-ordinated help took weeks to arrive – and, indeed, for some, it never arrived at all.

Here in Israel, during this latest crisis, one thing was eminently clear: despite everything else, the spirit of compassion, brotherhood, concern, and of giving and caring, remains. And may I add that it remains unparalleled and unmatched in the entire world.

Chevrutah learning catches on at Havergal College

By ERIN O'FARRELL AND KIMBERLEY STEPHENS
JTA

Guest Voice

TORONTO — As we prepare the course materials for the 10th-grade English classes we teach beginning every fall semester at Havergal College, a private high school for girls in Toronto, we find ourselves fixated on the Hebrew Bible and the talmudic study method known as chevrutah.

We learned the chevrutah technique, which calls for two study partners to wrestle with a passage of Torah by reading it aloud, raising questions, and offering individual interpretations of the text, at a summer institute sponsored by the Curriculum Initiative, a New York-based Jewish educational organization that serves private, non-Jewish schools.

Although our school is named in honour of Frances Ridley Havergal, a 19th-century poet and writer of Anglican hymns, we have been long committed as much to cultural diversity as to academic excellence. It should surprise no one that the Hebrew Bible is being taught as literature here.

But teaching at such an institution using a method generally found only in yeshivas and synagogue study groups is, perhaps, a bit unusual.

Our students are a notably cosmopolitan bunch and represent just about every imaginable cultural and religious background. No one is likely to mistake us for a yeshiva any time soon. Nonetheless, traditional yeshiva students would surely recognize the chevrutah techniques that we've adapted to the requirements of a preparatory school for young women.

The usual chevrutah study configuration is pairs. At Havergal, to introduce the students to this method of study, we've modified that arrangement by having the "pair" made up of the teacher as one study partner and the entire class of students as the other.

Eventually, as students become familiar with what we are doing, they are paired in twos and encouraged to study in a manner more in keeping with traditional chevrutah.

Because it engages students and teachers alike with the texts they are studying on an incredibly intimate level, and does so in a remarkably short period of time, chevrutah is an outstanding technique for teaching a wide variety of topics, not just Talmud.

By focusing on the words themselves rather than the historical background or literary theory behind them, chevrutah allows students with little or no familiarity with these texts to dig right into them and achieve a level of understanding usually found only in more advanced course work.

Consider the story of Pandora's Box. Traditionally, this cautionary tale about the dangers of ignoring taboos in order to satisfy one's curiosity is taught as an example of the values and traditions of the ancient Greeks.

While that is all well and good, it can take several sessions of valuable class time to bring students up to speed with the historical and cultural background required to understand the importance of the Greek myths, both as artifacts of an ancient religious system and as a cornerstone of our modern literary tradition. But chevrutah speeds up the process by an order of magnitude.

What normally would take months takes mere hours. Students cut right to the chase, identifying themes, concepts, and relationships that are startlingly sophisticated. Why is the story about a woman? What is the importance of assigning blame? Are humankind's worst impulses really matters of fate that are beyond our control?

Now, move on to the story of Adam and Eve and the fall from Eden. How are the stories similar? How different? Compare them both to Anita Diamant's best selling novel The Red Tent. How does her retelling of the biblical story of Dinah update the themes found in the older texts? What does the novel have to say about woman's role in determining the fate of humankind?

Chevrutah sparks the minds of our students in such a way that they can grapple with these questions like literary masters. And they love it because they feel, as one student remarked last year, "so smart."

We love it, too, because chevrutah helps them realize that they are smart. The chevrutah method gives students permission to ask questions and offer opinions that they might otherwise find difficult to express. It frees them from feeling abashed by their lack of authoritative knowledge. This is especially true when teaching the Hebrew Bible, which can be intimidating to students who have little personal experience or knowledge to draw from.

And yet they come away from their encounter with a deep respect not only for the text but the Jewish traditions that inform it. Chevrutah doesn't only make students smarter, it makes them more open to diverse ways of thinking and unfamiliar value systems, not in a passive and acquiescent way, but, rather, in a mode that is fully engaged with the world of ideas.

This, of course, is the very essence of a true liberal arts education.

A recommended reading list

1001 Books You Must Read Before You Die*, general editor Peter Boxall, Universe Publishing.

Books
Bernard Baskin

There is a story – perhaps apocryphal – about Lord Rodesdale, Nancy Mitford's father. He was supposed once to have announced, "I have only read one book in my life, and that is White Fang. It's so frightfully good I've never bothered to read another."

About this astonishing confession someone wrote, "Apparently his addiction to literature was quite limited." Certainly Lord Rodesdale would have been dismayed by a volume that recommends 1001 books to us.

It is possible to read that many books? It depends when you start. Keep in mind this basic reckoning. The average reader, when dealing with material of medium difficulty, can absorb about 300 words a minute. In 15 minutes, this comes to about 4,500 words. Fifteen minutes a day over a year gives us 1,512,000 words, the equivalent of 20 books averaging 75,000 words each. Just 15 minutes a day over a period of 50 years of sustained reading means that we can read 1,000 books in our lifetime.

I know some confirmed readers who make it an unfailing habit to read for a brief period past their regular retiring hour, no matter what the time or where they find themselves. There should be no trouble for most of us to set aside at least a half hour every day for serious reading. Such an unfailing and disciplined regimen is the only way to do it.

Once, when Benjamin Franklin was dining out in Paris, a friend posed the question: "What condition of man most deserves pity?" Each guest proposed an example. When it came Franklin's turn, he said, "A lonesome man on a rainy day who does not know how to read."

The volume under consideration is made up of brief reviews from more than 100, largely British, contributors. The entries come to about 300 words each. The book's editor writes that what these entries seek to do is neither to offer a full critique of each title, nor to give us flavour of the prose, not even simply to provide a canned plot synopsis, but to suggest why each book is compelling and why one "absolutely needs to read it."

Of course, in a list of this kind, there are always omissions and unlikely emphases. For example, Margaret Atwood has six entries, but there is no mention of Margaret Lawrence, Mordecai Richler, Robertson Davies or Alice Munro. One wonders why 11 works by J. M. Coetzee should be recommended, seven by Wyndham Lewis, 10 by Samuel Beckett and 10 by Salman Rushdie when many other fine novelists that come to mind have been passed over. There are comparatively few titles from Asian, African or Latin America writers.

What about Jewish authors? Saul Bellow and Philip Roth are well represented. But where are Aharon Applefeld, Bernard Malamud, Amos Oz, I.B. Singer and Cynthia Ozick?

One splendid feature of this bulky tome of 960 pages is pictorial. Almost every page contains a photograph of an author, often in striking colour, and there are 600 illustrations of creative book jackets, posters or well-chosen works of art. This is an admirable volume for browsing and reference – from Aesop's Fables to Zeno's Conscience, from Achebe to Zola.

There is little time to lose, get started now. Make your own choices. Love of books lasts when most other pleasures pass. Reading is to the mind what exercise is to the body. Books are not just lifeless pieces of paper, but minds alive on our library shelves.

The Jewish calendar, Part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

When's Rosh Hashanah this year?

That simple question can be answered by checking your fridge calendar. But to really understand how the dates of Jewish holidays are set and how the Jewish calendar came about is a story that stretches back thousands of years and combines faith with a profound understanding of astronomy. You can begin to unravel the mystery of the Jewish calendar thanks to the great sites on the web.

Determining Rosh Hashanah wasn't always as easy as picking up a calendar. Originally, Jews figured their calendar the month, the year and the festivals – by the testimony of witnesses who had observed the new moon. Later, astronomical calculation was instituted in connection with the calendar, but the Jews were not certain of its exactness and witnesses were still called on. For a good introduction to the evolution of the Jewish calendar, see the entry at Wikipedia. [http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Hebrew_calendar]

The date of Rosh Hashanah and all the other Jewish holidays are directly related to the date of Passover. The Torah commands us to observe Pesach in the month of Aviv. But with a strictly lunar calendar, the observance of Passover would slip a few days every solar year so that we might find ourselves eating matzah and maror in the winter, fall or anytime at all. [http://tinyurl.com/mavkj]

So to keep the seasons in line, Hillel II established in the fourth century a fixed calendar based on mathematical and astronomical calculations. Hillel's calendar, still in use, standardized the length of months and the addition of months over the course of a 19-year cycle, so that the lunar calendar realigns with the solar years. You can find a more detailed explanation at the Jewfaq website. [www.jewfaq.org/calendar.htm]

(I was fascinated to come across a website for the Karaites, the sect that follows the written Torah but rejects Jewish Oral Law and Jewish texts such as the Mishnah and the Gemarah. Karaites still adhere to the tradition of actually witnessing the appearance of the new moon over Jerusalem and now file their reports via the Internet. [http://tinyurl.com/nsr23])

If you really want to get down to the nitty-gritty of Jewish calendars with all its oddities and exceptions, then you must take a look at Remy Landau's Hebrew Calendar Science. Landau answers questions you never knew you had. For example, this site tells you how often the Jewish-calendar cycle perfectly repeats itself (no, not every 19 years but every 689,472 years.) Landau has even calculated how often the first day of Rosh Hashanah falls on a Saturday – as it does this year (28.6 per cent). Two more Rosh Hashanah facts: nowadays, the holiday cannot occur any earlier than Sept. 5 nor later than Oct. 5. [www.geocities.com/Athens/1584/].

The calculations can get quite arcane and extremely complicated. As I browsed through Irv Bromberg's massive site on the Jewish calendar, I was introduced to terms such as "mean synodic month," "Metonic cycle" and "Tekufat Adda," and quickly found myself more than a bit lost. [http://tinyurl.com/qrtkd] Then I was really put to shame when I read that Maimonides wrote that "the method of the fixed calendar is one which an average schoolchild can master in three or four days." [www.jewfaq.org/calendr2.htm]

But the Jewish calendar is far more than just calculations and computations. It governs how we act and think of ourselves as Jews. Rabbi Yitzchak Ginsburgh explains that time is so fundamental to Jewish life and that "both the written and the oral Torah open with a distinct awareness of the significance of time. The written Torah begins with the words, 'In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth'; the oral Torah begins with the words, 'From what time may one recite the evening Shema?'" [www.inner.org/times/calendar.htm]

As the weeks approach toward Rosh Hashanah, Rabbi Ginsburgh explains the sanctity of time and how we make use of it. To be a Jew means "to assess life and make decisions from a Jewish point of view, beginning with how one schedules his affairs in his personal appointment book. Then, and only then, can one know 'where' he is in life, and how he can succeed in bringing himself and his portion of the world to their proper and ultimate fulfilment."

New AHS principal returns to roots

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Kathy Friedman started her career in education as a preschool volunteer at Associated Hebrew Schools about three decades ago.

As of August 1, she is back at the school's Kamin Education Centre in Thornhill, where she is the new principal of Judaic studies/associated principal.

The mother of two adult children and grandmother of a six-month-old boy, Friedman, 53, worked as a buyer for retail clothing company Dylex before her children were born.

"I never saw myself going into education, and after I started, I could never see myself doing anything else," she said in a recent interview in her new office at AHS.

Her volunteer experience prompted her to pursue a bachelor's degree in education at the University of Toronto. She returned to Associated to teach in the preschool and Judaic studies department until 1993, and for the past 13 years was an administrator at United Synagogue Day School, first as a principal of Judaic studies and later a campus principal.

Friedman – who earned her principal's certificate from the Day School Leadership program of the William Davidson School of Education at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York – said she's "been blessed with requiring very little sleep, about three hours a night," explaining how she juggled work, studies and motherhood.

Also, she added, in the early years, it helped to have her children – who were AHS students – on site, particularly if she had to stay late.

Kathy Friedman

Now she also teaches classes for the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto Board of Jewish Education and its Midrasha L'Morim, as well as conducting teachers' workshops at conferences throughout North America.

Being back at Associated feels good, she said. Much of her focus now, in addition to a school-wide emphasis on Israel and environmental awareness, is on "making the school a community.

"I think if we don't help the kids feel they're part of the community, they get turned off – like that," she said, snapping her fingers. She believes in maintaining an open-door policy with students and teachers, and a plate of Hershey's kisses was on her desk awaiting visitors last week. "I believe in creating an environment where people want to work together."

Returning students will likely notice the poster she has placed on the school's main door. It says, "At this school, we value kids; their thoughts, their feelings, their troubles and their triumphs. And we promise to do all that we can to prepare them for their futures."

Because the school has a culturally diverse Jewish community – including students of Mexican, South African, Russian, Israeli and Indian origin – there will also be an increased focus on meeting the needs of individual students and validating different cultural practices, Friedman said.

As well, there will be outreach in the form of a moms and tots group, set to launch in September, and curriculum-related family education – an area in which Friedman has much experience, both at USDS and at supplementary schools. "We're very excited about that," she said.

And for the first time the school's 700 students, from nursery through Grade 5, will have an animal centre, complete with a bunny, turtle, fish, guinea pigs and degus (Chilean mountain squirrels). The centre will be part of the new student government's responsibility, she added.

"Children are amazing with animals, and it's a good way for them to show responsibility," said Friedman.

A native of Hungary, Friedman spent six years of her childhood in Israel before moving to Toronto, where she attended Eitz Chaim Day School and Forest Hill Collegiate before moving on to U of T to study languages and political science.

She wants Associated to be "an all-encompassing experience.

"There's more to school and to Judaism than just the pages of a book."

Bialik gets new director of education

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Shana Harris, the new director of education at Bialik Hebrew Day School, regrets that she never had the opportunity to attend Jewish day school when she as younger.

A native of Witbank, South Africa – a small town about 100 miles outside of Johannesburg – Harris, 56, received her Jewish education at a four-day-a-week Hebrew school. The town, with about 100 Jewish families, was home to a small but "very active" Jewish community.

Shana Harris

As an undergraduate student at the University of the Witwatersrand in Johannesburg, where she met peers who had a day school education, she realized what she'd missed, she said.

Harris said Jewish education is her passion. This summer, she returned to the Lookstein Centre for Jewish School Leadership at Israel's Bar Ilan University to serve as a mentor to other Jewish day school administrators as part of a year-long project.

At Bialik – where she has been an administrator for 20 years, most recently as principal of general studies, beginning in 1999 – Harris is just about settled in her new office, which was occupied by Uri Korin until his recent retirement.

In Harris' previous office next door, Benjamin Cohen, formerly of Albany, N.Y., has taken over as general studies principal.

In an interview last week, Harris said it's too early to speak about any changes she might implement at the school. "I don't believe in change just for the sake of change… I truly believe that Bialik is a good school, and my challenge is to make a good school even better."

Referring to the school's Labour Zionist philosophy, she noted how "validating" it was to run into about half a dozen former students in Israel recently and hear them credit the school for their decision to travel there.

On a personal level, she strives to balance being "open to listening" to people, with being "true to [Bialik's] philosophy and consistent in what we hold as our values."

She said she values interaction with students, including visiting their classrooms, and makes a point of being outside in the morning to greet them and their parents.

She doesn't want to interact only with students who "get into trouble or do something spectacular. All the other children are as important."

A believer in "unconditional respect," Harris deals with disciplinary issues by "talking very calmly and quietly to [students], because I want to model that for them. You want to de-escalate [any] anger. Sometimes… there's a lot of anger and frustration [on the child's part]."

Harris began her career as a Latin and English teacher in South Africa in 1971, and became a vice-principal 10 years later.

In 1986, during a stint at the South African Board of Jewish Education, where she served as co-ordinator of general studies, she took the late Rabbi Irwin Witty – then executive director of Toronto's Board of Jewish Education, who was in Johannesburg on a fundraising mission – on a tour of the board's King David schools.

At the time, Harris and her husband had already decided to emigrate with their two young sons. Toronto was appealing because of its Jewish community, although – apart from a cousin – Harris had no close personal connections here.

"Sometimes things are bashert [meant to be]," she said. Rabbi Witty took her resume and passed it on to Bialik. Three months later, the school contacted her, and within a few months, Toronto was her family's new home.

New Canadian friends helped the family acculturate and understand the linguistic differences, she said. When one of her sons required a Duotang for school, she recalls, she had no idea what to look for.

Going back to school herself also familiarized her with Canadian culture. Pursuing a master's degree in educational administration at the University of Toronto's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) was "a wonderful experience" that helped her learn more about Canadian education. She completed the degree in 1992, and received her principal's certification at OISE two years later.

Elite Academy offers free high school in Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A recent newspaper ad changed the course of Orit Giterman's high school career.

The ad about Elite Academy, a free high school program in Israel, "just caught my eye," says the 15-year-old, who has never been to the country.

The program, for students entering Grade 10, is run under the auspices of the Jewish Agency for Israel's department of immigration and absorption and Israel's Ministry of Education.

It offers three years of study, free airfare, full tuition (including room and board), medical insurance, telephone expenses and pocket money.

Potential students – four are leaving this year from Toronto and one from Winnipeg – must undergo an interview and pass a written exam. They study at local schools, boarding schools or kibbutz regional schools, and choose between state or state religious education.

Orit, who spent Grade 9 at Westmount Collegiate Institute in Thornhill, says her parents Sophie and Joe, who are Israeli – her grandmother is Rachel Halawani of Rachel's Cafe at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre – were reluctant at first about her decision, but they "saw I really wanted to go. Now, they're happy but unhappy that I'm going."

Having just returned from a summer at Canadian Young Judaea's Camp Kinneret in Quebec, Orit says Israel's recent conflict with Hezbollah in Lebanon did not cause her to change her mind.

Orit Giterman

"If the school [northwest of Tel Aviv] thought there was a problem, they would have postponed [our trip]. Everything is going ahead as planned, though. They put safety first. I am a little nervous, but I know they'll look after us.

"I speak Hebrew and I have lots of family in Israel, so I know I'll be fine."

Although Orit says she's taking "one year at a time," Dina Gidron, outgoing regional director of the Jewish Agency's Israel Aliyah Centre, says the majority of Elite students – it started out as a program for youth from the former Soviet Union and South America – stay for the full three years of the program, and 95 per cent go on to university.

"It's a good school academically, and there is a full schedule, but these kids are used to working hard. That's why they have been chosen."

The process begins in the aliyah office, says Gidron, "where I meet the student and both parents. I knew right away Orit would be a good candidate, and her parents supported her decision. That is very important."

She stresses that the program is not for youth at risk or for those seeking to escape a harsh family life.

"It gives students an opportunity to become connected to Israel," Gidron says.

"[When they arrive,] they are beginning a process of 'aliyah in stages.' There is no commitment for them to make aliyah, but they have the choice of staying in Israel when they graduate. That is why our office is involved."

3 grain salad always better the second time around

The following recipe was inadvertently cut off in the Aug. 24 edition of The CJN:

3 GRAIN VEGETABLE BARLEY SALAD WITH CILANTRO CREAM DRESSING

1 cup long-grain brown rice
⅓ cup pearl barley
¼ cup wild rice
2½ cups vegetable stock or water
1 tbsp. virgin olive oil
2 small yellow zucchini – diced
2 small green zucchini – diced
2 peeled seeded cucumbers -- diced
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice

CILANTRO CREAM DRESSING

⅓ cup tahini (sesame-seed paste)
¼ cup water
3 tbsp. chopped cilantro leaves
1 small seeded serrano chili – chopped
1/2 tablespoon light sesame oil
salt and cayenne pepper – to taste

Combine rice, barley and wild rice in a saucepan; rinse under running water and strain until water runs clear. Drain well and then return the barley and rice to the pan. Cover them with the stock, add the oil and let sit for 10 minutes. Bring the liquid to a boil, cover and reduce heat to low. Cook until liquid has been absorbed, about 30 minutes. Remove from heat and let stand 10 minutes. Fluff the mixture with a fork and cool to room temperature. Meanwhile, blanch the zucchini in boiling water 1 to 2 minutes. Transfer to strainer, rinse under cold water and drain. Add the zucchini, cucumber and lemon juice to the grains; toss to mix. Just before serving, add Cilantro Cream to the salad and gently toss to mix. Makes 8 servings.

Note: May be prepared a day ahead, covered and refrigerated.

CILANTRO CREAM: Combine the tahini, water, cilantro, serrano and oil in a blender or food processor; process until creamy. Add as directed.

Famed Jewish genealogist coming to Toronto

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

A generation after his best-selling book From Generation to Generation was first published, legendary American writer and genealogist Arthur Kurzweil is coming to Toronto to give a lecture on "Jewish Genealogy As A Spiritual Pilgrimage: Why and How to Trace Your Jewish Family Tree."

Kurzweil, whose talk is scheduled for Sept. 17 at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, is considered a pioneer of the modern Jewish genealogy movement, having written one of two early books on the subject. The first edition of From Generation to Generation appeared in 1980 and has since gone into several printings. Sales of about 60,000 copies have given it the status of a towering best-seller in the world of Jewish publishing.

Arthur Kurzweil

"It's a source of great satisfaction and pride to me that I was involved at the beginning in helping to get this thing [the Jewish genealogy movement] started," he said in a telephone interview from New Jersey.

He called the Internet "the major tool for Jewish genealogy" and recalled that it didn't exist when he started doing family tree research in the 1970s, and that most Jewish research facilities back then weren't geared for family-tree researchers.

A former director of the New York-based research institute YIVO "used to shake his finger at me and say, 'You're the one causing all the trouble,'" Kurzweil recalled. "I was publicizing YIVO as a source of information and they weren't ready for the army of genealogists that would come to use their collections. They were prepared to help professional historians and graduate students in Jewish history, but not amateur Jewish family historians who didn't know what questions to ask, what collections were available, or how to use them."

For Kurzweil, genealogy led him to greater knowledge of his ancestors, and then to a desire for greater knowledge of his Jewish faith. A central theme of his upcoming talk is that doing genealogical research can lead to a greater spiritual connection.

"There's an immigrant historian – [Marcus Hansen] – who is famous for saying, 'What the children of immigrants want to forget, the grandchildren of immigrants want to remember,'" he said. "The grandchildren of Jewish immigrants to North America are part of that phenomenon. When our grandparents and great-grandparents came to this country, they were by and large cut off from their Jewish lives and their Jewish past. Their assimilation was rapid and quite effective, but it left their grandchildren and great-grandchildren disconnected from a spiritual heritage that sustained us and nourished us for centuries."

A former senior editor at Jason Aronson, a now-defunct publishing house that brought hundreds of Jewish titles into print, Kurzweil is presently publisher of a spiritually themed magazine called Parabola. For the last 25 years, he has also served as an occasional chauffeur for Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz whenever the esteemed Israel-based talmudist comes to New York. Kurzweil's book, On the Road with Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz, was due to be published this month by Jossey-Bass. (Another manuscript, Kabbalah for Dummies, is due out this fall in the popular "dummies" series.)

A frequent lecturer, Kurzweil has been infatuated with magic tricks "since Grade 3" and performs a 90-minute one-man show titled Searching for God in A Magic Shop.

"I had a realization about magic tricks and Judaism, and I can say it succinctly. The reason magicians are able to fool the audience is that the audience doesn't see everything. If the audience saw everything, they'd understand what was going on. The same notion exists in Jewish theology. The reason that people are often confused about life is that we don't see everything.

"There's an expression from the Talmud, 'Gam zu le-tovah' – 'this too is for the good.' It's a euphemism that everything is for the best. We have to cultivate that attitude even though it often doesn't seem that way when you turn on the news. We're supposed to try to change and improve the world, but ultimately, the theology that our sages taught is that God knows what He's doing and the reason we don't understand is that we don't see everything. Each of us is just a speck in a vast universe."

Kurzweil is scheduled to speak at the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation's Sisterhood Hall, on Sunday, Sept. 17, at 2 p.m. The lecture is hosted by the Jewish Genealogical Society of Toronto, and admission is free for members and $5 for non-members. Seating is limited.

The ideal is 'the golden middle path'

rabbis in early 2005. Especially troubling to them are Rabbi Slifkin's assertions in The Science of Torah that the world was created not in six days, but over millions of years.

The young rabbi's profile remained relatively low in Toronto until his visit to the city this past winter to speak at an event sponsored by Torah in Motion, a Modern Orthodox educational organization that hosts lectures and programs.

Yossi Adler

At that time, Rabbi Shlomo Miller of Kollel Avreichim issued "a letter of admonishment" stating that Rabbi Slifkin's opinions on the six days of creation were "definitely heretical," even "boorish."

A book ban, such as the one imposed on Rabbi Slifkin, is "not something I would do, but I understand the rationale as to why that's being done, even if I don't agree with it," said Rabbi Tradburks, whose synagogue also hosted Rabbi Slifkin as a speaker when he was in Toronto.

* * *

Jonathan Ostroff, a computer science professor at York University who was authorized by Rabbi Miller to speak on his behalf, said that Rabbi Miller had no connection with the original ban on Rabbi Slifkin's books and that he only issued his own condemnation of his work after he was asked for his opinion on the subject by members of his own community. The letter was intended only for his followers, and not for the general community, Ostroff said.

He also told The CJN that Rabbi Miller distinguishes between "operational science" and "origin science." Operational science, which Rabbi Miller accepts, examines how things work in the universe, while origin science looks at what caused things to begin.

Ostroff stressed that there is a difference between disagreeing with someone, and hating or looking down on them. "We object to his views, not to him as a person," Ostroff said. In fact, he said, when Rabbi Slifkin came to Toronto to speak at the Torah in Motion event, he was invited to speak to Rabbi Miller and Ostroff, but was "unresponsive."

"We would still be willing to talk to him anytime," Ostroff said.

He added that, for a time, he was involved in dialogue with Rabbi Slifkin, both via the Internet and other means. "I wanted to continue the dialogue, but he cut it off. I don't believe he wants to discuss substantive issues."

When contacted by The CJN, Rabbi Slifkin said he had been advised by two Canadian rabbis against meeting with Rabbi Miller, because the rabbis felt the purpose of the meeting would be to try to change his views and not to have an open discussion of the issues.

Rabbi Slifkin added that he stopped his online communication with Ostroff "when the pressures of the ban began." He said that at that time, his posts on an online discussion group were being passed on "to non-participants in order to stir up opposition to me. I have absolutely no idea what Dr. Ostroff means when he says that I don't want to discuss substantive issues. I have done nothing else for the last few years!"

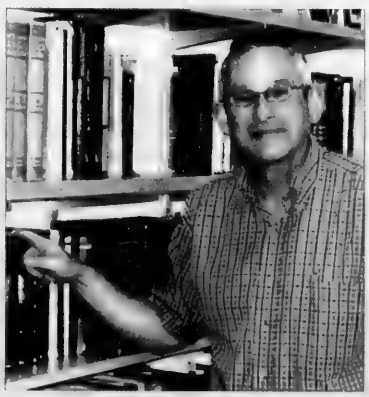
* * *

What makes the Slifkin affair unique, according to Yossi Adler, a Toronto lawyer who wrote about the controversy in a CJN column in January, is that in similar past cases, other people have retracted the material that was deemed offensive, "and everything [was] fine and dandy."

Not only did Rabbi Slifkin not retract his assertions, Adler said, but rabbis who condemned his work went beyond banning his books to condemn him personally.

"It's censorship," said Adler, who fears that if someone like Rabbi Slifkin, who is part of the haredi community, can be singled out, then everyone is "potentially a target."

To a lesser extent, Adler was singled out for his CJN column by some Orthodox Jews who criticized him for airing the issue in public. "They don't understand that this is a significant issue that merits discussion and analysis," he said, adding that the response he received to his column was overwhelmingly – perhaps 95 per cent – positive.



Martin Lockshin

The naysayers are "creating an environment where debate is non-existent or only discussed behind closed doors, and that's regrettable," said Adler.

He also noted that some haredi Jews feel he and others are "right-wing bashing" out of enjoyment, an accusation he denies. "We came from that world. We feel an affinity to that world, and we care about its direction."

The bans are increasing in number and seriousness, says Adler, who was raised in the "yeshiva world" but has moved toward what he terms "centrist" Orthodoxy. "I prefer the more centrist [community]," he said. "They're less likely to build walls and to exclude what modernity has to offer. They're more interested in secular education, and more Zionistic.

"As each group has become more confident, they feel they can live independently. I feel a significant disrespect [on the part of the haredi community toward] non-Orthodox and less Orthodox Jews."

A lot of the haredi "suspicion" toward the outside world stems from a perceived breakdown of morality, as exemplified by societal changes that include same-sex marriage and sexual promiscuity, Adler explained.

"They will exclude media from their households. A lot of stuff in the media today is very trashy. At the same time, I think they're throwing out the baby with the bathwater.

"It was probably like that before," he admitted, "but not to the same extent, and they weren't as bold in the way they impose certain rules in the community."

Rabbi Miller "has a brilliant mind and is well versed in the sources," said Adler. "No one's willing to stand up and say that [what he is saying] is not acceptable, or that this is a stringency going beyond what the community requires."

Adler said that, as a result, "there are people who have considered walking away from Orthodoxy."

* * *

Not all rabbis were as forthcoming as Rabbi Tradburks when asked to be interviewed for this article. One said he didn't even want to be quoted as saying that he declined to comment.

When asked repeatedly about the issue of possible repercussions for people who might challenge the growing influence of haredi religious leaders and practices, Ostroff's only comments had to do with the reaction that Rabbi Miller has received for publicly expressing his own views.

"He has had repercussions for defending Torah Judaism. Should not a Torah teacher stand up for Torah? That's what he did. Should he allow people to wallow in ignorance?"

Ostroff added that Rabbi Miller expected that he would face consequences for speaking out, just as anybody who comments publicly on any issue would. "But you have to protect your children, and you have to protect the truth of Torah."

* * *

Martin Lockshin, a York University professor who is an ordained Orthodox rabbi, remains sanguine about the current environment in the Orthodox world.

The former director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies says he still feels at home in most places in the Orthodox community and is heartened by the presence of Modern Orthodox institutions in the city, citing the examples of Netivot HaTorah Day School, and Bnei Akiva's Ulpanat Orot and Or Chaim high schools.

"I see something like Torah In Motion, which tries to do intellectual types of things, as a positive force in the city," he said.

"I know there are people I see as kindred spirits who I can talk to, who unabashedly call themselves Modern Orthodox."

Rabbi Immanuel Schochet

However, he noted, "it may be a well-placed concern that congregational rabbis find themselves in the difficult position – the modern centrist liberal kinds – worried about losing their bona fides because of a possible attack from the ultra-Orthodox."

At his own synagogue, Congregation Bnai Torah, which has a more right-wing philosophy than his own, the rabbi "has been very tolerant of me," Lockshin said.

* * *

Rabbi Immanuel Schochet, a retired philosophy professor at Humber College and a leader of the Lubavitch movement in Toronto, said the Jewish community has been inundated with dissent and anger, as well as stringencies that go beyond halachah in an attempt to protect tradition.

"We live in a society where under the guise of political correctness, all systems are go. Moral boundaries which were observed by everyone are being trampled," he said by way of explanation. In today's "permissive, licentious society," observant Jews try to take precautions, he added.

Like immunizations, "we may inject kids with poisons to protect them" – in other words, expose them to the non-Jewish world so that they are equipped to deal with it. Or, he added, observant Jews may try to defend tradition by creating more closed enclaves and putting up behavioural fences such as not allowing television or Internet in the home, in an effort to circle the wagons around the community's children. "It's not foolproof, but it's an attempt to protect kids and the young from being corrupted."

The ideal, he said, is "the golden middle path," though he admits this path is hard to find.

Rabbi Schochet added that there is "great hostility" within the Orthodox community, which he said comes from divisions that are more about ego than personal ideology.

Body of Toronto man found on Lake Nipissing

By SHIRA SCHWARTZ
Special to The CJN

NORTH BAY, Ont. — Scores of volunteers assisted Ontario Provincial Police last week in an intensive search for two Toronto-area Jewish men who went missing on Lake Nipissing.

Richmond Hill, Ont., resident Heine Mondrowitz, 56, and his son-in-law Eli Horowitz, 30, of Toronto, had been vacationing with their families at a lodge on the south shore of the lake when they rented a 19-foot boat to go fishing and swimming on Aug. 21 at about 3:30 p.m., police said.

Their empty boat drifted ashore in nearby North Bay later that afternoon, but the men failed to return.

Last weekend, Mondrowitz's body was found on the shore of Lonely Island on Lake Nippising.

The discovery came after the OPP conducted searches of islands and along the shoreline, as well as underwater and from the air using helicopters. As The CJN went to press, the body of Eli Horowitz had not yet been found. However, he is presumed drowned.

"At this point, it's going to be a body recovery," OPP Sgt. Joe Striba in North Bay told the Toronto Star. "We've exhausted our land search and air search for a rescue."

More than 30 people had volunteered to help police, and three civilian helicopters took part in the search. Many more volunteers came to the North Bay area to help in the search.

Police were asking lakeside residents and boaters along the south shore of Lake Nipissing to report anything unusual.

A busload of high school and university students affiliated with the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) arrived last Wednesday to help, but because there weren't enough OPP officers to accompany them, they couldn't join the search.

NCSY students help comfort the families

Instead, the youths spent their time praying, reciting psalms and comforting the distressed Horowitz and Mondrowitz families and their friends, who were also among the volunteers who could not be used for the official search parties.

"Doctors and surgeons have the opportunity to save a life almost every day," Rabbi Binyamin Pinkus, assistant regional director of NCSY Canada, told the NCSYers.

"It isn't often that we get the chance to do such an incredible mitzvah. Even if we aren't part of the search, we are making a contribution just by being here… coming all this way, even if just to say Tehillim [Psalms] and to show that we care."

Rabbi Pinkus stayed overnight with some of the students to help with the search the following morning.

'You condemn the act, not the person doing it'

There is a fight over "my gedolim [rabbinic sages] vs. your gedolim – my way or the highway," he said, adding that this is not what the pursuit of Torah means. "You have to realize that you aren't God's policeman."

There is nothing wrong with having a difference of opinion, so long as the discussion is kept to the issue and avoids the personal, he said. You condemn the act or action, not the person doing it, he added.

For instance, different schools serve different parts of the Orthodox world, but they should still be conscious of the bonds between them. "I may not send my children to schools whose views I disagree with. But show hostility to them? No."

Rabbi Schochet said he disagrees with the approach of those who banned Rabbi Slifkin's book.

"The answer is not to ban a book – that just gives publicity, and popularizes it, the opposite of what is intended. The answer is to discuss, and to question, to say why you think he is wrong."

You don't argue with a Jewish heretic, said Rabbi Schochet, speaking hypothetically, and "banning went out with the dodo." The rabbis who banned Rabbi Slifkin's books have "moved beyond what society needs. They shot themselves in the foot."

"Not that I necessarily disagree with their views, just their methods."

As to whether the Orthodox community will ever be united in the future, Rabbi Schochet said he "won't place any bets on it. But then, that's one good reason to hope for the coming of Moshiach."

Winnipeg's top givers raise $2 million for Israel

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Israel's recent conflict with Hezbollah in Lebanon has spurred an outpouring of support for Israel in Winnipeg's Jewish community that hasn't been seen here since the Six Day War.

Not only have there been two well-attended rallies – the most recent reportedly attracting about 1,200 people – but the community has raised close to $2 million for Israeli reconstruction.

Winnipeg Combined Jewish Appeal executive director Elaine Goldstine said that members of the community contributed $142,000 to the Crisis Fund immediately after the rally in early August. Another $1.4 million was raised at a kick-off evening for 60 top CJA donors that was held Aug. 16 at the home of Joe and Gina Guertin, co-hosted by Gina's parents, Arnold and Myra Frieman.

"It was like an old-time fundraising evening," said Moe Levy, executive director of the Asper Foundation, which pledged $1 million to the Israel Crisis Fund.

"We were the largest donor," he added, "but there were also substantial contributions from many others. Israel is going to need a lot of money to rebuild after what the country has just been through."

Those attending the event were given a report on recent developments by retired Israel Defence Forces colonel Kobi Marom, who was a commander with the Hermon Brigade in South Lebanon before his retirement from the army in 2000.

Although this year's Winnipeg CJA campaign goal had been set at $5 million before the conflict, Goldstine noted that the management team – consisting of her husband, Ian Goldstine (a past president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg), as well as Tova Vickar and Hope Morry, the co-chairs of CJA's Women's Division campaign – has not set a goal for the Israel Crisis Fund, which is being run in addition to the regular campaign.

"We don't want to put limits on the Crisis Fund campaign," Goldstine said. "We will raise as much as we can. Israel's reconstruction costs are in the billions of dollars."

She said that Super Sunday – the start of the CJA's big community-wide fundraising push – will be held this year on Sept. 14.

The campaign kick-off is scheduled for Thursday, Sept. 7, at a downtown Winnipeg nightclub, where campaign workers, volunteers and supporters will be treated to an evening of theatre and music arranged by former Winnipeg Jewish Theatre artistic director Kayla Maister.

שישאר בינינו

גידי קורן וחברים

אחרי שוק הקרבות

"עכשיו אנחנו בתוך הסערה. מלחמת לבנון השניה נראית לעיתים כמו חדרה על העבר, אבל לאמיתו של דבר היא הבהק של העתיד. על גבולנו הצפוני הוקמה קובה אידיאנית" (ארי שביט)

"רבין היה פותר את הבעייה בשחרור אלף מבוקשים, אבל אנחנו הרי חכמים מרבין. לכן רצחנו אותו" (עוז זך)

"כשנדע כי שמונה חיילים נהרגו בקרבות בבינת גביל, וסכרתי את פי בכף ידי, שאלתי את עצמי למה לא הגבתי כך כשנהרגו שמונה אזרחים במפרץ חיפה..... משהו לא בסדר פה, משהו הפוך ולא נורמאלי" ( מירה קדר)

בחצר אחורית של הבית של יואל,
נפלה קטיושה,
נפלה,
נתקעה באדמה הטובה ולא התפוצצה.
באו מומחים,
באו מהנדסים,
באו חבלנים,
ניסו, ניסו, ניסו
ולא הצליחו לחלץ אותה.
כשסיפרתי על כך למירי, חברה,
היא אמרה:
יופי עכשיו באביב
יצמח להם עץ קטיושות.
או אנחנו מצפים לאביב:
שילבלבו אגס וגם תפוח,
קטיושה כבר יש לנו.

מת יחיה

Root causes, real and imagined

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The problems facing Israel under the tenuous UN-brokered ceasefire with Lebanon were explored by Lysiane Gagnon in "A lose-lose situation for Israel" (Globe and Mail, Aug. 21).

Gagnon writes: "On Israel's northern frontier, durable peace can occur only if Hezbollah is disarmed."

However, "Hezbollah chief Hassan Nasrallah made it clear that his militia has no intention of surrendering its arms. And Lebanon [sic] President Emile Lahoud bluntly said that his government intends to contravene the UN Security Council resolution upon which the ceasefire was based: 'It is disgraceful to demand the disarmament of the national resistance while the blood of martyrs is still warm. How can they ask us to disarm the only force in the Arab world who stood up to Israel?' he said last week."

The upshot, Gagnon notes, is that "[n]o country, not even those who vaguely volunteered for Lebanon, is willing to tackle Hezbollah." Thus, "[t]here is not the slightest guarantee that Hezbollah, whose stated aim is the destruction of Israel and which is under the patronage of Iran (whose president also wants Israel to be wiped off the map), will not resume its attacks on Israel."

Meanwhile, Gagnon said, the fact that Israel did not score a decisive victory against Hezbollah "is a tragedy, not just for Israel, but also for the world, since one of the terrible lessons of this war is that it is nearly impossible for the regular army of a liberal democracy to combat a hardened and media-savvy guerrilla force that hides amid civilian populations."

She concludes: "Israel lost the public-relations war and the moral high ground with air strikes that killed many Lebanese civilians. However, if it had focused on ground attacks, it would have sent many of its young conscripts to slaughter while also killing civilians. It was a lose-lose situation."

Gagnon's realistic view of the current situation is a refreshing change from the usual blame-Israel analysis that is repeated ad nauseam by some liberal and Arab pundits alike.

For example, in "Hijacking the minds of young men" (Globe and Mail, Aug. 14), Beirut Daily Star editor-at-large Rami Khouri writes that "Israeli atrocities in Lebanon" and "Israel's American-supported assault on the Palestinians" are largely responsible for the "spike in terrorism," including "homegrown" terrorists, such as the recent case of "24 men in Britain who allegedly planned to blow up numerous planes over the Atlantic Ocean."

Similarly, in "Talk is mightier than the tank" (Globe and Mail, Aug. 18) Paul Heinbecker, a former Canadian ambassador to the United Nations, argues that "[p]eace will come from removing the root cause of the conflict… That will mean resolving the issues that have bedevilled diplomacy for decades – the West Bank settlements, the status of east Jerusalem and the rights of the refugees."

Both Khouri and Heinbecker adroitly ignore decades of regional hostility, including the invective in the government-controlled media and school systems, toward the very idea of a Jewish state. There is no acknowledgment that Islamic extremist organizations such as Hezbollah, Hamas and Islamic Jihad and countries such as Iran are not interested in a two-state solution to the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. Rather, their goal is to eliminate Israel and establish an Islamic state in its stead – before going on to conquer the rest of the modern world.

Even the Economist, not known for its sympathy toward Israel, acknowledges that Israel is not an impediment to peace. As its lead editorial ("Nasrallah wins the war" Aug. 19) observes: "Since the 1980s, at least two [Israeli] prime ministers, Yitzhak Rabin and Ehud Barak gave their all in the search for peace… Even the hawkish Ariel Sharon budged. He pulled Israel out of Gaza and knocked the legs from under Israel's settlement movement. The trouble for Israel… today, as in the 1940s, [is that] Israel still has some neighbours who continue to deny its very right to exist as a Jewish state.

"This is not to say that Israel is blameless. It has made mistakes aplenty down the years… But peace does not depend only on Israel." Indeed not.

MP resigns post over Hezbollah remarks

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The dismissal of Borys Wrzesnewskyj as Liberal associate foreign affairs critic over comments about Hezbollah points to serious disarray in the Liberal Party, said Canadian Jewish Congress president Ed Morgan.

"I think the Liberals appear at the moment to be rudderless when it comes to the issues that are important to the Jewish community," he said.

Morgan welcomed Wrzesnewskyj's dismissal as did Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee. "Caucus has reaffirmed its position about Hezbollah and characterized it as a terrorist organization that couldn't be split into a political and military wing," Fogel said.

Wrzesnewskyj landed in hot water during a recent visit to south Lebanon when he called Israel a terrorist state and suggested Hezbollah be removed as a banned terrorist organization. He later denied calling for the de-listing of Hezbollah, saying he had merely suggested Canada re-evaluate its anti-terrorism legislation to permit it to negotiate with listed groups.

Wrzesnewskyj toured Lebanon along with New Democrat MP Peggy Nash and Bloc Québécois MP Maria Moureni on a fact-finding mission organized by the National Council on Canada-Arab Relations.

Nash told the Globe and Mail the visiting MPs "spoke to leaders of [Lebanon's] opposition parties who said they felt it was important that Hezbollah be drawn into the democratic process and they supported continuing that process. I think that's important. I'm not here to say whether Hezbollah should or shouldn't be a terrorist organization. Our government has made that decision. It's not the point of the mission."

The Liberals moved quickly to distance themselves from Wrzesnewskyj's comments. Interim Liberal leader Bill Graham said, "Hezbollah is a terrorist organization and should be treated as such under all applicable Canadian laws."

The Liberal Party continues to support keeping Hezbollah on the list of terrorist entities. "Any suggestion to the contrary does not reflect the official position of the party," he said.

The controversy over Wrzesnewskyj's remarks drew further attention to the party's apparent lack of a coherent position on the Middle East and Hezbollah.

Quebec MP Denis Coderre, a former cabinet minister, marched recently (along with Bloc Québécois leader Gilles Duceppe) in a rally in Montreal that included Hezbollah supporters carrying the Hezbollah flag. Coderre later distanced himself from the Hezbollah supporters.

And Thomas Hubert, the party's youth leader in British Columbia, recently wrote on an Internet blog that "one man's terrorist is another man's freedom fighter. History will remember Hezbollah as an organization that stood up to the most vile nation in human history."

Gerard Kennedy, the Liberal leadership candidate Hubert and Wrzesnewskyj support, responded to the blog statements, saying, "You can't sanction violence. We have to operate according to principles, and one of the principles is not to acknowledge bodies that will not abide by basic human rights and international law."

Liberal Wrzesnewskyj calls Israel a terrorist state

Hezbollah was added to the roster of banned terrorist organizations in 2002 by the Liberal government of the time, but only after much prodding by opposition MPs and the Jewish community. At the time, Graham, who was then foreign affairs minister, resisted its inclusion on the list, saying Hezbollah had a political wing that participated in Lebanese elections and provided valuable social assistance to the Lebanese people.

Conservative MP Jason Kenney, parliamentary secretary to Prime Minister Stephen Harper, referred back to those comments and noted the Nazis also offered social services and participated in Germany's political process.

Harper later backed Kenney's position, saying, "Both Hezbollah and the Nazi Party stand for the elimination of the Jewish nation. So I think that's pretty fundamental and in that sense I don't think it's an unfair [comparison].

"I think those who associate themselves with Hezbollah in this country are operating beyond the pale, and they're frankly operating in defence of an organization that's an illegal criminal organization in this country," he told CanWest News.

Senator Jerry Grafstein said recent statements by prominent Liberals calling for an even-handed position on the Middle East and criticizing Israel show the party is losing touch with its roots.

"There is a fundamental problem in the Liberal caucus which I despair about," said Grafstein, a Toronto Liberal. "It's a knee-jerk anti-American reaction so that anything [U.S. President George W.] Bush does, it's got to be wrong.

"I think we've lost our way with sloganeering."

Grafstein said the party agreed at its recent Vancouver caucus meetings to set up a committee to examine its position on the Middle East.

Traditional Liberal policy has not been "even-handed," as many in the party now claim, he said. Instead, it has lined up behind fellow democracies like Israel and countries that were the victims of aggression.

In the past, the party aligned its foreign policy "based on Liberal values – liberty, freedom and democracy," he added.

Fogel said the comments by Hubert and Wrzesnewskyj are likely not representative of the Liberal grassroots. Rather, "it reflects what a rump group in caucus [believes], but not normative Liberal Party policy," he said.

All four federal party leaders back Hezbollah's inclusion on the terrorist list. "All articulate the same message about terrorism and Hezbollah's role. That's reflective of a pretty strong consensus from all quarters of the political spectrum," he said.

Morgan said, "Each [Liberal] leadership candidate is saying something different on the Middle East… None have abandoned Israel, but none are solidly or unequivocally behind it. That's always been the case with Liberal policy" going back to the governments of Jean Chrétien and Pierre Trudeau.

"I don't think the Liberals are far off where they've always been. Now we have a Conservative government to compare them to," he said.

Morgan questioned why some Liberals believe "Canada has to have a dialogue with Hezbollah… Knowledgeable people know there is nothing to talk to Hezbollah about.

"The Druze, Sunnis, Christians [of Lebanon] have not been able to negotiate Hezbollah's disarmament. If Hezbollah won't listen to their fellow Lebanese, why do we think they'll listen to any Canadian politician?" he asked.

Mayor stands by Nazi analogy

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The mayor of a small town southwest of Montreal who is also a television and radio host refused to backtrack on his comment that "Israelis are the Nazis of modern times."

Huntingdon, Que., mayor Stéphane Gendron made the remark in an interview published in the Quebec City daily Le Soleil Aug. 21.

He said later that the criticism was directed at the Israeli government, not the people of Israel, but he didn't withdraw the Nazi analogy.

Gendron was asked to clarify the remark by TQS, the TV station where he co-hosts the talk show L'Avocat et le Diable. On his Montreal radio show Le Couvre-feu, on 98.5FM, Gendron stated that, "When we speak of the Israelis, it is directed at the government," and he criticized Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert for "not respecting the ceasefire" with Hezbollah.

He claimed excellent relations with the Jewish community and didn't want to be accused of being an anti-Semite.

In a followup interview with Le Soleil, Gendron repeated his comparison of the Israeli government to the Nazis. "When Israel does not withdraw from the countries that it occupies illegally, no one dares to speak. Meanwhile, we are picking up dead children on the side of the road."

TQS management wasn't satisfied with his response, and asked him to further clarify his remarks on L'Avocat et le Diable. "Stéphane Gendron has the obligation to be as precise as possible, and to not attack a particular people. We must guard against hateful remarks," a TQS spokesperson told Le Soleil.

The controversial Gendron, 38, a lawyer by training, was last year elected mayor of Huntingdon, a town of 3,000 in the southwest corner of the province, which launched him into a media career.

The Jewish community has become increasingly concerned by the coverage and commentary, particularly in the francophone media, since the hostilities between Israel and Hezbollah began.

The criticism of three Quebec politicians, especially Bloc Québécois leader Gilles Duceppe, for taking part in the massive Aug.6 anti-war protest, which was strongly anti-Israel and included Hezbollah supporters, touched off a continuing flood of reaction in the media and on the Internet.

Two National Post columns by Barbara Kay, in which she dubbed the province "Quebecistan" for being soft on Hezbollah, and sharp criticism by Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker of Duceppe for taking part in the march have intensified the discourse, much of it highly critical of Kay and Baker.

Even Premier Jean Charest called the term Quebecistan a "grossierete" (a rude or coarse remark). Charest, who called for a ceasefire between Israel and Hezbollah as early as Aug. 4, has neither defended nor denounced Duceppe and Parti Québécois leader André Boisclair for their participation.

Duceppe announced last week that BQ member André Bellavance will visit Israel Sept. 4 to 12 at the invitation of the Canada-Israel Committee, shortly after another BQ MP, Maria Mourani, returned from a trip to Lebanon organized by the National Council of Canadian-Arab Relations.

Meanwhile, federal Liberal MP Denis Coderre, who joined Duceppe and Boisclair at the anti-war protest, said last week that Israel reacted with excessive force to Hezbollah attacks.

During his party's caucus meeting in Vancouver, the former immigration minister said: "We support the right of Israel to defend themselves but that doesn't mean carte blanche… it was totally disproportionate the way they acted."

Coderre did not get back to The CJN after a request for an interview.

Asper Campus renovation on hold

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Planned renovations to the nine-year-old Asper Jewish Community Campus that were scheduled to start this summer have been put on hold due to a shortage of funds, despite a three-year campaign that has raised more than $7 million to date.

Larry Hurtig, chair of the "Building on Success" campaign and the immediate past president of the Asper Campus' board, cited a higher-than-anticipated cost for raw materials and labour for the construction delays.

He said the campaign needs to raise between $700,000 and $1 million more than the $7.2 million raised to date (out of its original $7.5-million goal) in order to realize the original renovation plan.

The money raised was not all earmarked for capital improvements. Hurtig said that $2 million of that figure was to be used to pay off the campus' lingering debt, and another $2 million was to be set aside to double the size of the campus' endowment fund to better help pay for future maintenance costs.

The original renovation plan was mainly centred around enlarging the Rady Jewish Community Centre fitness area and locker rooms. But proposals were added to expand the area for the Aleph-Bet Child Life Enrichment Program day care and move the Kaufman/Silverberg Resource Centre (Jewish Public Library) from its location in the basement of the Gray Academy of Jewish Education (the space to be filled by the day care) to the site that had been the Marion and Ed Vickar Jewish Museum of Western Canada.

The new tentative construction timetable would see work start on the Rady JCC locker-room renovations in late winter, with the expansion concluded by late next summer. In the meantime, the day care will rent classroom space over the coming year from Gray Academy.

Hurtig said campus management hopes to be able to present a revised renovation plan by mid-September.

One new wrinkle in the plans is the decision to leave the children's library in the Gray Academy and only move the adult part of the library. Originally, all of the library was to be moved into what is now the museum.

CRTC won't block hate sites

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The CRTC has turned down a request that it issue an interim order that would permit carriers of Internet content to block two U.S.-based websites that threaten the life of an Ottawa human rights activist.

In a decision announced late last week, the telecommunications regulator ruled that such an unprecedented request would require notice to Canadian carriers and other interested parties, steps that were not taken in the "ex parte" application filed earlier in the week.

"The commission (CRTC) considers that the type of interim relief sought in the application raises serious and fundamental issues of law and policy relating to the mandate and powers of the commission pursuant to the [Telecommunications] Act. The commission therefore considers that all interested parties should be afforded an opportunity to provide their views on these important issues," stated a two-page letter from CRTC secretary general Diane Rhéaume.

Canadian Jewish Congress, which had joined lawyer Richard Warman in applying for the interim order, said it was disappointed with the ruling. "In our view, the content on these websites clearly breaches Canada's Criminal Code and we are deeply disappointed that the CRTC did not accept its responsibility to respond to a private citizen's complaint," said Congress president Ed Morgan.

In their written application, Warman and Congress jointly asked the telecommunications regulator to allow carriers such as Rogers and Sympatico to block two "blogs" (web logs, or Internet journals) operated by Roanoke, Va.-based neo-Nazi Bill White.

White, who heads an organization called the American National Socialist Workers' Party, allegedly called for the murder of Warman, who has initiated several legal challenges to remove white supremacist materials from the Internet.

The application states material on the websites encourages "violent action" against

Hillel to be proactive about Israel advocacy

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

With the expectation that campuses across North America will face an increase in anti-Israel sentiment, in large part because of the Israel-Hezbollah war, the Israel affairs director for Hillel of Greater Toronto said Hillel will be proactive in creating a safe space for Jewish students, while continuing to focus on Israel-positive programming.

"We are expecting and bracing for increased tension on campus," said Tilly Shames.

"The first thing we've done to prepare for that is take advantage of the quieter time in August to set up meetings with campus security and administration. What we are trying to do is express the concerns and needs of Jewish students before any tension begins."

She said that two main focuses for Hillel is to provide a safe space free from intimidation on campus, and to get campus security and administration to understand that the promotion of Hezbollah-related activity or waving Hezbollah flags would create an environment of fear and intimidation.

"We are always having meetings with our campus administration, but this is the first time we've asked for specifics such as addressing the issue of Hezbollah flags," Shames said.

She wants Jewish students to understand that although Hillel is making a point of being proactive about speaking out against anti-Israel sentiment, Israel-positive programming will not suffer because of this initiative.

"It is important for us to put our focus on promoting Israel at this time," Shames said.

"We are also using this as an opportunity to say we want to work with others on campus to create a safe environment for all students.

"Our hope is that at the beginning of the school year to approach other faith-based student groups and cultural groups to find a common understanding of our need for a safe space free from intimidation on campus for people of all faiths."

Shames added that she will take on a new responsibility this year to build stronger partnerships with other student groups to work on common causes.

"One of the things is a major two-week Holocaust and genocide awareness program. This is the kind of programming we feel that people are interested in and will come together to… learn from Jewish history and apply it to genocide today."

Devora Schwartz, the Tzedek Hillel director, also wants students to understand that "life goes on here," and said that Hillel is in the midst of starting a new partnership with Jewish Family and Child Service.

"We want to see if our students… would go once a week after school and help children, who are clients of the agency, with their homework," Schwartz said.

"We're also looking to partner with Hillel in Uruguay, by taking students there for reading week."

She explained that they would help build homes in areas that weren't necessarily hit by a natural disaster, but in poverty-stricken areas.

"We're building from scratch. It will be a volunteer-focused trip, but the other side of it is to spend some time with the Jewish community there."

Schwartz said she also plans to continue working on raising awareness about the genocide in Darfur, and given the recent war in Israel, she anticipates that students may want to do something to help Israeli victims.

"I'm sure that once the students are back in September we'll do a Tzedek program around the issue [of the Israeli war], whether it be raising money for, let's say, a children's program, or something like that. Down the road, I'm sure we'll take students on a Tzedek volunteer trip to Israel as well," she added.

Hillel of Greater Toronto has also hired new staff who will be working toward improving Israel's image on campus, and providing Jewish students with a safe place to hang out, Shames said.

Among the new additions, Rebecca Woods Baum will work with Hillel students on advocacy issues. Dafna Regev, an Israeli shlicha, is also joining Hillel.

"We are very excited about [Regev] joining our Hillel team because she brings an Israeli perspective," Shames said.

She stressed the importance of keeping their sights set on positive programming, but understands the need for Hillel to stand up for the Jewish population on campus.

"We have to stay focused on our agenda," Shames said. "[But] for students to know that there is an active voice standing up against anti-Semitism and anti-Israel activity on campus is very important for our students. I think people feel comforted by that."

Collaboration launched between Israeli school and U of T

"We are considered the most pluralistic university in Israel," she said.

Biro said the university's reputation was always one of standing up for minorities, pluralism, freedom and democracy and that makes naming the proposed institute after the Compers a perfect fit.

CFHU recently launched a collaboration between the Israeli school and the University of Toronto faculty of social work, which will see academic and student exchanges as well as joint research projects. That initiative came at a time when academic institutions in Britain and elsewhere were considering boycotting Israeli universities, he noted.

A few months ago, CFHU announced creation of the $2 million Amira Dan Doctoral Fund to support doctoral studies in the humanities, Biro added.

Google has already removed blog

Warman and publicizes his home address. It also calls for the overthrow of the Canadian government and for streets to "run red with the blood of Jews."

In a parallel move, Warman asked web giant Google to remove one of White's blogs from its weblog service, Blogger. Google complied. "We want Blogger to enable free expression, including the hosting of views that are unpopular," Google spokesperson Steve Langdon told Canadian Press. "However, advocating violence against a person is not acceptable."

Google's removal of the blog came before the CRTC ruling on Warman's and Congress' application. Mark Goldberg, a telecommunications industry consultant and a Congress executive board member, said under Canadian law, carriers of Internet data are not permitted to tamper with web content unless given specific permission to do so by the CRTC. The application asked the CRTC to permit, though not necessarily require, the carriers to block web content. "As good corporate citizens and to limit civil liability, we expect they'd respond and block the content," Goldberg said.

A second part of the application asked the CRTC to provide direction on a process that would allow the regulator to order final approval for removal of sites. "That has not been done before," Goldberg said.

Goldberg discounted suggestions that an interim order, if granted, would in effect censor the web. "This is a call to murder a Canadian citizen and provides his home address." That kind of communication is illegal in all democracies, he said, adding the Internet should not provide a digital exemption to Canadian law.

The CRTC decision, however, rested on procedural grounds. "In the commission's view… it would be inappropriate to consider granting the interim relief sought in the application on an ex parte basis… Such a public process would allow for consideration of the broader policy and legal issues regarding the scope and appropriate use of the commission's powers," the CRTC ruled.

'Ahmadinejad would sacrifice half of Iran to eliminate Israel'

By DAVID HOROVITZ
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, if he ever became the supreme decision maker in his country, would "sacrifice half of Iran for the sake of eliminating Israel," says Giora Eiland, Israel's former national security adviser.

At present, Eiland told the Jerusalem Post last week, the ultimate decision-maker in Iran is Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, 67, who, he said, is "more reasonable." But, Eiland added, "if Ahmadinejad were to succeed him – and he has a reasonable chance of doing so – then we'd be in a highly dangerous situation."

The 49-year-old Iranian president, Eiland said, "has a religious conviction that Israel's demise is essential to the restoration of Muslim glory, that the Zionist thorn in the heart of the Islamic nations must be removed. And he will pay almost any price to right the perceived historic wrong. If he becomes the supreme leader and has a nuclear capability, that's a real threat."

In dealing with Iran's nuclear ambitions, Eiland said, the United States has three possible courses of action, "all of them bad," and that a decision could not be postponed for too long, "since delay, too, is a decision of sorts."

The first option is to accept that Iran is going nuclear and try to make the best of it. By "making the best of it," Eiland said, he meant "isolating Iran economically, politically and internationally in the hope that this will eventually prompt an internal push for regime change."

This might also give other nations the sense that the political price of going nuclear is too high, and might deter nations such as Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Turkey, Algeria and others from seeking to emulate Iran and causing the full collapse of the nuclear non-proliferation era.

Washington's second option is to make a last-ditch effort at diplomatic action, he said. At this stage, a mixture of sanctions and bonuses would not be sufficient to deter Iran altogether, but it might persuade Teheran to suspend activity for two or three years.

"In return, the U.S. would have to open direct engagement with Teheran, with full recognition of the regime. This would boost the regime's credibility and standing at home and allow it to say it was voluntarily suspending the program for awhile," he said.

The advantage for the Bush administration would be that President George W. Bush "could then say, 'They didn't go nuclear on my watch, and it's up to my successors to keep things that way.'"

The third option, Eiland said, is a military operation, resulting from the sense that the diplomatic process would not work and that there could be no compromise with an axis-of-evil power. However, internal political realities and public opinion in the United States are not conducive to this, he said, nor is international support readily available. Furthermore, "this would be action that would have to be taken within months."

If such action is not taken, and if Iran continues enrichment, it will complete the research and development stage and have a proven ability which it can then duplicate at numerous sites. And at that point, it could not be stopped by military action. Six months or 12 months from now, would be too late, he said.

Tellingly, Eiland noted, it seems to him that the difficulties facing the Bush administration over that third course are increasing.

As the crisis with Iran deepens, meanwhile, some Israeli sources believe the United States has acted foolishly in spurning opportunities for international diplomatic co-operation against Iran in recent years, and that Israel mistakenly encouraged this course of action.

The United States might have had more success isolating Iran two years ago, when Bush and French President Jacques Chirac were stronger, Iran was weaker and the situation in Iraq looked better, the sources said.

As recently as a few months ago, on a trip to Ukraine, which is a vital Russian sphere of influence, U.S. Vice-President Richard Cheney criticized the record of Russian President Vladimir Putin's regime with regard to democracy, the sources pointed out. Against that backdrop, the United States should not be surprised now, therefore, to find Russia less than willing to fully co-operate with its Iran strategy.

Israel, the sources added, realized early the danger posed by Iran's nuclear drive but erred in supporting the United States in hanging tough rather than pushing it toward co-operation.

As for Israel's military options, these sources spoke of a dilemma for the government. They noted only that Israel is not as strong militarily as the United States and mused about what might happen if a military action proved unsuccessful in thwarting the nuclear program. Iran might then complete its nuclear drive and, branding Israel a preemptive aggressor, claim legitimacy for a strike of its own against Israel.

U.S. may want to avoid confrontation

One senior source, asked whether he thought the Israel Defence Forces could take on Iran alone, said it was not necessarily a matter of choice. A nuclear Iran represents an existential threat, he warned, and Israel might have no choice but to prepare for long-range missile attacks from Iran.

Another official warned of the consequences that would result from having a nuclear Iran, even if Israel was not bombed. "We would have our hands tied," the official said. "They would constantly be threatening us with their nuclear weapons, and we would not be able to initiate military operations against Hamas in Gaza or Hezbollah in Lebanon."

Military analysts say the United States, whose military is finding it more and more difficult to assemble the forces needed in Iraq, would prefer to avoid a military confrontation with Iran. At the same time, a new report compiled by the U.S. House of Representatives' intelligence committee suggests that the U.S. lacks sufficient intelligence on Iran's intentions and nuclear abilities.

This week, the United States decided to call 2,500 marines back to active service, to fill the troop shortfall in Iraq.

The United States has not formally ruled out military action against Iran if negotiations fail to put an end to Tehran's nuclear program, but senior administration officials have been stressing for months the need to focus on diplomacy, and the U.S. is putting all its effort into building an international coalition that would act diplomatically against Iran.

The House of Representatives' report made public last week stresses that if Iran is allowed to arm itself with nuclear weapons, Israel might have to take Iran on militarily.

"A nuclear armed Iran would likely exacerbate regional tensions. Israel would find it hard to live with a nuclear armed Iran and could take military action against Iranian nuclear facilities," the report states.

It also says that "a deliberate or miscalculated attack by one state on the other could result in retaliation, regional unrest and an increase in terrorist attacks."

The report pointed to "significant gaps" in the information the United States has on Iran and its nuclear ambitions and called on the American intelligence community to improve the quality of the information about Iran it provides to policy makers.

"The United States lacks critical information needed for analysts to make many of their judgments with confidence about Iran and there are many significant information gaps," the report reads. It pointed to weapons of mass destruction and Iran's support for terrorism as issues on which the U.S. should have better intelligence.

"American intelligence agencies do not know nearly enough about Iran's nuclear weapons program," the report concluded. It calls on U.S. intelligence agencies to acquire more information from sources in Iran and to recruit more Farsi speakers to try to decipher Iran's intentions and capabilities.

Israel Briefs

Soldier killed in Lebanon by Israeli mine

An Israeli soldier was killed and two officers were wounded last Wednesday in southern Lebanon, apparently by an old Israeli mine. One soldier was injured seriously, the other lightly when their tank hit a mine probably planted in the past by the Israeli army, initial investigations showed. It was not clear if their unit had reached the area by navigational mistake or if the mine field had not been marked on army maps.

British group to work for Israel's image

Israeli media carried a report that a group aiming to improve Israel's image in the British media is set to launch in September. The Jewish Media Network is the creation of four British Jewish advertising executives who founded the group StandUp4Israel, which campaigns to "promote Israel's cause in the British media." The network will launch with a dinner and speech by Marc Cave, co-founder of StandUp4Israel and the brains behind several of Britain's most prominent advertising campaigns.

Major Israeli writer dies

Writer Yizhar Smilansky, an Israel Prize-winner better known by the pen name S. Yizhar, died on Aug. 21. One month shy of his 90th birthday, Yizhar died of heart failure. Known as a major innovator of Hebrew literature, he wrote prose, poetry and children's literature. He also was well-known for his essays, which gained attention at the beginning of the war in Lebanon in 1982. His writing, which often challenged the Zionist narrative and the morality of the army, was the subject of intense controversy.

Iran wants Italy as go-between on soldiers

Iran wants Italy to help negotiate the release of two Israeli soldiers kidnapped in Lebanon. Italy has been told the soldiers are alive but not in "great condition," said Sergio de Gregorio, head of the Italian Senate's defence committee. Ali Larijani, Iran's national security chief, told de Gregorio that he would ask Hezbollah to conduct negotiations through Italy. The reservists, Eldad Regev, 26, and Ehud Goldwasser, 31, were kidnapped July 12.

Air Force commander to oversee Iran threat

The head of Israel's air force was chosen to oversee Israel's military preparedness in case of a confrontation with Iran. Maj.-Gen. Eliezer Shkedy will co-ordinate Iran-related operations among the Mossad, military intelligence and other branches of the Israeli army. In the case of war, he would oversee battle plans and fighting. Shkedy's appointment was made before the war in Lebanon began, Ha'aretz reported Friday.

Polls: Israelis moving right

Israelis seem to be shifting to the right following the war in Lebanon, recent surveys report. A poll broadcast last Thursday on Israel's Channel Two, for example, showed Likud and the Israel Beiteinu Party winning the most seats in the Knesset if elections were held today. The poll showed both winning 24 seats, with the ruling Kadima party dropping to 14 seats and Labor to nine. Other polls showed a similar rise in support for the right.

Chirac says 15,000 troops in S. Lebanon 'excessive'

France's president said a UN peacekeeping force in Lebanon did not need 15,000 troops. The 15,000-troop figure outlined by UN Security Council Resolution 1701, which ended the Israel-Hezbollah war, is "excessive" because of the small amount of territory in question, Jacques Chirac said Friday. A day earlier, Chirac announced that France would commit 2,000 troops to the force. Belgium also announced that it would send nearly 400 troops.

Israel must use public diplomacy as a tool of war

By RAANAN GISSIN
Jerusalem Post

Analysis

Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah and his patrons in Iran have successfully integrated the ABCs of public diplomacy into their long-term strategic war doctrine.

Nasrallah ordered his men to remove their uniforms, blend in with the Lebanese population and continue to fight from that position. This way, when Israel attacks Hezbollah, it is seen as moving against what appears to be a civilian population, even though rockets fired from these villages are striking Israel. Attacks on what look like civilian targets can then be called "crimes against humanity" and "war crimes."

Raanan Gissin

Israel now faces the "special forces" of the Iranian military, the best of the guerrilla warfare units, in front-line positions. The whole concept of how these forces operate on the battlefield and in public diplomacy is directed by Iran. Over the last 25 years, Iran has gradually created a global network, first forming an axis with Syria and then building up Hezbollah, with Lebanon serving as a regional theatre, part of Iran's global design in its confrontation with the West.

Israel had been operating on the assumption that Hezbollah was a terrorist organization like Hamas or the PLO that had to be neutralized in order to bring about stability. But these are not merely terrorist gangs. This is an army – a well-trained, well-organized and ideologically indoctrinated guerrilla army – and Israel did not make that point strongly enough at the beginning of the war, neither to the world nor to itself.

From the minute Israel left Lebanon in May 2000, Iran began to implement its plan for a takeover of Lebanon by Hezbollah. First, it got into the political system and tried to take it over from within.

Public diplomacy for any country, not just Israel, has gone global. While the conflict may be determined in the local arena, such as Israel's fight against Hezbollah, the ramifications of the action itself are global in nature. Therefore, public diplomacy must be geared toward the global scene.

Ever since 9/11, we have been in a different type of war. We were exposed for the first time to a global network of terrorist organizations, sort of a multi-national corporation of non-state actors.

On the Lebanese scene, through the careful manipulation of evidence, the theatre of war has turned into a crime scene. Every action that Israel takes in Lebanon – with its densely populated villages where Israel must operate because that's the only way it can uproot the terrorists within creates an opportunity for the other side to use public diplomacy with global ramifications. Thus, instead of the war being about Israel's right to self-defence, Hezbollah was able to turn it around so that the issue on the international agenda became Israel's destruction of Lebanon and Israel as the cause of world instability. The victim becomes the criminal.

Another way to change a theatre of war into a crime scene is by developing Hezbollah positions in close proximity to those of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL). Then, there is always an opportunity for a potential mishap, where Israel will hit the UNIFIL position by mistake. Or Hezbollah may provoke an Israeli attack by firing from a specific location and ensuring that a human shield of innocent civilians will be present at the site.

The globalization of a local conflict has important implications for public diplomacy. What happens on Israel's northern border will affect what happens on its southern border with the Palestinians in Gaza. And the overall situation in the north and the south is going to determine the overall impact on the Arab world, and to what extent stability will be threatened in regimes like those in Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Jordan that fear the rise of Hezbollah.

The kidnapping of two of its soldiers enabled Israel to pre-empt before the Iranians had completed their buildup. The Iranians did not want a full-scale war yet. They wanted to put pressure on Israel, but Hezbollah made a mistake in its assessment of Israel's response. The end result was a "premature" war that has put the Iranian terrorist threat on the global agenda of public diplomacy, alerting the West before Iran was completely ready.

Hezbollah was also prepared with its public diplomacy. It had planned for this war for a long time. It had spokesmen speaking fluent English who would escort reporters to the designated "crime scenes." Hezbollah knew Israel would launch attacks on Beirut and that there would be scenes of destruction.

This war was a symptom of Israel's inability to prepare strategically with public diplomacy as a tool of war. It would be useful to learn and follow what Hezbollah has done in terms of its preparations to meet the requirements of a proactive public diplomacy strategy.

Hezbollah invests $15 million to $20 million a year in its own TV station, Al Manar. That's more than the overall hasbarah public relations budget of the State of Israel. Al Manar's broadcasts are pure propaganda, but they are professional and carried worldwide via satellite and cable.

We need to recognize that the media are a tool that can serve as a weapons system. Hezbollah is 10 years ahead of Israel in the ability to use and manipulate the media for its strategic purposes. I don't want to underestimate the limitations that a democracy has in instituting a coherent long-term public diplomacy strategy, but we must start thinking about this as a strategic issue.

The threat Israel faces is not just Hezbollah, it's Iran, and we should alert the rest of the world to that, as we alerted the world to the Iranian nuclear program. Israel is on the front line of Iran's war against the West. This may sound alarmist, but the best way to conquer fear is to tell people the truth. Tell them what we are facing, and then mobilize the world as well. Military action alone is insufficient.

The Iranians are coming, and we better read the writing on the wall. It is not in Arabic; it is in Persian, and it is still not too late to learn.

Israel & the Jewish World

Gaza caught in anarchy and thuggery

By KHALED ABU TOAMEH
Jerusalem Post

GAZA CITY — "When you walk in the streets of Gaza City, you cannot but close your eyes because of what you see there: unimaginable chaos, careless policemen, young men carrying guns and strutting with pride and families receiving condolences for their dead in the middle of the street."

This is how Ghazi Hamad, spokesperson for the Hamas-controlled Palestinian Authority government and a former newspaper editor, described the situation in the Gaza Strip in an article he published on Sunday on some Palestinian news websites.

The article, the first of its kind by a senior Hamas official, also questioned the effectiveness of the Qassam rocket attacks against Israel and noted that since Israel evacuated the Gaza Strip, the situation there has deteriorated on all levels. It holds the armed groups responsible for the crisis and calls on them to reconsider their tactics and to stop blaming Israel for their mistakes.

"Gaza is suffering under the yoke of anarchy and the swords of thugs," Hamad wrote. "I remember the day when Israel withdrew from the Gaza Strip and closed the gates behind. Then Palestinians across the political spectrum took to the streets to celebrate what many of us regarded as the Israeli defeat or retreat. We heard a lot about a promising future in the Gaza Strip and about turning the area into a trade and industrial zone."

Hamad said the "culture of life" that prevailed in Gaza has since been replaced with a nightmare. "Life became a nightmare and an intolerable burden," he said. "Today I ask myself a daring and frightening question: 'Why did the occupation return to Gaza?' The normal reply: 'The occupation is the reason.'"

Dismissing Israel's responsibility for the growing state of anarchy and lawlessness in the Gaza Strip, Hamad said it was time for the Palestinians to embark on a soul-searching process to see where they erred.

"We're always afraid to talk about our mistakes," he added. "We're used to blaming our mistakes on others. What is the relationship between the chaos, anarchy, lawlessness, indiscriminate murders, theft of land, family rivalries, transgression on public lands and unorganized traffic and the occupation? We are still trapped by the mentality of conspiracy theories – one that has limited our capability to think."

Hamad admitted that the Palestinians have failed in developing the Gaza Strip following the Israeli withdrawal and in imposing law and order. He said about 500 Palestinians have been killed and 3,000 wounded since the Israeli pullout, in addition to the destruction of much of the infrastructure in the area.

By comparison, he said, only three or four Israelis have been killed by the rockets fired from the Gaza Strip over the same period.

"Some will argue that it's not a matter of profit or loss, but that this has an accumulating effect" he said. "This may be true. But isn't there a possibility of decreasing the number of casualties and increasing our gains by using our brains and making the proper calculations away from demagogic statements?"

The Hamas official said that while his government was unable to change the situation, the opposition was sitting on the side and watching and PA President Mahmoud Abbas was as weak as ever.

"We have all been attacked by the bacteria of stupidity," he remarked. "We have lost our sense of direction and we don't know where we're headed."

Addressing the various armed groups in the Gaza Strip, Hamad concluded: "Please have mercy on Gaza. Have mercy on us from your demagogy, chaos, guns, thugs, infighting. Let Gaza breathe a bit. Let it live."

Israel rejects Amnesty International criticism

By HILARY LEILA KRIEGER
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — The Foreign Ministry slammed an Amnesty International report published last Wednesday charging that Israel had deliberately destroyed civilian infrastructure in Lebanon and demanding an international investigation for what it termed war crimes.

The 20-page report, the first comprehensive one issued by the human rights organization on the subject of the recent war, accused Israel of "indiscriminate and disproportionate attacks" that displaced one-quarter of the civilian population.

The report alleges that Israel's destruction of thousands of homes and strikes on numerous bridges and roads as well as water and fuel storage plants, was an integral part of Israel's military strategy in Lebanon, rather than "collateral damage resulting from the lawful targeting of military objectives."

That strategy, in Amnesty's assessment of Israeli official statements, was carried out in part in order to turn civilians against Hezbollah. The report noted that any Hezbollah use of civilians as a means of shielding their activities constituted a war crime. But, it said, "under international law such use does not release the opposing party from its obligations towards the protection of the civilian population." It calculated that more than 1,000 civilians died, some 7,000 strikes had been carried out by the Israeli Air Force, 15,000 residences had been destroyed and at least two hospitals wiped out.

The report concluded by calling for an impartial international investigation, saying that Lebanon had never been known to carry out a review of allegations of war crimes, while Israeli efforts had "fallen short of the standards required."

Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mark Regev rejected the assertions contained in the report, saying that Israel steps were taken in self-defence and that the civilians areas were also being used by Hezbollah, making such attacks "very clearly" legal according to international law.

"It's not serious," Regev said of the report, "because you have to discuss the scope of the attacks on Israel." The report does not devote any of its several sections to Hezbollah rocket attacks on northern Israel or any of its other actions, though Claudio Cordone, senior director for research at Amnesty, said those subjects would be addressed in future reports. He added that by Israel's argument about acceptable civilians targets, one could suggest that Hezbollah attacks on northern Israel were reasonable because some roads and regions there were used by the military.

Anti-Defamation League National Director Abe Foxman, however, took issue with Amnesty's decision to focus its first major report on the conflict on alleged Israeli abuses, when Hezbollah had started the war.

"They continue the pattern of biased, prejudiced, bigoted, one-sided judgments on the Israeli-Arab conflict. It's part and parcel of putting the blame on Israel," he said.

Cordone countered that "there is less controversy about the abuses committed by Hezbollah, whereas there hasn't been sufficient attention to this kind of attack," referring to the alleged Israeli strategy of targeting civilian areas.

Cordone added that "for those who, like Israel, have argued they've done everything according to the rules of war, they should have nothing to fear from a proper, impartial investigation, which is what we're seeking."

But Foxman said this report would create a stigma that other reports wouldn't change. Foxman, speaking during a tour of north Israel where he saw the damage of the Katyushas first-hand, charged that the approach of Amnesty bordered on the anti-Semitic.

He said the civilian losses on both sides were "tragic." But, he continued: "Who's the judge of what's disproportionate, what's overkill? Amnesty International? Give me a break," he said.

"We don't need to be scapegoated by a group that pretends to [represent] civility and justice."

Toronto brothers volunteer for Sar-el at height of war

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — When the phone rings at 4 a.m. and it's a few days after the outbreak of a war between Israel and Lebanon, you don't expect good news, particularly if you live in Tel Aviv and have friends in the north.

I picked up the receiver. It was my mom, calling from Toronto. "Is everything alright?" I asked her, breathless.

"Your father just got a plane to Israel," she said. "He's coming to volunteer for Sar-El."

It was better than any news I could have hoped for.

It's not the first time my dad, 56, has come to Israel. He's been here several times since my sister and I made aliyah three and five years ago, respectively.

Nor is it his first time volunteering for Sar-El, the Israel Defence Forces program for volunteers from around the world. His first volunteer mission was in 2004, when he worked at an army base in the centre of the country for two weeks, cleaning and repairing helmets. It is, however, the first time he brought along his elder brother, my uncle Syd, 57.

My sister and I couldn't even meet their flight, because they went straight to work immediately after landing.

The next call I got was from a local cellphone: "Hi honey," said my dad, who explained that he jumped on the first plane he could after the news reported the outbreak of war with Hezbollah.

"I left behind my wife, a lot of projects I have on the go for my synagogue, and a lot of work," said my dad, whose name is Charly. "But I felt that coming here was more important. Helping Israel is a priority for me, especially when there's an emergency, and it's clear that there is a real need for help."

My Uncle Syd, a retiree from Richmond Hill, Ont., echoed that sentiment: "I had been thinking about joining Sar-El for some time," he said. When he found out my father was returning to the program, he decided it was the perfect time to check it out. "With Israel at war, I figured I could do a lot of good for a country that I really love."

The brothers couldn't have been more right. During the war, there were widespread food shortages among soldiers in southern Lebanon, and the Sar-El volunteers played a critical role in preparing emergency food boxes for them.

"On our first day, we worked all the way through to midnight," my dad said. He and Syd spent their first week volunteering on an army base near Tel Aviv, on an assembly line with 60 other volunteers from Canada, the United States, France, Switzerland, England, Holland and Argentina. Together they filled boxes with cans of pickles, hummus, pineapples, peaches, and corn, as well as packages of wafers and halva, garbage bags (since the soldiers couldn't leave behind a garbage trail for Hezbollah to follow), and notes from the volunteers expressing their support for the soldiers who would receive the boxes.

"This time, volunteering was a very different experience from two years ago," said Charly, noting that previously, the volunteers stopped work around 4 p.m., took leisurely showers, and attended evening programs and educational trips as part of their experience.

"This time, there was none of that. We just worked and worked hard. The soldiers needed food and they needed it fast," he said.

"This time around, volunteering took on a whole new meaning for me. Whereas two years ago, I was repairing helmets for God knows when the soldiers would need them, this time I really felt that I was serving an important purpose."

Syd agreed. "I couldn't believe it. I arrived at 5:30 p.m. and I slugged my first case of food onto the palate at 7:30 p.m."

His job was to fill a skid, consisting of 180 full boxes of food, each weighing 15 pounds, every eight minutes. "It was very hard work, but doing it really made me feel I was making an important contribution to Israel."

During their second week volunteering, the brothers were relocated to a base in the south, where they were part of an emergency support crew for reserve soldiers preparing for tours of duty in Lebanon, Gaza and the West Bank. Their job was to ensure that each reservist received a properly-sized uniform, sleeping bag and other supplies.

Spending time with the soldiers was one of the major highlights of Syd's volunteer experience.

"One soldier I met was in charge of a battalion of 14 soldiers. He was so committed and said he loved and would do anything for Israel. But the most amazing thing about him is that he was only 19 years old," Syd said.

"These are the sentinels of Israel. These are Israel's protectors. These are the people on whose shoulders rest the continued existence of Jewry around the world. These are the people who need our help."

Said Charly: "If I could send a message to Jews across Canada, it would be four words: Israel needs your help.

"Jews around the world have this image of Israel as the strongest country in the Middle East, and they take for granted that it can win any war, but Israel's enemies are getting wiser, better equipped, and better educated, and it would be a mistake to underestimate them. Israel needs as much support from world Jewry as it can get."

"We can't afford to lose. This is the only country we've got. That's why if you can come, come, and if you can't come, send money," added Syd.

"If you, as a Jew, don't do anything and something, God forbid, happens to jeopardize Israel's future, you are as much to blame as those who want to destroy Israel. Indifference is as bad as hate."

Syd said he was amazed that so many of his co-volunteers – nearly one-third – weren't Jewish. "Some have come because their religion supports the existence of Israel. Others have come because the country is an essential part of their political ideology. Still others have come because they say Israel is the bravest country in the world, and they want to experience that brave environment," he said.

"Meeting these people has totally changed my perspective. Until I volunteered for Sar-El, I believed anti-Semitism was rampant," he said. "[The non-Jewish volunteers] have somehow given me a newfound hope in humanity, and really brightened my outlook on life and the world around me."

As for volunteering together, the men agreed it was an irreplaceable experience. "He's really funny and he really keeps things light," Syd said of his brother. "He's the one who motivated me to do this. He led me here, and I am really glad that he did."

Shabbat for one or two

BY SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Most people associate Shabbat with a group of people sitting around a table laden with food. However, not everyone hosts crowds of people each week. Young couples, empty nesters and single people often enjoy having a quiet Shabbat for one or two.

Cooking for one or two people presents a special challenge. How do you prepare a proper meal without having tons of leftovers or having to throw away food? Most recipes make six to eight servings. What do you do with all those leftovers?

What has worked well for me is to make a "normal" size casserole and divide it into two smaller baking pans. Bake one right away and wrap and freeze the other. That way you still have just enough leftovers for perhaps one lunch, and an easy dinner for another day. Consider cooking more than one meal whenever you are in the kitchen. You may just be able to take a week off cooking if you're really efficient.

CORNISH HEN WITH ROASTED VEGETABLES

A Cornish hen, roasted to perfection with an apple-scented glaze, is fancy enough for a special occasion, but easy enough for a simple dinner for two.

1 fresh or frozen Rock Cornish hen (about 24 oz.), thawed
¾ cup frozen baby carrots
2 tbsp. apple jelly
1 tbsp. margarine
¼ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. marjoram or oregano leaves
¾ cup frozen peas

Heat oven to 350. Remove giblets; split hen in half. Rinse and pat dry. Place skin side up in an ungreased 12 x 8 in. glass baking dish. Arrange carrots around hen.

In 1-quart saucepan, cook jelly, butter, salt and marjoram over low heat 2 to 3 minutes, stirring constantly, until warm. Brush half of sauce over hen and carrots. Cover with foil. Bake 40 minutes. Uncover; brush with remaining sauce. Add peas; bake 20 minutes longer, brushing with pan juices once or twice, until hen is fork tender, its juices have run clear and vegetables are tender. (Makes 2 servings)

PRIME RIB FOR ONE

No reason why you can't enjoy the treat of a prime rib dinner. For two, just double the recipe.

2½ pounds rib of beef
1 tsp. minced garlic
1 tbsp. olive oil
2 potatoes, whole

Purchase 1 rib of beef, which should weight about 2½ pounds. It must be frozen before cooking, so plan ahead! Take the rib out of the freezer, unwrap it and rub with garlic and then olive oil. Place the rib on a baking pan with two potatoes holding it upright. Roast at 400 for 85 minutes for rare, 95 minutes for medium well. Make sure to let the rib stand for 5 minutes before slicing to let the juices redistribute.

ACORN SQUASH WITH BUTTER PECAN SAUCE

1 acorn squash
2 tbsp. margarine
2 tbsp. firmly packed brown sugar
1 tbsp. maple-flavoured syrup
¼ cup coarsely chopped pecans

Heat oven to 350. Cut squash in half lengthwise; remove seeds. Cut squash halves crosswise into 1-inch-thick slices. Arrange slices in 13 x 9-inch (3-quart) glass baking dish; cover with foil. Bake at 350 for 30 to 35 minutes or until almost tender.

Meanwhile, melt margarine in a small saucepan over medium heat. Stir in brown sugar, syrup and pecans. Cook just until sugar dissolves, stirring constantly. Remove squash from oven. Spoon pecan mixture over squash. Return to oven; bake an additional 10 to 15 minutes or until squash is tender, spooning pecan mixture occasionally over squash. (Makes 4 servings)

CAKE FOR TWO

1¾ cups cake mix
⅔ cup water
¼ cup oil
1 egg

Combine ingredients in an ungreased 8- or 9-in. square pan and beat with fork until well blended. Spread batter evenly in the pan when mixed. Bake at 350 degrees for 30-35 minutes or until toothpick inserted in centre comes out clean.

For Banana Cake:
1¾ cups cake mix
½ cup miniature chocolate chips
⅔ cup water
½ cup mashed banana
2 tbsp. oil
1 egg

Mix all ingredients in a medium bowl. Pour into greased 8 in. square pan and bake at 350 for 30-40 minutes until toothpick comes out clean.

Quilting project keeps cancer patients warm

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

The Toronto Jewish Quilting Project is showcasing one of its quilts at Casa Loma next month in an exhibit put on by The QUILT: A Breast Cancer Support Project.

"For us it's representative of how far the Toronto Jewish Quilting Project itself has come in that we can donate [a quilt]," said Eva Karpati, the Jewish quilting project's founder and organizer. "We're thrilled about that progress... The quilt we donated is a beautiful work of art."

The QUILT was established in 1999 by Carol Miller, who was diagnosed with breast cancer in April 1997.

Miller, who owned quilt stores in St. Agatha, Ont., Waterloo, Ont., and at her farm west of Stratford, Ont., organized the project in 1999 because she thought cancer support organizations needed more help. The QUILT has raised over $1 million so far.

More than 400 quilts are on display in exhibits in Stratford, Toronto and Calgary. The Casa Loma exhibit, in Toronto, opens on Sept. 29 for a month. Fifty of the 120 quilts at the Toronto exhibit, including Angel Wings Takes Flight, submitted by the Toronto Jewish Quilting Project, will be auctioned off in a live or silent auction at the Toronto Quilt Auction and reception at the Fermenting Cellar in Distillery District on Oct. 24.

The public can also bid online for any of the quilts at the official website. The highest bid, for Angel Wings Take Flight, is currently $400.

"We aren't involved in raising funds for research. We're involved in raising funds for people to have a place to go for free programming – whether it's yoga, reiki, whatever they need," said Miller.

"We support organizations like Wellspring [a support centre for individuals and families affected by cancer] or Princess Margaret and Mount Sinai hospitals, who have gotten together and have an outreach program for patients beyond the four walls."

The Toronto Jewish Quilting Project was established in 2004 and used a space donated by the Ministry of Parks and Recreation until last winter, when the group became affiliated with the National Council of Jewish Women.

"We got in touch with them in November 2005 and officially started in January 2006," she said. "They gave us an official home and they adopted us, which was a dream come true, because we didn't have a charitable status number [before then]."

Since its inception, the project has distributed 20 quilts to people suffering with cancer. Fabric Land and Creative Bags donate supplies for the quilts.

Karpati said most people who request a quilt for a cancer patient know of the organization through word-of-mouth.

The group, which has about 15 to 22 volunteers, ranging in age from 20 to 83, and meets for two hours every Thursday night.

"Each night we're probably working on five [quilts] that are all at various stages of completion," Karpati said. "There is a lot of work that's involved, so each night someone might be cutting, someone is sewing, someone is putting the three layers together, someone else is quilting. There's lot that goes into one quilt."

Engineer recognized for heart bypass technology

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Leon Katz, a biomedical and clinical engineer who was a pioneer in the use of heart-lung bypass machines during open-heart surgeries, was one of only two non-physicians to receive a "Living Legend Award" at the 16th Congress of the World Society of Cardio-Thoracic Surgeons, held earlier this month in Ottawa.

The award, which was also presented to 13 other recipients at a gala evening ceremony Aug. 19 at the National Arts Centre, was in recognition of Katz's contributions to Canadian and international health care, particularly in the area of biomedical technology and engineering in the medical world.

Leon Katz

Prior to a nearly four-decade career with Health Canada's bureau of medical devices, health protection branch, in Ottawa, Katz, a native of Montreal, worked at four hospitals in Montreal developing and using a variety of innovative medical devices.

During World War II, at age 19, Katz volunteered for service and was stationed in England. Fluent in German, he was seconded to the British Army's branch of the Control Commission for Germany, where he analyzed and decoded documents and interviewed captured Nazi officials. In recognition of his military service, he received numerous awards. On his return to Canada, he enrolled in McGill University, from which he received an electrical engineering degree in 1950.

Katz "graduated McGill during a virulently anti-Semitic period in Quebec, when Jews were restricted entry to universities, and those that were allowed entry on strict quotas required a much higher grade point average than everyone else," said his daughter, Floralove Katz.

Katz was the first graduate in engineering and physiology (his second degree) who was dedicated exclusively to clinical, biomedical, hospital-based engineering. "I am not a medical doctor, I am an engineer. I trained with the world's greatest neurologist, Dr. Wilder Penfield, at the Montreal Neurological Institute," he said.

Among his lengthy list of biomedical "firsts," Katz was the first clinical perfusionist during the first successful open-heart surgery in Canada at the Institut de Cardiologie de Montreal with Dr. Edouard Gagnon in 1957, and he was the first biomedical engineer to carry out more than 1,000 cardio-pulmonary bypass perfusions.

"The perfusionist is the person, in open heart surgery who is responsible for maintaining the life of the patient while the heart is stopped," Katz said. "How does he do this? The perfusionist removes venous blood from the patient [that's deoxygenated and high in carbon dioxide] and returns [oxygenated] arterial blood, thus keeping the patient alive during the surgery. I am an engineer. I basically became a perfusionist because I invented and built the machinery that did this, and it was so complicated and I was so adroit at operating the machinery that the surgeons insisted that I do it."

His daughter said that "hundreds of Canadian citizens are alive today" because of these groundbreaking cardio-pulmonary bypass perfusions.

Katz and the other 13 recipients of the Living Legend Award were selected from a list of 300 candidates from around the world.

He said modestly that "the other laureates were, without exception, the world's greatest surgeons and scientists." He added that receiving the award "means a lot more than just recognition for me. I was the only Jewish person of the 14 laureates. It is, in a way, a recognition of the Jewish community, and particularly the community of Ottawa."

A museum, war art and Canadian identity

Art or Memorial: The Forgotten History of Canada's War Art* by Laura Brandon, University of Calgary Press.

By NORMAN RAVVIN

The opening of a new Canadian War Museum building along Ottawa's river drive in 2005 can be seen as the culmination of events that reach back to the midpoint of World War I. It was in 1916 that Lord Beaverbrook, the New Brunswick-born newspaper magnate, initiated what came to be called the Canadian War Records Office, whose goal, among other things, was to commission artists to record Canada's contribution to the outcome of the war.

Norman Ravvin

In World War I, British artists took the bulk of these commissions, though members of the Group of Seven did go overseas to paint European battlefields. Thirty-two Canadians were hired as official war artists during World War II, among them Alex Colville, Molly Lamb Bobak and Aba Bayefsky, who went on to substantial postwar careers. Almost half of the museum's war art collection – 5,000 paintings, sculptures and works on paper – were made during World War II.

Laura Brandon's Art or Memorial: The Forgotten History of Canada's War Art traces the development of the tradition of Canadian artists' war work, and examines what the reception – at times outright neglect – of this work reveals about Canadian identity and national culture.

A number of themes run through Art or Memorial that not only cast light on the history of the Holocaust but also reflect the sometimes peculiar entanglement between Canadian Jewish life and mainstream cultural trends.

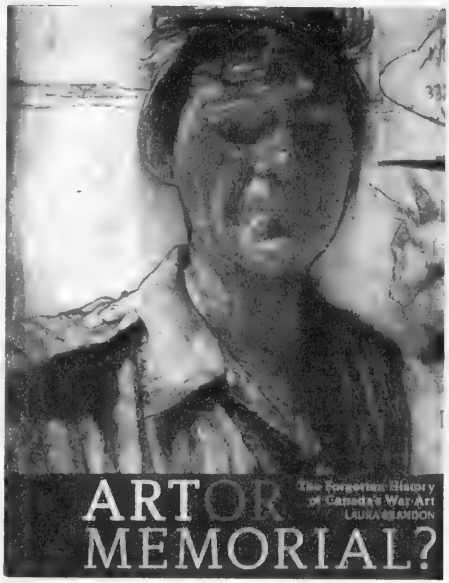
War artists portrayed a myriad of subject matter in the sketch work they did both on the battlefield and off, as well as in the watercolours and large oil canvases they completed as part of their responsibilities upon returning to Canada. World War I subjects included women making shells, the D-Day invasion, and ruined French and German townscapes. At the end of World War II, Bayefsky and Colville were among the few who entered Bergen-Belsen alongside the British liberators in early May 1945. Colville made drawings of the pits being dug for mass graves, as well as of survivors, some of whom died after being captured by him on paper.

Bayefsky was 22 when he saw Belsen, having worked earlier in the war at depicting destroyed German towns. In a 1989 interview he described what he saw at the camp as "the determining factor in everything I have done since." Unlike Colville, Holocaust imagery and themes remained at the centre of his work, culminating in a 1998 exhibition at the war museum titled "Reflections of the Holocaust."

Colville's Belsen-related work is included among the illustrations in Brandon's Art or Memorial, and it is shown on the websites of the Canadian War Museum and the Canadian Museum of Civilization. But these are recent appearances of little-seen work by one of Canada's most prominent artists. The war art of Bayefsky and Colville, as well as the work it influenced by B.C.-based painter Jack Shadbolt, represents some of the earliest artistic response to the Holocaust. It was completed before any firm sense of how to respond to the events had taken shape or were being publicly discussed.

Another Holocaust-related issue embedded in Art or Memorial is the short-lived plan to include a Holocaust gallery in the new war museum building. Brandon does not delve into this fiasco in great detail, but she does note that the rejection of the plan by veterans and their organizations sealed its fate. The Holocaust, Brandon notes, in an effort to take account of veterans' motives, "was not their memory of war."

Discussions regarding the Holocaust gallery were handed to a Senate subcommittee in 1998. It interviewed 50 witnesses in the course of a week's hearings, among whom was noted historian Michael Marrus. The committee's report is remarkable for its unanimity in witnesses' views that the mandate of the war museum did not include a display related to the Holocaust. Canadian military history and heritage had no link, witnesses felt, with the Holocaust. Wilfrid Laurier University historian R.H. Roy announced, in his appearance before the committee, that "those of us joining the army in 1939 and 1940 did so for a number of reasons, none of which involved a direct desire to stop the Holocaust."



Jack Granatstein, who for two years directed the war museum and worked to highlight its war art collection, elaborated similar views in another context. The Holocaust, he argued, "was not a Canadian story." Our history, he said, "is Canadian… and in a nation that worries about its identity, our history is, or should be, critical in defining that identity."

The counter-argument to these claims was made effectively by Harold Troper and Irving Abella in their 1982 study None Is Too Many: Canada and the Jews of Europe, 1933-1948. The book's impact and staying power came of the realization it forced on its readers that by abdication of wartime responsibility, the Canadian government made the Holocaust an integral part of Canadian history. In other words, an official policy of disengagement and a lack of any ethical grounding in response to the refugee crisis created by European mass murder, made Holocaust history "our history."

In Art or Memorial, Brandon examines the way that Canada's war art collection has, at times, "receded from… the nation's collective consciousness." She aims to explore how "both its presence and its absence" have "helped shape" Canadian identity. Her work is suggestive of broader themes in Canadian history and culture, as well as those more specifically connected to the Holocaust and Jewish history in Canada.

His books include the novel* Lola by Night and the story collection Sex, Skyscrapers and Standard Yiddish. His writing on literary themes can be found in A House of Words: Jewish Writing, Identity and Memory.

Da Vinci Code 'doesn't give us the real story:' rabbi

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

The international bestseller The Da Vinci Code has generated much controversy worldwide with its conspiracy theories that question traditional Christian doctrine.

Author Dan Brown was on the right track, says Rabbi Michael Skobac, education director for Jews for Judaism, but he followed the wrong clues: the book's main allegations are based on fictions, but research is now pointing to the possibility of a bigger Church cover-up that is rooted in fact.

"A sense among many scholars is emerging that a real history of Christianity has been concealed from the beginning which has serious scholarship behind it. It's a much more interesting story than Brown's. It's not conclusive or the final chapter of the story, but many scholars are beginning to head in this direction," Rabbi Skobac said.

Rabbi Michael Skobac

The rabbi told an audience at Shaarei Tefillah Congregation last month that The Da Vinci Code portrays the following as true: Jesus was married to Mary Magdalene, who was later portrayed by the Church as a prostitute; their child, Sarah, became the progenitor of French monarchs and this bloodline still exists today; and the Holy Grail is not really a chalice but a metaphor for this bloodline that has been protected by an ancient organization called the Priory of Sion, and its members conceal clues about these truths in art.

The first problem with the book, Rabbi Skobac said, is that the claim on which it is based – that the Priory of Sion is a cult of secret goddess worshippers protecting secrets about Jesus' bloodline – is itself based upon a fabricated document.

In France's national library, there are documents from a group called the Priory of Sion listing its leading grandmasters in history, but journalists noticed that there was no record of who deposited these records.

In 1956, a group called the Priory of Sion – borrowing its name from a medieval Catholic Monastic order – registered with the French government, Rabbi Skobac said. It was organized by Pierre Plontard, an ultra-conservative anti-Semite obsessed with reuniting Europe under the Roman Catholic Church, which would be ruled by a monarchy descended from Jesus.

"Plontard fabricated these documents and had them planted throughout France. His co-conspirators confessed in the 1980s. Checkmate to The Da Vinci Code," Rabbi Skobac said.

Other historical fallacies are rampant in the book. "Dan Brown says that the marriage of Magdalene and Jesus is a matter of historical record, but there is no evidence that Jesus was married to anyone." Rabbi Skobac said.

"Next, Brown's character Teabing mentions an apocryphal gospel of Philip stating that Mary Magdalene was Jesus' 'companion.' Teabing says that the Aramaic word for 'companion' also means 'spouse.' The problem is, the gospel of Philip was not Aramaic. It was Coptic, which borrows its word for 'companion' from the Greek, which has no connection to 'spouse.'"

The Da Vinci Code postulates that its version of history has been obscured, yet "hundreds of scholars have not unearthed one shred of evidence to support Brown's half-baked truths," Rabbi Skobac said.

However, this doesn't mean that a real Christian truth has not been covered up for millennia, he added.

Mary's story is now being held to higher scrutiny by scholars, Rabbi Skobac said. Her status as the mother of God leads to implicit Christian doctrines like perpetual virginity – that Jesus did not have a human father.

The doctrine of perpetual virginity means that even after Jesus was born, Mary had no relations with Joseph, "painting her life as totally disconnected from how a Jewish woman would have lived 2,000 years ago," the rabbi said.

"In John 8:41, Jesus' opponents say to him, 'We were not born of fornication,' implying that Jesus was. Perhaps Jesus had an earthly father, but it wasn't Mary's husband."

In 176 CE, Rabbi Skobac said, a philosopher named Kelsus suggested that Jesus' father was a Roman soldier named Pantera. A Yeshua ben Pantera is listed in talmudic sources as having lived in the Galilee.

And a tombstone in Germany, documented in 1906, lists the name Tiberius Julius Abdes Pantera, a soldier who fought in Palestine in the first century, he added.

"Studying his name, scholars determined that this Pantera was a freed slave, certainly Semitic and possibly Jewish. He left Palestine in 9 CE. The name and date seem correct."

Another slighted aspect of Jesus' life is the historically documented existence of his brother, James. "If Mary was practically deified, James was marginalized – ironic because scholars say James is the critical link to uncovering who Jesus was. It may not be a coincidence that James is so obscured, specifically because he is the key to understanding Jesus."

The Book of Acts "practically says nothing about disciples and relatives of Jesus," Rabbi Skobac said. "It's all about Paul of Tarsus.

"Paul never met Jesus but claims that Jesus appeared to him in a vision. For Paul, Jesus becomes the message," Rabbi Skobac said. "It's not about what Jesus taught.

"As Paul's church grew, Torah observance was jettisoned and Christian doctrines became standard. Relatives and Torah-observant disciples of Jesus became an embarrassment to the Church, so they were written out of the story."

The Da Vinci Code claims that a story about the origins of Christianity has been concealed. "That is true," Rabbi Skobac said, "but it doesn't give us the real story. The real one is substantiable and emerges from the texts.

"Many of us feel that we are living in special times, that we are at a point of unfolding more truth in the world. I feel that this book by Brown could play a part in making people ask more questions and this would lead to uncovering more truths."

ROM installation portrays Vashti as strong, independent

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI

Queen Esther might be the most famous female in the story of Purim, but she's not the only one. Queen Vashti, King Achashverosh's first wife, plays a small part in the Megillah – she refuses to comply with her inebriated husband's demand to appear at a party and then disappears. Her story might seem inconsequential, but one Toronto-based artist thinks differently.

"I always thought Vashti was the hero ever since I was a little kid," says Evan Tapper, an ex-Winnipegger whose audio exhibit In Search of Queen Vashti is currently playing at the Royal Ontario Museum.

The installation, located just outside of the museum's old front doors on Avenue Road, discusses the story of Vashti, and how she's Purim's forgotten heroine. "Vashti was a strong women who stood up for herself and chose her own path," says Tapper, who's been "obsessed" with the character for many years. "Her choice of refusing to be seen as an object is heroic even today."

Tapper first learned about Vashti in Jewish day school, but it wasn't until his mother passed away in 1999 that he realized her story was worth telling. "I've been trying to do this piece for a really long time," he says. "After my mother died I was looking through a bunch of photos, and there was a picture of me in Grade 2 and I was holding a doll. On the back of the picture, it said, 'Evan holding his Vashti doll.'"

At the Royal Ontario Museum

The picture reminded him of Vashti's story, and more specifically, about her disappearance. It was something Tapper instantly related to. "When my mom died, there was this idea of absence, the power of absence, and finding that photo, I was thinking about Vashti disappearing and how powerful that was."

For the next few years, Tapper tried to figure out how to tell Vashti's tale. He started off animating the story, doing all the narrations himself. However, the piece wasn't coming together. He stopped animating and enlisted different women to help tell the story.

"The problem was that it was me representing her," he says. "My voice, a guy's voice, wasn't the right voice to speak for her. So I decided to interview all these different women and create an audio project."

Tapper called on his female friends and acquaintances to talk about how they perceived Vashti. He also went to the The Redwood, a Toronto shelter for women and children, and talked to women – some who were hearing about Vashti for the first time from Tapper – about what the queen meant to them. The result is a 45-minute recording featuring women from all walks of life.

"A lot of people I interviewed were non-Jews," he says. "One woman was from Afghanistan, and she related it to her Afghani history. You realize we're just so connected. Women standing up for themselves and disappearing is pretty universal."

"A lot of the women in the Bible are quite strong," says one woman on the tape. "[Vashti] knew what she wanted and went for and she knew what she didn't want and went for it, so I kind of see her as one of the first feminists in the Bible."

While Vashti's strength and independence is a major theme on the recording, some women talk about how children are brought up believing that Vashti is evil. Tapper's own research, which included reading commentaries on the story, found that for no good reason, the queen was often branded as an outcast.

"Coming across the midrashim, I found that God gave her a tail, or she developed a skin disease… Looking at the text, there really is no negative to her, but what she did was still considered wrong somehow. Now we see that as independence and value."

To learn more about Vashti's fortitude, you'll have to go to the ROM, sit on a bench created by a friend of Tapper's and put on a pair of earphones that broadcasts the recording 24 hours a day. The artist, who's made a name for himself working with animation, says the response has been overwhelming. "A rabbi came up from Buffalo and someone else came from Seattle. They see it on the ROM website and then come to it."

Tapper's motivation for this exhibit wasn't solely to tell Vashti's story. He wants to shed light on the hardships so many women across the world face every day. "There's so many voices we don't hear. There are women in crisis who have fled a bad situation. Brilliant women, who went to extraordinary steps to save children and themselves and we don't hear from them. By doing this, I'm giving a voice."

In recent years, many people planning a vacation through eastern Canada and New England have opted for cruising on a luxury liner such as Holland America Line's ms Maasdam instead of a driving trip.

Lounging around a ship sure beats being stuck in a car where someone has to keep his or her eyes on the road while another is trying to make sense of a map. The captain of the cruise ship ensures you get from port to port and, best of all, you and your holiday buddies don't have to fight over directions.

Holland America Line (HAL) offers a number of New England/eastern Canada cruises. A popular one is the ms Maasdam's seven-day cruise that alternates departures from Boston to Montreal and from Montreal to Boston. In 2007, the company will be offering 12 seven-day cruises from May 19 to Sept. 29. Ports of call include Bar Harbor, Me.; Halifax and Sydney, N.S.; Charlottetown and Quebec City.

In addition, on June 23 and 30 and Aug. 11, the ship will be embarking on three round-trip cruises from Boston, visiting ports that include Newport, R.I., and Saint John, N.B., and places in between. For those wanting to take a longer voyage, the Maasdam will begin its spring 2007 season with a 15-day cruise departing May 4 from Fort Lauderdale, Fla., to Montreal and will sail the itinerary in reverse from Montreal on Oct. 6.

The ms Maasdam holds 1,258 passengers. It has 629 staterooms, from standard cabins to luxury penthouse verandah suites. It is one of the more intimate ships in the HAL fleet. The ship was dedicated in December 1993 by actress June Allyson. This past spring, the ms Maasdam went into dry dock in Freeport, Bahamas, to become the 12th HAL ship to receive the Signature of Excellence upgrades.

Cabin amenities include Euro-top Mariner's Dream Beds, flat-screen TVs, DVD players, deluxe waffle/terry-cloth robes, magnifying makeup mirrors with halo lighting, hair dryers, massage shower heads and complimentary fruit baskets – just in case you need to snack between the multitudes of meals offered during your cruise.

Some of the other on-board additions include the Culinary Arts Center presented by Food & Wine Magazine, where guest chefs will show passengers tricks of the trade. The Explorations Café features the largest library at sea, as well as comfortable music listening stations and Internet access. The Greenhouse Spa and Salon is an exceptional spa offering a full range of services. The recent renovation includes the addition of a thermal suite, a hydro-pool and a large fitness facility.

Passengers travelling with children can send them off to Club HAL. The fully supervised club caters to kids from ages 3 to 12. Little ones can enjoy art or play on a fun slide, while older children can play in a separate area featuring arcade games, Internet access, Sony Playstations and much more.

In addition to the wonderful activities on board, ms Maasdam offers a wide variety of port tours and excursions when you're off the ship, or you can explore on your own.

With tie-ups at airports, it is advised to arrive a day before the ship departs. Besides, it gives you time to explore the port you leave from, be it Boston or Montreal. HAL will gladly book hotel and tours for you prior or post cruise.

A great view of Boston can be seen from the Prudential Skywalk Observatory. Once you've seen the city from above, you can catch a Boston Duck Tour at the base of the Prudential Center. It is a narrated land and water tour in an authentic World War 11 amphibious vehicle that takes you on the Charles River. After being on the water, you may want to learn what comes out of the sea with a visit to the New England Aquarium and a stop at the Simons IMAX Theatre, which showcases animals and habitats too big, too rare or too dangerous to be seen in the aquarium.

A short walk from there is Faneuil Hall and the Quincy Market Building, a great place to pick up souvenirs including ones of the old TV show Cheers. At the Faneuil Hall location and at the original Cheers pub in Beacon Hill, you can pick up T-shirts, mugs, etc.

Bar Harbor is a quaint costal town of Maine known for the Acadia National Park. Cars are not allowed, so plan to bike, hike or take a carriage tour – you can even go by horseback.

Halifax tours offered include a historic city tour of the Halifax Citadel National Historic Site. There are tours of Halifax that also include a drive to the picturesque fishing town of Peggy's Cove, which is one of Canada's most photographed sites.

Sydney is known for its miners and its music – internationally renowned songstress Rita MacNeil lives about a block from where the ms Maasdam docks. City tours include a trip to the Cape Breton Miners Museum and a seven-hour hike on the scenic Cabot Trail.

Once on land in Prince Edward Island, you can't help but notice the soil is a rich red, as rich as the history itself, including the literary history. Fans of Lucy Maude Montgomery's books, which include Anne of Green Gables, can visit Cavendish where you can actually walk through the homestead of the beloved fictional character Anne. You leave believing the little redheaded girl really must have lived.

When the ship docks in Quebec City, it is like stepping back in time. This is the first French city in North America; the old part of the city is rich with historic buildings, chic boutiques and cafés on every corner.

To book a Holland America Line, ms Maasdam cruise to eastern Canada and New England, contact your travel agent, call 1-877-SAIL HAL, ext. 54, or visit www.hollandamericaline.com.

MUSIC, THEATRE, ART, DANCE AND MORE AT ASHKENAZ, AUG. 31 TO SEPT. 4

Toronto's Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture presents its celebrated mix of music, theatre, art, dance, literature, cabaret and film at Harbourfront Centre from Aug. 31 through Sept. 4.

The weekend is ushered in by colourful events such as the pageant and parade organized by Shadowland Theatre, kabbalistic yoga and dramatic Havdalah rituals.

A "cornucopia of exhilarating experiences" follows, including commissioned musical compositions and performances, theatrical premières, collaborations between choreographers and musicians, book and CD launches, silent film classics accompanied by live klezmer groups, and presentations of graphic novels. Offerings include:

• The six-member LufTeater theatre company from France recalls the world of Yiddish Krakow in Echoes and Shavings of Yiddishland, performed in Yiddish and French with English subtitles. Thursday, Aug. 31, 6 p.m. (preview) and again on Sept. 2, 7 p.m. and Sept. 3, 1 p.m. $18

• The Klezmer Cuban Connection, consisting of trumpeter and Ashkenaz founder David Buchbinder and pianist-composer Hilario Durán, offer new musical fusions, Sept. 2, 10 p.m. $18.

• Vancouver singer-songwriter Geoff Berner, who innovated a "punk klezmer" style with his 2005 release Whiskey Rabbi, performs Sept. 2, 11 p.m. $12.

• 91-year-old lounge king Irving Fields meets 78-year-old King of Rai, Maurice El Médioni, in a "once-in-a-lifetime concert featuring two awe-inspiring keyboard legends." Sept. 3, 5 p.m. $25.

• Rabbi Itzchak Marmorstein leads an ophanim yoga class, a recently emerged kabbalistic yoga that helps people "flow in harmony with their inner tree of life." Sept. 2, 3 and 4 (various times). Free.

• Torontonian Michael Wex, author of Born to Kvetch, offers a lesson in how to kvetch like a pro. Kvetch with Wex occurs Sept. 4, 1 p.m. $10.

Other performers include Yasmin Levy, Beyond The Pale, Aaron Bensoussan, Matzo Ball Gumbo, Kharkov Klezmer Band, the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir, Golem, Theresa Tova, David Gale, Klez Kazoo Orchestra, Yiddish Barbershop, Adrienne Cooper, Janie Respitz, Amsterdam Klezmer Band, Chicago Klezmer Ensemble, Marilyn Lerner, Chassidic Jazz Project, Stan Mack, Boris Sichon and KlezFactor.

Admission to the site is free, and tickets are available at the York Quay Centre box office, 235 Queens Quay W., or by phone at 416-973-4000. For a full schedule, visit www.ashkenazfestival.com.

Tova Sings Beyle: Toronto diva Theresa Tova sings the songs of 86-year-old Yiddish poet-songwriter Beyle Schaechter-Gottesman in You Ask Me Why... Tova Sings Beyle, a concert with a virtuoso all-star jazz band featuring Matt Herskowitz, Artie Roth, Daniel Barnes, Brian Katz, Jane Bunnett, Kelly Jefferson, John Macleod and Julie Michels.

"This music is fresh and seductive, bridging the gap between the traditional roots of Jewish culture and 21st-century sensibilities and rhythms," Tova says. Her new CD of the same music is being launched at the concert, which occurs as part of the Ashkenaz Festival. Harbourfront Centre Theatre, Sept. 4, 5:30 p.m. Tickets, 416-973-4000.

Music in Exile: The Royal Conservatory of Music presents Music in Exile, a weekend exploring rarely heard music by composers whom the Nazis exiled, as performed by ARC, the conservatory's resident musical ensemble. The program includes works of several Jewish composers such as Mieszyslaw Weinberg, a Polish Jew who fled Warsaw for the Soviet Union in 1939.

Also included is the Canadian première of Through Roses, an acclaimed work by American pianist-composer Marc Neikrug, who is to conduct it in Toronto. Born in 1946, Neikrug is a longtime accompanist to violinist-conductor Pinchas Zukerman. His Through Roses, which blends music and dramatic text, has been translated into many languages and been performed all over the world, including Israel.

The weekend also features lectures by musicologist Albrecht Dumling and Bret Werb of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C. Glenn Gould Studio, 250 Front St. W. Oct. 14 and 15. 416-408-2824, ext. 321

Arts in Brief

• The 23-year-old, Moscow-born electric violinist Eugene Draw and band perform at Hugh's Room, 2261 Dundas St. W., Sept. 2 and 3, 8:30 p.m. $23-$25. www. hughsroom.com

• Jazz pianist and vocalist Fern Lindzon and guests perform an eclectic program ranging from Cole Porter to Johnny Mandel, with contemporary jazz, klezmer originals and spoken poetry. Hear her arrangements of jazz standards and original compositions at the Trane Studio, 964 Bathurst St., Wednesday, Sept. 6, 13 and 20, 8:30 p.m. 416-913-8197.

• Rebelfest is a non-profit festival meant to showcase truly independent films that have received no government funding and have not been produced through the established film institutes or film centres. Its third annual season runs Sept. 6 to 10. Innis College, Townhall Theatre. 647-286-0067, www. rebelfest.com

Peer posts best Israeli finish ever at Rogers Cup

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to the CJN

MONTREAL — Israeli tennis player Shahar Peer showed Canadian tennis fans why she has become so celebrated in her homeland when she put in the best-ever performance for an Israeli at the Rogers Cup Canadian Open, held earlier this month in Montreal.

Making her Canadian debut, the 19-year-old Peer finished as a quarter-finalist in singles and a semifinalist in doubles for her best-ever performance in a major tournament.

As a result, Peer's ranking rose from 25th to 22nd in singles and from 35th to 33rd in doubles (as of Aug. 21). Both are the highest of her career and make Peer the highest ranking Israeli and Jewish player on the women's pro tennis circuit.

The unseeded Peer defeated Uzbekistan's Varvana Lepchenko 6-4,6-4, then upset sixth seed Anastasia Myskina of Russia 7-6 (6), 5-7, 6-4, and doubles partner Marion Bartoli of France 2-6,7-5,6-4 before losing in the quarterfinals to Russian Anna Chakvetadze 7-6 (3),7-5.

"Although it was tough to lose in the quarter-finals, I am pleased overall with my performance in Montreal. I appreciated all the support I had over the tournament from the many Israelis and Jewish people in Montreal," Peer said after her last match.

Known for her fitness and mental strength, Peer's best match was her upset of Myskina in the second round. Peer's cross-court backhand at the net gave her the first set tie-break. After dropping the second set and after both players broke each other's serve in the third, Peer served out the match with a 5-4 lead.

Peer never gave up, even when trailing big in her matches. Against Lepchenko, she trailed 4-0 before winning five games in a row. Even in defeat, Peer fell behind Chakvetadze 0-3 before rallying for a tie break in the first set, and she evened the match at 5-5 in the second set before Chakvetadze broke her serve.

"Shahar is a great fighter and runs down every shot. She is an exciting young player who I expect big things from," said Tracy Austin, a former Canadian and U.S. Open champion who was a Rogers Cup TV commentator for CBC and TSN. "Her feistiness and mental determination to wear down her opponents gives her a bright future in tennis. The Rogers Cup may be the major breakout tournament for Peer."

During the event, Israel's recent war with Hezbollah was on Peer's mind, as it was for the other two Israelis in the tournament, Anna Smashnova and Tzipi Obziler, who both lost in the first round.

"I have a cousin who is in Lebanon and am glad he is fine," said Peer, 19. "I check every day on the situation. The best thing I could do for myself and my country is to be the best tennis player I can be."

Like other 19-year-old Israelis, Peer is serving a two-year stint in the army. But for 30 weeks a year, she exchanges her army uniform for a tennis outfit and shoots balls instead of bullets.

In the process, she has become the most famous Israeli-born female athlete ever. In May alone, Peer won two tournament titles and became the first Israeli-born tennis player to reach the fourth round of the French Open.

Shahar Peer

Her impressive play caught the eye of Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. "The prime minister has called me after the French Open saying how much he likes to watch me play and thinks that I represent Israel well around the world," said Peer.

Olmert's call is not the only way Peer has been touched by Mideast politics. Last month, Indonesia refused to send a team to compete in Fed Cup play in Israel in order, it said, "to protest the Israeli action against Palestinians." As a result, the International Tennis Federation awarded a forfeit to Israel, which will advance to World Group Two competition in 2007.

"Although the team advanced, I would have preferred to play. It's a shame we could not, because we had a lot of fans in Israel that don't get to see our matches around the world, and it would be good for our fans to see us play," Peer said.

Israelis have been proud of the many achievements of their three players on the women's circuit over the past two months. In addition to Peer's achievements, Obziler, ranked 135th in the world, won a small tournament in Washington, D.C., on July 18, and Smashnova, ranked 62nd, won her 12th professional tournament – the most titles of any Israeli and Jewish player currently competing – in Budapest on July 25.

Born and raised in Maccabim, a West Bank settlement, Peer started playing tennis at age six, taking lessons with her older brother, Shlomi, and sister, Shani. In 2001, at age 14, young Shahar won the prestigious Orange Bowl 14s title, and in 2004, she became the first Israeli to win the Australian Junior Open.

Peer has also won singles and doubles titles in Prague, a city she has familial connections to. "My grandparents are from [Prague] and when my parents were very young, my grandparents emigrated to Israel and are Holocaust survivors."

Peer's father, Dovik, a computer software specialist, travels with Shahar as much as possible while her mother Aliza remains at home.

The Rogers Cup also brought out the best in Sharon Fichman, 15, of Toronto, who was playing in her second Rogers Cup tournament. Fichman has already made Canadian tennis history by becoming the youngest person (at 14) to both make the Federation Cup team and win a gold medal at the Maccabiah Games (doing so in 2005). Although Fichman lost in qualifying at the Rogers Cup 6-3, 7-6 (3) to Russian Galina Voskoboeva, she remains optimistic about her future.

"She [Voskoboeva] played the big points well, otherwise the match was close and competitive. I feel that I will improve in the future and hope to play the Rogers Cup for many years," Fichman said.

Blind golfer the star attraction at Beit Halochem event

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Zohar Sharon would be hard pressed to duplicate his remarkable feat of last year.

Not many sighted golfers, let alone those who are totally blind like Sharon, ever card a two under par eagle, yet that's exactly what he did last August during a friendly round at Maple Downs Golf & Country Club.

This year, Sharon says he's hitting the ball even better, although at a fundraising event last week for Beit Halochem Canada – Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel (Canada), he struggled early on the driving range to iron out a kink in his swing.

The day before the tournament at Angus Glen Golf Club, Sharon received some advice from a golf coach about the position of his left arm during his swing.

The advice, Sharon asserted, disrupted his natural motion and threw him off his game. But, he added with his ever-present broad smile, he'll fix it.

Sharon, arguably the best blind golfer in the world, needs to get his game in order as he prepares to defend his title at next week's World Invitational 2006 blind golf tournament in Edinburgh, Scotland.

Sharon, 55, fully expects to walk away with the title yet again – after he gets his swing back on track.

For 144 supporters of Beit Halochem, Sharon, kinks and all, was an inspiration and the guy everyone wanted to meet. Sharon was planted at Angus Glen's 17th hole where all foursomes passed through. They had their pictures taken with him and got the chance to "beat the pro."

Tournament chair Mark Dodick said Sharon proved to be a tremendous draw for Beit Halochem.

That and an awareness of the injuries sustained by Israel's troops in the recent war with Hezbollah brought out a full complement of golfers and enticed sponsors to ante up the kind of prizes and awards that golfers appreciate, including two cars, a golfing trip to Atlantic City and $25,000 in cash for a hole in one on the course's four par threes.

Beit Halochem's golf day – the ninth consecutive one sponsored by the organization – is the second "major" in the charity's calendar of events, behind a June concert which drew 1,700 spectators.

Dee-Dee Shiffman, executive vice-president of Beit Halochem, said money raised at the tournament and at other events goes toward providing rehabilitation equipment at Beit Halochem's four Israeli facilities, as well as programming, staffing and counselling.

Beit Halochem operates centres in Haifa, Tel Aviv, Jerusalem and Nahariya that offer disabled veterans a way to reintegrate themselves into normal life.

Over the past few years, Beit Halochem Canada has sent on average $1.2 million annually to Israel for rehabilitation programs, said Shiffman, adding that the organization takes pride in remitting 88 per cent of the funds it raises, with the remainder allocated for administrative and other costs.

In addition to the golf day, Beit Halochem raises funds at its annual concert and holds successful events to raise awareness of the organization, such as the recent young leadership party at the home of president Toby Feldberg, which was attended by 500 people between 25 and 40. Other items on the calendar include an annual Chanukah Party, a mission to Israel (this year's is scheduled to depart on Oct. 19 and last 10 days) and information evenings. Last March, former Israel Defence Forces chief of staff Moshe Ya'alon addressed the group, Feldberg said.

Every June, 10 disabled veterans are brought to Ontario for rest and recreation in a program that harkens back to Beit Halochem's very first attempt at assisting wounded Israeli soldiers. That program was launched by Beit Halochem Canada founder Berny Weinstein more than 20 years ago, Feldberg said.

Sharon is one of Beit Halochem's success stories. He spent a lot of time at its facilities during his rehabilitation and he still works out there. A former IDF sniper who later became a bomb disposal expert, Sharon lost his vision when a chemical substance was sprayed in his face.

Within two years, he was totally blind and he sank into a deep depression. He took up golf – or at least putting on a carpet – at the suggestion of his wife's lawyer during divorce proceedings. From that modest start, he ventured to outdoor golf, but at times he became so frustrated that he gave up the sport completely. Five years ago, he resumed his infatuation with golf, and these days he plays six days a week, taking time off only to observe Shabbat.

He plays in about 20 tournaments a year as far afield as Miami, San Diego, Chicago, Toronto and, of course Scotland. Any money he earns is sent back to Israel to train guide dogs for the blind, such as his constant companion Dylan, a mixed Labrador/Golden Retriever.

His longtime friend Shimshon Levi provides his eyes on the course. Levi describes the hole, the yardage, helps select the club, lines it up and grounds it behind the ball, allowing Sharon to take his stance.He also provides feedback, describing the flight of the ball and its distance, though Sharon's sense of touch is so acute, he often knows when he's hit it well or poorly even before Levi says a word.

When Sharon plays events such as the tournament in Scotland, he wears a hat on the course, but takes care to wear a knitted kippah at awards ceremonies and the like. As he explained, "if I play with Gentiles, I see myself as an ambassador for Israel. But when I play with Jews, I feel as though I am with brothers."

With a Mulligan in his pocket on his first shot on the 175-yard 17th, he smacked his second ball to the left edge of the green, and on his next shot, he made good contact, too, sending the ball to the right, albeit a little short.

"It'll be OK," he said."I'm playing better than I am showing. Yesterday someone told me to change my left arm in the swing. That broke my swing. Now, I'm looking for it. I'll find it. I just need time."

New Views

In the Middle East, it never pays to look to the future. In a region where war is always on the horizon and the threat of terrorism is a constant worry, you take whatever peace you can get today and prepare for the next fight.

So, Israel's latest ceasefire with the terrorist group Hezbollah – as threadbare as it most certainly is – must be seen as an opportunity. The ceasefire will give Israel a chance to regroup and some time to consider its successes and failings in Lebanon. Most importantly, the UN-endorsed ceasefire means that there will be no more rocket attacks on Haifa, Afula and Safed, no more civilian deaths and no more dangerous military operations over uncharted terrain. (Unfortunately, the ceasefire also means that the kidnapped Israeli soldiers will not be returning home any time soon.)

If the past 58 years have taught us anything, it's that the State of Israel must never look too far into the future. There will almost certainly never be a comprehensive peace between Israel and its state and terrorist enemies. And it is equally implausible that Israel will be able to fully defeat its many opponents over any period of time. The only real option is to stay alive at all costs and live to fight again on another day.

Over the past few weeks, many people have proclaimed that Israel lost this latest war and, in effect, strengthened Hezbollah's standing as a saviour in the Arab world. Israel failed to disarm Hezbollah, was only semi-successful in neutralizing the threat of rocket attacks on the northern part of the country, and it brought international ire upon itself with a month-long bombing campaign that killed 1,000 people and ruined Lebanon.

But calling the war a defeat implies that this was in some way a winnable war. In reality, there was little chance that Israel could have rid Lebanon of Hezbollah and destroyed the group's cache of missiles. Anti-terrorism campaigns are so difficult because they are entirely different from conventional warfare, with innocent civilians used as shields and the urban landscape as a tactical front. Israel's only option to "win" this war would have been a carpet-bombing destruction of Lebanon – and, even then, Hezbollah would have still probably survived (in Syria, Iran and Gaza).

The world – that is, the democratically developed world – is still learning how to successfully combat a terrorist offensive. The recent arrests in Britain of more than 20 alleged would-be-terrorists suggests that we are getting better at preventing terror attacks before they happen, but no one has figured out how to wage a successful war against an active terrorist enemy. The stakes in this case – namely, Israel Defence Forces casualties on the battlefield and massive civilian death in Lebanon – were too high to be sustained in a long campaign. In an age where nations at war need as many lawyers as foot soldiers, the aftershocks of a large-scale invasion of Lebanon were potentially more damaging than helpful.

Israel did just about all it realistically could have in its attempt to defeat Hezbollah. But this just wasn't a war it could hope to win. Instead, Israel got the next best thing – time to learn how to fight (and defeat) this new breed of enemy and an end to the terrifying rockets attacks on the north. This is neither the beginning nor the end of Israel's conflict with its many enemies. It's just the latest chapter in the present middle ground, in which every day brings equal possibilities, of both war and peace.

But for the time being, one million Israelis can return to their homes and jobs, and some semblance of a normal life. And parents can go to sleep without worrying about their children being crouched and scared on an unfamiliar hillside in a hostile country.

Grilled Chicken Mango Salad

4 medium chicken breasts
1/2 cup Raspberry Vinaigrette dressing, divided
4 cups baby spinach leaves
1 red onion, sliced
1 mango, peeled and cubed
1 avocado, peeled, pitted and cubed

Marinate chicken in 1/4 cup dressing for 5 mins. Remove chicken from marinade and discard marinade. Barbeque 6 to 7 mins. on each side or until cooked through.

Toss together spinach, onion, mango and avocado. Drizzle with remaining dressing. Divide salad mixture onto 4 plates, top each with sliced grilled chicken breast.

Role of Diaspora Jewry: defending Israel

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

How should Diaspora Jewry respond to Israel's war against Hezbollah?

Disagreement and dissent is a healthy attribute of our people. However, whether or not we agree with the way the war was fought, the challenge to Diaspora Jewry is how best we can be used at this point to strengthen the Jewish People and the State of Israel.

Israel is taking enormous amounts of flak, both inside and outside the country, for what many armchair critics see as weak leadership and a badly fought war. Whether this is the case or not, clearly Israeli's reputation as a strong and mighty nation is taking a beating. This sentiment is being heard throughout the Arab world, as well as in major international media outlets.

Questions are being asked such as: "Can Israel win the next round of war against Hezbollah, Iran and Syria?" "Is Israel the same fighting machine, with committed soldiers and citizens, as it used to be?" "What about Israel's leadership? How is it that Olmert and his cabinet could act so inappropriately by announcing a victory while hundreds of bombs were raining down on northern Israel?"

The more these questions are asked, the more the world, and especially our enemies, will believe that Israel has slipped in terms of its ability to defend itself – as it has done miraculously well over the past six decades. Weakness of this type, in Israel's part of the world, is a real danger.

If we decide that it's appropriate to speak publicly in order to criticize and/or condemn Israel for a strategy that we may not agree with, are we not, in effect, adding to the problem?

I suggest that the role of Diaspora Jewry is to act as an emissary for the State of Israel by consistently, and whenever possible, praising it for its bravery, and reminding the world of Hezbollah's evil actions and intentions.

Israel is a master at defending itself. It doesn't need us to be armchair generals. Diaspora Jews, however, are skilled at being marketers and goodwill ambassadors – an area of expertise that Israel has not had the time to master.

We must, therefore, use our gifts, to remind the world that Hezbollah regularly acts outside of the rules of war (for instance, by involving women and children in fighting); is funded by drug sales, in full knowledge of its spiritual leaders; and has as its goal the elimination of the State of Israel – the Middle East's only real democracy – and the Islamicization of as many nations as possible.

Did Israel fight badly? Was the army unprepared? These questions can't be answered by Jews living safely thousands of miles away from the battle lines, without the understanding or details that only the Israeli cabinet was privy to – such as why a ceasefire at this time might be a prudent preparation for the next step.

Mostly, Diaspora Jewry owes Israel an enormous amount of respect and gratitude for the resources it has invested in securing the Jewish people, and for the tragedy of losing thousands of Jewish sons and daughters since 1948.

That respect should translate into accepting the fact that Israel will work through its military challenges, and will do so brilliantly – and partly through dissent, arguing, infighting, etc. Similarly, respect must come in the form of support, not only from philanthropic contributions or visits to the Holy Land, but also through our skills at articulating a strong and well-thought out defence of Israel.

It's easy, and often cheap, to be vocal about Israel's response to Hezbollah. But we can play a crucial role, one that demands real effort, in the defence of the Jewish People through our own readily available resources – our ability to speak loudly and clearly about our precious State of Israel.
